And why? This is why. She needs to be informed as to the prevailing standards of morality, of the recognized principles of action, public and private, also what are the accepted standards of respectability, for all these do directly affect the characters and fortunes of her children and her own welfare. And as soon as she finds these standards, motives and principles to be other than they should be, other than the good of her children and of the community demands, then comes upon her the imperative duty of denouncing them and of asserting the true ones. She can do this in her home and in every social circle of which she is a member, and by her pen.

The present state of things betokens a tremendous conflict between wrong and right. Women must engage in this conflict. It has been argued against them that they cannot fight, but the most effective battleground is where is waged the warfare of ideas. In this warfare women must serve as privates, as officers, and above all as standard-bearers, holding high that standard which now is so often made to trail in the dust. To arouse them to a sense of these great responsibilities, a few illustrations will be given, showing how it is that all women stand directly affected by matters which they now turn from as being "business" or "politics" and consequently "no concern of theirs."

OUR BILL OF FARE

has a pleasant variety of subjects as well as an attractive appearance. "My Cross," by Frances E. Townsley, the evangelistic superintendent of Nebraska, is a life experience. The second installment of Helen Campbell's "Passages" might well be named "The Pie Chapter." A valuable history of "The Alcoholic Commission of Inquiry" is given by the New York lawyer, Aaron M. Powell. "Madame Séverine," the French Christian socialist, is well sketched by Rilla Norton. Page 5 is devoted to a spicy symposium on "Why Should not a Woman be President of the United States?" "The White Ribbon Women in England," "Removal of the Southern Utes," "Discrimination of the Republican Platform against Women," and "Temperance Temple Items" fill the correspondence department. A capital children's story (and "big folks," too) is furnished by Helen A. Butler, and a talk on money, by Addie Northam Fields. The Household department comprises three articles of value: "Our Ingle Neuk," by Dr. J. E. Rankin, the conclusion of "A Tale of a Cider Press," by Elizabeth Cumings, and Abby Morton Diaz' "Words to the Wise." Canada, Chili, China, India, Japan, Australia and the Sandwich Islands as well as four United States grace pages 10 and 11.

THE LAST LOVING RITES.

The quiet, shady streets of Evanston lent an added pathos to the scene last Tuesday afternoon (August 9), as hundreds of friends passed through them, moving towards Rest Cottage and the Methodist church, the two centers of interest on that day, not only in the "classic town" but in the loving thoughts of all white-ribboners. This sad occasion was nothing less memorable than the last, loving rites for an honored citizen and the beloved mother of a famous daughter, Mrs. Mary T. Hill Willard.

Relatives, neighbors and temperance friends had been invited to the cottage at half past one for a brief farewell service consisting of the reading of marked passages from the Bible of the one "gone before," by Mrs. Caroline B. Buell, prayer by Prof. Joseph Emerson, of Beloit College, and the singing of a hymn. While this special company were thus engaged, another and a larger company were assembling in the church and upon the adjacent grounds, so that when the funeral cortege arrived "a sea of upturned faces," all filled with kindly sympathy, greeted the friends and mourners.

Although the expressed wish of Madam Willard for no display of flowers was well known, there were several designs and bouquets of unusual beauty in the church. Great clusters of roses, white, pink and yellow, gave just a touch of color to the handsome palms that rested in large vases inside the chancel rails and on the pulpit platform. The family pew was exquisitely draped in white and evergreens.

The special friends, members of the Evanston W. C. T. U. and employés of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association occupied the middle tier of seats, Miss Willard, accompanied by her niece, Miss Katherine Willard, Miss Anna Gordon, Miss Irene Fockler, Miss Kate Jackson and Miss Alice Briggs, sitting directly in front of the casket, upon which rested with touching grace a large bunch of sword palms tied with wide white ribbon, the offering of Miss Frances E. Willard to the memory of her sainted mother.

The honorary pall-bearers were our Mrs. C. B. Buell and Miss Esther Pugh, and Mrs. Dr. Kidder, Mrs. Dr. Marcy, Madam Bragdon, and Mrs. Pearsons, of Evanston, all intimate friends of Madam Willard.

The services were introduced by the exquisite singing of "I would not live alway," by Mrs. Mather D. Kimball, a distant relative of the family. Then fell sweet words of prayer upon the large assembly, voiced by Rev. Dr. Jutkins. The quartette, composed of Mr. and Mrs. Mather D. Kimball, Miss Parkes and Mr. Samuel Merwin, sang "Our life is a dream," this, and all the other hymns being favorites of Madam Willard. The Rev. Dr. Lewis Curts read appropriate and marked selections from Madam Willard's own Bible, after which the quartette rendered "Lead, kindly light." The pastor of the church, Rev. Dr. Studley, sketched the life of the departed from her birth in Danville, Vt., January 3, 1805, to August 7, 1892—the day of her death. His tribute was a most faithful as well as a most tender one. "There is a land of pure delight" was sung. Rev. Dr. Charles F. Bradley, a close friend of the family, read a paper characterizing the noble life of the translated mother, and giving many of her last remarkable utterances, indicative of profound faith and joyful anticipation of her heavenly inheritance. This address was followed by her favorite temperance hymn, "There are lonely hearts to cherish." Then Rev. Dr. H. A. Delano spoke of Madam Willard's relation to philanthropy and reform in a manner so beautiful that all were touched and inspired to nobler living. The quartette sang, "Jerusalem, my happy home," and the benediction was pronounced by Rev. Dr. Miner Raymond, who, like almost all who participated in the service, had once been Madam Willard's pastor.

The long funeral procession then moved to Rose Hill cemetery, four miles distant, where the dear body was laid in the beautiful family lot, in which already repose the remains of the revered father, brother and sister. Miss Willard stood over the place where she herself will some time lie, but which we all devoutly hope will be at a far distant day. With the little group of six special mourners, all women, around her, she watched the lowering of the casket into the grave, from which all forbidding aspects had been removed by the beautiful covering of cedar and vines sent by friends from the old "Forest Home" at Janesville, Wis. As soon as the casket was adjusted, each one of the home group threw in a spray of evergreen from Madam Willard's own tree on the Rest Cottage lawn, and the faithful family maid, Eda, scattered lovely roses over the evergreen. Other friends threw in flowers and Miss Willard laid her cluster of palms tenderly on one side of the grave, while Anna Gordon placed Lady Henry Somerset's white rose heart, marked "Saint Courageous, from her English daughter," on the other side. The solemn burial service was then spoken by Dr. Studley and Professor Bradley, and the benediction was pronounced by Professor Emerson, a relative of the family.

As "ashes to ashes and dust to dust" resounded through the stillness and the leafy bowers of the "city of the dead," every heart was lifted in silent prayer for the bereft and beloved daughter—the last member of the small and illustrious family. No sorrow could be felt for the dear "Saint Courageous," gone home fully ripe for eternity, but for the lonely survivor every eye was moistened and every lip quivered with emotion. Happy is she who can say in her great sorrow, "The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures. He leadeth me beside the still waters."

Our next issue will be a special memorial number for Madam Willard, containing the addresses in full, also pictures of Rest Cottage and its family, and many interesting personal memories furnished by Miss Willard, if she is then able to write them. That number will also contain material for the memorial meetings which every local union will wish to have, and which so many have already appointed.

OUR STANDARD-BEARER AT HOME.

Whatever the New York Sun and other Eastern papers may say against General Bidwell, they will find it hard work to make a genuine Californian believe a word to his discredit. No man in the state stands higher in the estimation of his fellow citizens than he. It is pleasant to see how both Republican and Democratic papers of California resent and refute the senseless charges made against him by their Eastern exchanges. One of THE UNION SIGNAL editors being on the ground, much pains has been taken to ascertain the exact facts concerning his record, that our readers may have authoritative statements with which to refute these falsehoods. First, as regards his being a "land baron," a "bloated monopolist," securing vast tracts of choice land by questionable means, as charged by the Sun, and making himself rich by holding it for speculation, the facts are these: John Bidwell came to California in an early day, when land in Butte county was practically valueless, "ten thousand acres being bought for the price of a horse." What is now Chico Ranch, that marvel of beauty and fertility, was a desert, which, it was thought, might in time be utilized for pasturage, perhaps small portions of it for grain, but to make it produce fruit seemed beyond the possibilities. The indomitable industry of Mr. Bidwell, guided by his wonderfully keen insight and strong common sense, has made that wilderness to blossom as the rose; is he to be blamed for that?

So far as human scrutiny goes there has not been a selfish thought in all his work, but ever his uppermost object has been that others might share the rewards of his labor. Not one acre of ground has he ever bought, or held, or sold on speculation, but ten thousand people now live on the land which he has reclaimed from the wilderness. This simple fact refutes all the "monopoly" charges. Had General Bidwell been willing to sell to wealthy speculators, instead of reserving his land for poor working people to whom he sold on easy terms, he might now be worth the millions imputed to him, instead of being, as he is, straitened for means to carry on his beneficent enterprises.

But even had he made a great fortune by the rise in real estate, and now owned tens of thousands of acres, would that be anything against him? "Lucky Baldwin" owns a ranch of 58,000 acres in Southern California where land is ten times as valuable as in Chico, and the world has nothing but praise for the pluck and persistency which has acquired it, for he is "hale fellow well met," with all the fast men in the state, has no cranky prejudices against wine drinking, and in favor of the seventh commandment; it is only when a man is a Christian and a teetotaler that it is a sin for him to be rich. General Bidwell has twenty-three thousand acres, every one of them honestly obtained and honestly used; we cannot see how any honest man can find in this fact any cause for blame. We feel like thanking God for intrusting so much to so faithful a steward.

"General Bidwell made his money off of wine; had five hundred broad acres in wine and brandy grapes; when his output became large set up a winery and a still house, with powerful engines and costly machinery; for twenty years his name stood next to the head of California's wine and brandy producers." So says the Sun, and goes on with insinuations that he now sells grapes for wine making. Here are the facts in the case, as given in the Chico Daily Enterprise (Republican), and the Chico Chronicle (Democratic), which General Bidwell says are correct: The largest area General Bidwell ever had in wine grapes is between eight and ten acres; these commenced bearing in 1864–5. At that early day Mr. Bidwell believed, as Kate Field and others do to-day, that pure, native wine would conduce to temperance, displacing the stronger liquors. Accordingly he arranged for its manufacture on a limited scale, erecting a small winery and placing it in charge of an experienced wine-maker. About this time he was elected to Congress, and was absent in Washington two years.

On his return to Chico in 1867 he was horrified to find that his "temperance drink" was making people drunk, and that his wine-maker declared the erection of a still a necessity to wine making, so that brandy might be made to fortify the wine. His eyes opened wide, instantly; he dug up all his wine grapes, discharged his wine-maker, and not a drop of wine has ever been made on his premises since. There were on hand one thousand gallons of "good" wine, the largest quantity ever owned by him; this he purposed throwing away, but was persuaded by Rev. Mr. White to send it to San Francisco hospitals for medicinal purposes. This he did—our Temperance Hospital not having then demonstrated the advantages of non-alcoholic medication—and washed his hands thoroughly of the whole wine making business.

The papers say that this action of General Bidwell was taken because his "second wife" coaxed him into it; this, honest Annie Bidwell wishes most emphatically denied. "He did it of his own accord," says she, "before we were married, because he thought it was right." By the way, charming Mrs. Bidwell is no "second wife" but his first, last and only one.

The Sun declares that raisins are not made in Butte county, and that it would be impossible to find market for the grapes he raises anywhere except at wineries; but facts are against this assumption. General Bidwell has now one hundred and fifty acres in raisin and table grapes, which produced last year 521,447 pounds; of these 385,786 pounds were made into raisins on the estate, and 86,300 pounds sold for table use, most of them being shipped to Chicago. The remainder of the crop was consumed on the place, or was refuse grapes.

When the National Editorial Association visited California last May, it was royally entertained by General and Mrs. Bidwell, but not a drop of wine was included in the menu. We were told this was the only entertainment at which wine was not offered the editors while in California, and many expressed themselves delighted with the change. It must have been a poor excuse of a man who repaid this hospitality by reporting, as a Massachusetts journal declares was done, that he was quietly given to understand by General Bidwell that he was largely interested in the wine business. Out upon such "editorial enterprise" which manufactures out of whole cloth what it wishes to report! It makes us almost ashamed of belonging to the fraternity.

General Bidwell's views in regard to the proposed union of the People's party and the Prohibitionists has been, probably unintentionally, misrepresented by some of his friends. While he would have rejoiced, as would we all, had the People's party come out strong for prohibition, he never advocated a union of the two parties, or for a moment thought of withdrawing from the candidacy that prohibition votes might be concentrated on General Weaver. His keen eye saw what Oregon's experience proved, that a fusion of the two parties meant death to the Prohibition party, for the Australian ballot system ignores the elements which fuse; if Prohibitionists vote the People's ticket they are counted in that party; thus counted they are lost as Prohibitionists, and next election where are the three per cent or five per cent of voters to come from that entitle Prohibitionists to representation on the ballot? Moreover, General Bidwell would not in any way, shape or manner favor any ticket based on a platform which does not make prohibition and woman's ballot distinctive and leading issues.

General Bidwell's sensible, dignified bearing during this campaign reminds one forcibly of Lincoln during his first candidacy; indeed, the two men have much in common, the same unswerving integrity, the same strong, common sense, the same depth and breadth of thought, resulting from successful pioneer experiences. Both possessed an uncommon fund of general information more noticeable because unexpected in men of such busy lives. Unostentatious as he is, General Bidwell is a real cyclopedia, not only in things agricultural and political, but in literature as well. And it does one good to see amid the piles of documents on his table, the Bible occupying the honored place. Blessed is the people which has such a leader.

He conscientiously refrains from participating personally in the local campaign, in following the example not only of Lincoln, but of all our worthy presidents. He rightly thinks that the eternal fitness of things forbids the candidate for the highest office in the gift of a great people exhibiting himself in the guise of a vote-seeker. So all invitations to speak are respectfully declined, while the hundreds of letters continually pouring in are conscientiously answered. In this work Mrs. Bidwell is his invaluable assistant, herself using the caligraph because she can catch his meaning so much more readily than could an average stenographer, thus lessening the labor of dictation for her husband.

A FINANCIAL LETTER.

[Owing to its vital importance to the World's work, we have placed this letter where all who learn the need may read, and heed.]

Dear Friends of the World's White Ribboners:

Iago exclaimed: "Who steals my purse steals trash." I fully agree with his view of the comparative values of money and a "good name," but question if Iago would have applied the epithet, "trash," had he ever served as treasurer of a temperance organization like ours. Money, honestly acquired and wisely used, is a wonderful power for good, and no local union, much less the World's, whose branches extend into all parts of the globe, an long exist without adequate financial support. We deem it well that the condition of the treasury and the needs of the work should be fully understood by all our National auxiliaries. This must be my excuse for this frank and friendly talk about the finances of the World's W. C. T. U.

First, then, it should be noted that until the first convention held in Boston last November there had never been a World's treasurer; consequently no financial statement was included in the printed reports of that convention. Miss Pugh, treasurer of the United States National Union, had kindly taken charge of all funds contributed for World's work. (With very few exceptions "dues" had not been paid.) The money granted the round-the-world missionaries was largely raised in the United States, as, for example, in the year preceding the convention, when less than $100 was received from other countries, although $700 or more was paid for missionary work. Miss Pugh had always made separate accounts of all receipts and expenditures of world's and missionary money with her National reports. This being the condition of things, in the spring of 1891 Miss Willard made a public appeal for donations with which to meet bills for postage, clerical help, printing and other general expenses which had already accrued and which would be greatly augmented by the preparation for the approaching convention. The response was most generous, $3,868.53 being received by her, $3,604.19 of this amount coming from the United States of America, and $264.34 from all other countries. Of this fund $1,287.57 was used for the purposes specified, and the balance transferred, after convention, to the newly appointed general treasurer.

The following is a general statement of the receipts and disbursements since November 11, 1891:

WORLD'S TREASURY.

[November 11, 1891, to July 9, 1892.]

RECEIPTS.

Balance Miss Willard's Personal Appeal Fund	$ 2,615 11
Convention receipts	20 60
Hawaiian Islands, Mrs. Jones' donation	25 02
England, Maidenhead Branch B. W. T. A. donation	1 75
England W. W. C. T. U., donation, £25	121 21
Australasia, New South Wales and South Australia, dues	34 03
Australasia, New South Wales and Bathurst, donation	2 43
New Zealand, Napier and Wellington, donation	14 55
South America, Chile, Concepcion, dues	2 00
France, Paris Y's dues	46
Bahamas, Nassau, New Providence, dues	1 00
Canada, 3 years (1889–1892)	100 17
United States of America, dues (part of year)	125 28
U. S. of America, donations from local unions	7 00
U. S. of America missionary fund	500 00
U. S. of America, Y unions for Paris Y work	71 00
Interest	83 02
Total	$ 3,724 63

DISBURSEMENTS.

Mrs. M. C. Leavitt	$ 500 00
Mrs. M. C. Leavitt (designated donations)	18 98
Miss Alice Palmer (missionary)	400 00
Miss Mary A. West	100 00
Y work in Paris (designated donation)	71 00
W. W. C. T. U. superintendents	45 00
Salaries of secretaries and clerk	921 62
Printing, publications and postage	913 82
Sundry expenses	58 00
	$3,028 42

The balance in the treasury, July 9, 1892, is $696.21, or only a trifle more than the average amount of running expenses for two months. Missionary work is not included in this estimate of running expenses, and no salaries are paid to the president or treasurer.

So much for the past and present, and now for the needs of the future. World-wide correspondence necessitates a large expenditure for stationery, printing and postage. Secretaries' salaries and superintendents' grants must be paid or the work ceases. The cost of the World's Convention in Chicago, in 1893, must be provided for. More missionaries ought to be sent. Opportunities are constantly increasing, and new avenues of work are opening. To use them to advantage will require an increasingly liberal expenditure of money. In order that the World's W. C. T. U. may not be harassed for want of funds to carry on its work, the following suggestions are made:

1. The ordinary yearly fee from each National Auxiliary is one-half cent per member of its local auxiliaries. Will not the National treasurers (who have not already done so) see that the yearly dues are forwarded as soon as possible?

2. A careful examination of the financial statement just given will show that the dues alone will be quite insufficient for the support of the organization. September 22 has been appointed "World's W. C. T. U. Day," and it is earnestly hoped that special collections will be taken up by local unions all over the world for the benefit of the World's W. C. T. U. Though few may be able to send large amounts, yet, if all will forward something the aggregate will count up handsomely, and the work will prosper.

3. National treasurers are requested to transmit money to the general treasurer by bank drafts or bills of exchange, payable in Montreal, Canada, to Ella F. M. Williams, treasurer. Drafts on New York banks will be satisfactory if those on Montreal cannot be obtained. Small sums can be sent by postoffice orders. Yours "for God and Home and Every Land."

ELLA F. M. WILLIAMS,
Treas. World's W. C. T. U.

26 Chomedy St., Montreal, Can.

DR. CRANFILL, our Prohibition candidate for Vice-President, in his ringing speech before the Central W. C. T. U., in Detroit recently, said that he regarded as the most distinguishing event of the nineteenth century, the discovery of woman. He said: "We have had her all the time, but it is not until a very recent date that we knew what she was." He sketched the progress of the sex up to the present leading position they take in all social and moral movements, and predicted that the time is near at hand when women will vote. He also said: "I was brought up in the Democratic party, and gave to that party my full work and prayers for many years, but when I saw that it was utterly impossible for a man to be a Democrat or a Republican in these days and be an earnest Christian I made up my mind that I would rather give up my party than my hopes of heaven. I have been labored with vigorously by many of my former political associates and told that if I and others kept on in this course, we would break up the 'Solid South.' To all such I have replied, 'All right, so be it, so long as we break up the solid rum devil!' It is for American boys and girls that we are called upon to do service; to save in the generation near at hand American womanhood and childhood. I met a small Kansas boy in St. Louis and asked him if he had ever seen a saloon. 'Oh, yes,' he replied, 'lots of them.' 'Did you ever see any in Kansas?' I asked. 'No, never in my life.' 'Did you see saloon signs or liquors for sale in Kansas?' 'No.' And it is only Republican prohibition they have in Kansas. Wait till we get Prohibition prohibition. Then the boys and girls of America will not have their pure young minds and morals blackened by familiarity with these saloons, set for the corruption of their bodies and the damnation of their souls. The Prohibition ticket is the only ticket that stands for the true rising manhood of this nation; it is the only party that is even talking temperance." Dr. Cranfill facetiously urged the creation of a new college degree, instead of A. B. and D. D. He said he would like to create a degree of B. B. (Back Bone) and it would outrank a quality as scarce in these days as teeth in a grasshopper.

Edward Everett Hale says tersely: "Spinsters are of that valuable class whose merits are growing more and more to be appreciated as the world grows older and they grow younger; and it is a singular fact whereas such persons used to be called old maids they are now acknowledged to possess the advantage of perennial youth."

Cleanliness and healthful surroundings will remove half the incentives to crime. Men and women who keep themselves clean have a certain virtue and sanctity as the natural result. If we put more money into public baths we would put less into penitentiaries.

Perhaps we do not fully realize the immense power there is in the hands of the sturdy granger. Farmers cast about six-tenths of all the ballots, consequently no party can get into power without their aid. Arrayed on the side of prohibition, the farmers' vote alone would clear away the nation's blot.

A recent breezy letter from Mrs. Georgiana Cook (wife of the Rev. Joseph Cook) who with her husband is summering at Cliff Seat, Ticonderoga, contains the following item of interest: "At the first temperance council ever held by the Indians of the Omaha Reservation they unanimously voted to set aside two thousand dollars from their pasture money to be used in the temperance work. The speeches were all from men who love whisky, and yet they so realize the danger to their people from this curse of drink that they are willing to devote this amount of money from their small allowance to rid the Reservation of whisky.

Heaven leaves a touch of the angel in all little children, to reward those about them for their heavy cares.—Dinah Mulock Craik.

A little bird told me something the other day about Mrs. General Weaver, whose husband, as you all know, is before the people as the presidential candidate on the People's party ticket. She is president of the Temple union at Des Moines, Iowa, and with the other members of the union observed "Self-denial Week," all the members of her family joining with her. One day she modestly remarked that the General enjoyed it very much and suggested an annual observance of it in their home. This institution of the W. C. T. U. may thus be looked upon as the source of the recommendation from General Weaver to his political party, to observe a self-denial week for the purpose of raising a campaign fund. Thus does the W. C. T. U. lend its influence to political parties in most unexpected ways!

The W. C. T. U. women of Cow Bay, Cape Breton Island, Nova Scotia, Canada, aided and abetted by earnest-hearted men, have crusaded the saloons of the city, and six hundred dollars worth of the vilest stuff ever concocted to steal men's money, brains and souls, went gurgling into the gutter. This will always happen whenever there is moral stamina enough to use the weapon of the law.

I have just heard of a new departure successfully carried out this summer by Mrs. Josephine Nichols, World's superintendent of fairs and president Indiana W. C. T. U. It is to hold "Schools of Ethics" at the summer assemblies, organizing the women especially for the purpose, and to give a course of addresses on topics of peculiar interest to womankind. The temperance work may be greatly advanced in this way, and the plan commends itself by its advantages as well as by its novelty.

We have received a letter from the Countess Tolstoi, whose home is in the famous "Hermitage" Palace in St. Petersburg, and who, we believe, has been maid of honor to several princesses. We wish that we could express ourselves in Russian as well as this accomplished woman has expressed herself in English. This is her note:

"DEAR MADAM:—I thank you very much for your books and for the honor of proposing to me the vice-presidency of the society which has certainly all my sympathy and interest, but in Russia no society would be permitted by our government for it would be suspected to have other purposes. Such a state makes that our Russian society lives an indoor family life and is very indifferent to public and political life. As much as is in my power I shall always try to act in life and in society by the principles of your honored W. C. T. U. Believe me, dear madam,

"Yours truly, Css. S. TOLSTOI.

ON DUTY.

World's W. C. T. U.

FROM CANADA'S HONORARY PRESIDENT.

THE UNION SIGNAL found its way into my room recently in bran new summer suit, a forcible illustration of the saying, "A thing of beauty and a joy forever." The new costume is exceedingly becoming and suggestive of the artistic skill of the modiste who planned it. I read THE UNION SIGNAL with increasing interest, for it furnishes a weekly treat of dainties, fresh, rich and rare.

Mrs. Rastall's recent article entitled, "Our Arsenal," brought to mind the events of 1812, when the arsenals of these two countries were equipped against each other, and the boys in blue met the red coats in deadly conflict. How changed the scene: The armies now being drilled are international, their banner bearing the inscription, "For God and Home and Native Land," and most remarkable of all, every gun is "manned" by a woman! To the invalid who, like myself, is "shut in" from the activities of life, it is most encouraging to hear how successfully the war is being carried on. The article, too, on Jennie Casseday, in a late issue, was to me especially delightful.

The information you impart that Mrs. Emma C. Wheeler, corresponding secretary of Michigan, is about to make her home in Paris, Canada, will be most gratefully received by the white-ribboners of Ontario.

Toronto is again blessed with a staunch temperance man as mayor, who is as much at home presiding at a temperance meeting as he is at a city council. He prides himself on being called the workingman's candidate, and manifested his good sense by discarding the full dress buffoonery, by some considered indispensable to inauguration day. He is prosecuting a vigorous campaign against unnecessary expenditure in the administration of city affairs; he is one of the few brave men who in official position

"Dare to be a Daniel,
Dare to stand alone,
Dare to have a purpose true,
Dare to make it known."

Another item which I am sure will be of interest to our sisters across the line is that the recently elected lady trustees of our schools are filling well the positions assigned them. Gentlemen members of the board evidently appreciate the new element infused in their councils, and treat them with the respect and courtesy which is their due. The ladies chosen to inaugurate this new system could not have been more wisely selected; exemplary as daughters, wives and mothers; faithful, devoted church and Sabbath-school workers, and last, though not least, noted for seeing "well to the ways of their own households." One of them, a practicing physician of the city, is well posted in sanitary matters. Already their benign influence is telling upon the school affairs of our city. These lady trustees are visiting the school buildings and ferreting out everything prejudicial to the health and comfort of the applicants. Young lady teachers, who have long suffered from grievances which they hesitated to mention to the gentlemen trustees, now find warm sympathizers in these lady guardians of the school, and the evils referred to are promptly remedied. Defective sewerage has been made a special subject of this crusade.

Each one of these women wears the white ribbon and is true to her W. C. T. U. principles. They have a womanly way of introducing any new measure which insures the championship of the majority of their colleagues. They are bound to have the subject of scientific temperance more thoroughly introduced into the schools. The next municipal elections will doubtless add to the number of lady trustees, and we will realize the truth of the declaration that the star of hope of the temperance reform is resting over the school-house.

Queen Victoria has recently bestowed on Lady McDonald the title of Viscountess of Earns Cliff. As is well known to your readers, the widow of the late Premier of Canada is a total abstainer, and is now devoting herself to the welfare of her only child, an invalid daughter.

As I have gazed in former days on the noble monuments which Canada has reared to our noble brave, my heart has saddened at the thought of how many equally noble have fallen ignominiously, not by shot and shell, but pierced by legalized liquor bullets of our own country. May God hasten the day when the statute book of every country shall pronounce liquor selling the gigantic crime of crimes.

CHILE'S CHEERING REPORT.

Of the temperance cause at large in Chile, and in Concepcion particularly, I can give an encouraging report. We have had little to do with this, but our hearts rejoice in what is done. The last president, Don Joije Montt, has taken quite an advanced position in this matter. He has lately recommended to Congress the passage of laws which forbid all Sunday opening of saloons and which demand that in cities saloons be closed at nine o'clock at night and in country places at sundown; that a person found on the street intoxicated shall be taken to the jail; and that a man who sells to a person who thereby becomes intoxicated shall be prohibited further license. We are anxiously waiting to see if this law is ratified and then if it is enforced.

Here in this city there is now much said in the papers where a few years ago we never saw a word. We—the Concepcion Temperance Society—through Mr. Arms and Mr. Currier, who has done most of the work in translating, have continued to furnish weekly items to the daily paper. We are seriously considering now asking for space in another city daily which has a wider circulation. The only difficulty is our possible inability to do our part in the work. I have, indeed, been surprised at the strong words they have allowed us to use concerning the drink which in this country, in many respects, is more common than water.

Our parlor meetings and monthly prayer meetings continue as usual. The attendance is not so large as in former years, but we lose none of those who are really interested in the subject. I know that the reason of our decreased numbers lies in the fact of my utter inability, this year, to do personal work. Heretofore I have called every month, usually the week preceding the meeting, have given invitations and solicited literary contributions. With the same effort again I think we should see the same result. These temperance gatherings have been a great aid to us in our church work and I sometimes wonder why my hands are so filled with nearer duties as to exclude this other work I so much enjoy. It is all right, I feel sure. God will free me for the work when my efforts are needed. I am not at all well this year.

I think the report of our organization at Santiago, one year ago last January, could never have reached you. Reports were sent by the secretary and treasurer soon after, but no reply has ever been received. It was in the opening days of our war, mails were sometimes inspected and often delayed, and I hardly think the communications ever left the country; but from that society there has lately come to me the sum of eight dollars. With this it was voted at the time to procure THE UNION SIGNAL for each mission point represented in the society.

I have been expecting some word from Mrs. Leavitt concerning her work on the east coast. We only know that she has come and gone. We fondly hope she may come to us this year in December. I think something may be accomplished through her coming as the country seems already "waking up." God's presence and peace are in my heart and I find it blessed here in Chile to live with Him. May He prosper the efforts of all the dear laborers in other lands.

CHINA'S HARVEST FIELDS.

My heart is in your work, my heart is in all work that seeks to save the lost. A letter from Miss Willard finds me, not on the coast at Ningpo, but eighteen hundred miles inland up the Yang tse Kiang, a journey which required seventy days by steamer and native boat, and I am now within a few stages of the very borders of Thibet.

I thought the Chinese on the coast were bad enough as regards drink and opium, but they are exceedingly temperate compared to the inhabitants of this extreme west. There is a saying that in Szchuan province "eleven people out of every ten" drink liquor and smoke opium. To begin with tobacco, men, women and children smoke. Not long ago when in a native family I saw a boy and girl, not over twelve years old, deliberately take a pipe, fill it with a pinch or two of the weed, take a paper lighter to light the tobacco and draw three or four puffs just as coolly and as matter-of-fact as if accustomed to smoking for fifty years.

Young women with babes at the breast smoke while nursing. The vice of using opium too, is alarmingly prevalent amongst the women as well as the men. The opium is of home production and cheap. It makes one's heart ache to see the slavery into which their perverted appetites have brought them, led on by poverty and wretchedness.

Only two days ago I stepped into a temple where crowds of women had been celebrating the birthday of the "Goddess of Mercy," and there I saw a woman a good deal the worse for drink. Just imagine a people, especially the women, slaves to tobacco, opium and drink, and add to this degradation superstition dense as Egyptian darkness, and idolatry. Is it not enough to make one despair that the most one can possibly do is less than the smallest drop in the ocean, and that while this utmost is being done, thousands around you are passing away without hope of future life. Surely we can but do our utmost, and stay our faith upon the Eternal God who girdeth us with strength.

This is a pioneer work opened only three years ago. Thank God, many missionaries have entered this vast field in the last few years. I cannot see that I can do anything, especially in the reform work, at present; all I can do is to preach the gospel to the women and girls who come within my reach. The people are as yet afraid of us; we have not access to their homes. Like the beginnings of many another work it is one step at a time as the Lord opens the doors.

I pray the Lord to bless you in all your work, to fill you mightily with His Holy Spirit and make this centennial year the fountain from which shall flow streams of blessings to all lands.

EMMA INVEEN,

FROM "INDIA'S CORAL STRAND."

Our Lucknow W. C. T. U. is anxious to start a circulating library for the numerous poor Evasian families in Lucknow who are almost entirely without uplifting influences in their homes. We would be very grateful for the donation of helpful books on temperance or other subjects from any of the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL. A few days ago, while traveling in the Himalayas we stopped at a dâk bungalow, a government rest house. As we looked around the bare walls, my companion remarked, "If we were in America the W. C. T. U. ladies would have had pretty, helpful texts upon the walls." I am not sure that I could get permission to have them hung in these places, but if I had the mottoes, I should like to try. Many English people, high in government employ, stop in these bungalows during a year, and it is they who form one of the greatest obstacles to temperance progress here. Temperance sentiment is very weak in India, and we are so busy with our mission work that we have little time and energy left for the special lines of W. C. T. U. work. Pray for us that we may realize that it is "not by might nor by power" of our own that our efforts are to be successful.

THE TOKIO TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

Tokio Temperance Society is truly doing the work always. It is composed of men, and has regular monthly meetings and branch meetings, so we have each Saturday evening, the temperance meeting in a different part of Tokio. Last Tuesday evening we had magic lantern, illustrating temperance power—both sides, temperance and drunkenness. We have 120 pictures for the lantern. I do not care for it very much, but when we use it the children come to the meeting more than the room can hold them. To-morrow evening will be the monthly meeting, and we have lectures. We have hundreds of good audience in every meeting, but women are very few among them. I am largely working in the Tokio Temperance Society and do not force the ladies' work. In general the work is doing well; young men are taking interest in this work; the movement is little contrary to the workers in the United States. The young men are working everywhere throughout the country. We thank you for all blessings come upon our people.

WORLD'S W. C. T. U. MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

Nothing so hinders the coming of Christ's kingdom as the traffic in strong drink. As we listen to the eloquent appeals coming from foreign fields for its suppression, and realize the fact that one hundred and fifty times as much as is usually paid to the clergymen of the United States, and one hundred and eighty times as much as is paid every year by the whole world for the cause of missions is annually expended to support the liquor traffic, our souls are deeply stirred and we are resolved to put forth Herculean efforts for its overthrow.

The heathen emperor of China puts us to shame when he says, "It is true I cannot prevent the introduction of flowing poison. Gain-seeking and corrupt men will, for profit and sensuality, defeat my wishes; but they cannot induce me to derive a revenue from the vice and misery of my people."

The World's W. C. T. U. greatly desires to send out, this year, a missionary to South Africa and one to China, in addition to the one who is under appointment to Japan and the provision for those already in the field. The blessed work accomplished by our pioneer missionaries gives us a glimpse of the glorious possibilities, the grand achievements that await us if we will only enter the "great and effectual door" now opened to us.

The cry wafted by the ocean billows is coming across the seas from every direction, "Come over and help us!" and from many a consecrated heart we hear the answering cry, "Here am I—send me!" We want to send them, realizing the great need. Who will help us by supporting one of our missionaries? We expect to hear many responses, "Here am I!"

THE WORLD'S PETITION IN THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

I send you in another envelope another installment of the Petition—103 names of natives, obtained on the island of Kanai. The numbers are small, but a small bit means much work in their scattered hamlets. The 400 names we have already sent represented one in 100 of our native population. The numerous Chinese, Portuguese and Japanese plantation laborers are of course not to be considered in the estimate. We could obtain many more if it were possible to reach the people and we probably shall before the list is closed.

WORLD'S WAVE CRESTS.

Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew and Dr. Kate Bushnell are in Australia, where they expect to remain for several months.

Miss Jessie Ackerman has gone to West Australia, where they have scarcely so much as heard of our work, hoping to organize unions.

The World's W. C. T. U. Day is to be celebrated September 22, which is the birthday of Mary Clement Leavitt, our dauntless first round-the-world missionary. The collections taken upon this day are to be applied to the fund for sending out temperance missionaries, who will carry our white-ribbon gospel into foreign fields.

The following corrections to the report of the first W. C. T. U. convention are made by request of Mrs. Hannah Chewings, World's W. C. T. U. secretary for Australasia: To the list of vice-presidents should be added the name of Mrs. Bowes, Colonial president for New South Wales, which was organized as a Colonial union in 1890. Mrs. Webb, of Bathurst, New South Wales, was elected to the office of treasurer at the Australasian convention held at Melbourne in 1891, not Mrs. Nicholls as erroneously printed. To the signatures to the letter of greeting sent by South Australia to Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt, should be added: Life vice-president, Mrs. O. Lake; Mrs. Henderson, recording secretary, and the following Colonial superintendents of departments: Mrs. Lyall, of drawing rooms, Mrs. Whiting, of mothers' meetings, Mrs. Roberts, of Sabbath-school work, and Mrs. Hannah Chewings, of social purity. Twenty-four departments instead of ten are actively at work.

Miss Mary Allen West will receive a cordial and warm-hearted welcome in Japan. The Tokio W. C. T. U. is making special plans for her arrival. A leaflet announcing her coming and containing a sketch of her life and work is to be sent out by them to all parts of Japan.

"We are all very glad to welcome Miss West to our land and I will be ready to assist her in her work here when she comes. Some time ago we sent the message that we are trying to cast a Japanese bell with pipes of those who have given up smoking and we hope to send it to you before the Columbian Exposition closes. In that case will you please exhibit it as such in some place where people can see well and accept and use it at your office in the Temperance Temple after the Exhibition is over? If it will encourage your people to observe temperance in this regard also, we shall feel our endeavors well paid. All Christian people here are in hearty support to make this bell and it has helped them much." Thus happily writes S. Tsuda, editor of The Agriculturist and member of the Tokio Temperance Society, Japan.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD

GEORGIA.

FAITHFUL WORKERS.

Any lover of nature knows that sweetest and rarest flowers are often found in the deepest wildwood, or in the most unexpected places. It is so in our work. The cities are doing nobly in their hand to-hand conflict with saloon influence, apathetic and worldly church-members and a press friendly to questionable amusements. But the little towns and country places have their discouragements and hindrances too, and it is inspiring to note the zeal and faithfulness of their workers; such is exemplified by Mrs. S. H. Sibley, of Union Point, who from year to year keeps up the L. T. L. of that town; who sustains and strengthens the colored society there; and who does the temperance work nearest at hand by procuring individual signers to the pledge.

At Conyers too, we find in the W. C. T. U. a work which though small does a wondrous amount of good. In a recent letter from the president, Mrs. Kate M. Hardwick, is the following: "Katie (the eldest daughter, seven years old) opens the church and rings the bell for us every Tuesday afternoon." Speaking of the L. T. L., she says: "I sent for a dozen of Mrs. Willard's catechisms. They are splendid. You could not recommend them too highly, especially for advanced classes. We are getting up a club for The Young Crusader. . . . We have a colored union here which is doing finely. They had fifty members some time ago. They take several copies of The Young Crusader, and their president takes THE UNION SIGNAL. They are getting up an entertainment. . . . Brother Dillard (the Methodist pastor) furnishes two papers with temperance items."

The good work at Haddock, including parents and children, still goes on. The most influential people on the neighboring farms and plantations lend their aid. Prominent among these are Doctor and Mrs. J. Hardeman, who stand by Mrs. L. E. Farris, the president, in her excellent work. So highly do the executive committee appreciate the intelligent Christian methods of Mrs. Farris, that she has been appointed to the state superintendency of evangelistic work.

The juvenile work throughout the state was never so hopeful. New unions at once organize L. T. L's and in some localities where a W. C. T. U. cannot be kept up, a juvenile society has been carried on with marked success. This is notably the case in Americus, a large and flourishing town in the southwestern part of the state. That "elect lady," Mrs. C. W. Hancock, and a faithful few, have long prayed and worked, organized and re-organized. Turning their attention to the children, that hopeful work under the leadership of Mrs. M. E. Raines is bringing forth fruit. She writes: "I feel that God is blessing my efforts. I use the helps that are sent out by the W. C. T. U., the lesson manuals, the Marching Songs, etc. I have had three entertainments, including one contest for Demorest medal. With the help of Mrs. Brunner we had an entertainment in East Americus also, and are getting ready for another which will include a contest.

The Linden street mission Sunday-school in Atlanta, organized through the efforts of Mrs. E. M. Evans, of the W. C. T. U., has grown so that a church has been built and dedicated out there in an incredibly short time. At this mission, Mrs. Evans, assisted by Mrs. E. C. Witter, organized a few weeks ago a flourishing L. T. L.

A beautiful gold medal Demorest contest (Georgia's second), held a few weeks ago at DeGive's opera house in Atlanta under the auspices of the W. C. T. U., and the immediate leadership of Mrs. M. L. McLendon and Mrs. E. A. Sexton, assisted by Mrs. Cheshire of the Trinity Home Mission L. T. L. The gold medal was awarded to Miss Hattie Sexton, who, with remarkable ease and naturalness, recited "Dot Boy Fritz."

At the prohibition town of Demorest the L. T. L. numbers eighty-five members and does excellent work. Prominent among the new accessions present at our recent state convention, was Mrs. T. R. Kendall, president of the Athens W. C. T. U., and wife of Rev. T. R. Kendall, so well known in the North Georgia conference. Refined and womanly, she yet has strong convictions and a terse, business-like way of expressing them. The influence of Mrs. Kendall and her co-workers will be felt at Athens which is the seat of the state university. Then there was Mrs. A. M. Street, of the Summerville union, a young woman of burning zeal, originality and will power, who was appointed to a district presidency, and who went home and immediately began to organize in the bounds of her jurisdiction. Miss Julia B. Reed, of Eatonton, a talented teacher and elocutionist, proved her interest by organizing a union in her town, soon after her return from "the gathering of the clans."

The long agony at Augusta is over, and the anti-prohibition vote polled exceeded the prohibition by over one thousand majority. But the faithful workers have the satisfaction of knowing that they have done their duty in the contest. It goes without saying, that Mrs. W. C. Sibley did all that lay in her power, by word and pen and effort, not shrinking from the crucial test of encouraging the voters at the polls by the presence of herself and her white-ribboned sisters. Rev. W. W. Wadsworth never quailed beneath the oft-repeated and multiform attacks of the enemy. Be comforted, brave and true hearts, your labor has not been in vain.

The old reliable Savannah union is to be congratulated by us all upon having a habitation of its own, a head quarters at 114 Broughton street, where they celebrated their eleventh anniversary. Here they have a free kindergarten, an industrial school, free lodging rooms for men and boys out of employment, and a free reading room. Here, also, are held, three times per week, gospel temperance meetings, and on Sabbath afternoons a Bible class of men and boys is taught, and a class of Chinese pupils. In nine months 1,378 lodgings were given, 745 meals furnished, and employment found for 97 men and boys. Sometimes sailors come into the meetings, sign the pledge, and hearing of the Saviour are helped to a better life. Mrs. Richard Webb, the president, has been at Waynesville attending the school of methods.

OREGON.

CONVENTION ECHOES.

I must begin my report by a postscript to my last letter, the account of our state convention, for not being present myself, my gleanings were not very full at first. The corresponding secretary counted up 110 unions, with a membership of 2,700; of these thirty two were organized during the year. Part of our grand showing at the National Convention was due to work in our preceding year. We carried off the National banner from there for the largest increase of membership.

This banner was presented by the hand of Mrs. Smith-French with kind words from the heart to Polk county, the banner county of L. T. L's. This is a fitting compensation for the pioneering labor among the children done by Mrs. Lucy Whittaker (the present Polk county president) and to the efficient work of Mrs. Ada Unruh. The state banner was presented by the same hand and heart to Yamhill county.

Three new departments were created that Oregon might be in line with the National W. C. T. U.: Physical culture, with Miss N. Stella Ames for superintendent: work among miners and logging camps, Mrs. Belle S. Kennedy; neglected children, Mrs. M. E. Hoxter. An interesting point at the convention was the unusual number of honorary members present. They were never permitted to leave without the badge, for the white ribbon was promptly tied in their buttonholes. Another, that the ministers of the city showed that they, too, were participating in "our peaceful war." From a distance was the Rev. Mr. Cole, late of New Orleans, where his wife has been treasurer for many years.

Another touching moment of interest was when Mrs. Townsend, mother of Mrs. Raley, the local president, and who is in her eighty-ninth year, was introduced and received the Chautauqua salute. She addressed the convention in a few words, giving a beautiful testimony to the goodness of God, and adding her blessing to the work and the workers. Some intrepid country delegates were present, among them Mrs. Bessie Gross, who with a young baby in her arms, had ridden twenty miles through the heat and alkali dust of eastern Oregon, in order to learn better how to carry on the warfare in her own union.

Many topics called forth much enthusiasm. Such as "Purity in Literature and Art." The National superintendent of this department had been in Portland, Oregon, attending the Presbyterian Assembly, and sent a greeting and an exhortation to the convention. Franchise was discussed heartily and earnestly. Our home charity, "The Refuge Home," was warmly commended to the sympathy and help of local unions. The report showed that one hundred and eight inmates had been cared for since last October, a good number of whom had been restored to a respectable place in society. The house is small and a new building is urgently needed to carry on the work efficiently.

The Children's Banner county has lately had a second L. T. L. picnic, when about two hundred marched with music to the beautiful grove near Rickreall. Mrs. Ada Unruh took this opportunity for organizing the county with Willie Theilsen for president. The wild rose is to be Oregon's state flower and the motto, "Like an army with banners."

The two unions, Mount Tabor and Mount Tabor Villa, have raised a fund of two hundred dollars for prosecuting the violation of the license laws. One man has been arrested, and after paying a partial fine and repeating the illegal act, has been arrested a second time.

Mrs. Delle C. H. Cox, National organizer, has been making a lecturing trip in Washington, speaking at Athena, Weston and Milton in our state on her way, with her usual success.

Weston and LaGrande have lately held Demorest medal contests. The prizes were won by Miss Cleo Beeler and Pearl Pennington.

IDAHO ITEMS.

"Then came the jolly summer being dight
In a thin silken cassock colored green,
That was unlined, all to be more light,
And on his head a garland well beseem."

The second annual convention of the Ada county W. C. T. U. was held at Star in the Christian church, July 13 and 14. The convention was called to order by the president, Mrs. Mary Danskin, of Boise City. Mrs. Mitchell, president of the Star union, gave the address of welcome, responded to by Mrs. Stevenson of Boise City. Then came the Demorest medal contest in which six bright young people took part; the medal was won by Miss Nellie Everetts, a second prize being awarded (a book) to Miss Maude Mitchell.

Thursday morning the convention met at ten o'clock. Devotional exercises were conducted by Mrs. Warner, of Fayette. The chairman of the committee on credentials reported twenty-five delegates present, the six county unions being represented. Mother Mitchell read a very interesting and practical paper on "Scientific Temperance Instruction." This was followed by the address of the county president which was listened to attentively; she reported progress during the past year. A parliamentary drill and discussion of the question, "What constitutes a membership in the W. C. T. U.," occupied the remaining part of the morning. At noon the ladies of Star furnished a bountiful lunch in which all participated.

The afternoon meeting was principally devoted to reading of reports of local unions, and of the superintendents of departments. Star union still leads in activity and usefulness. A mothers' meeting, conducted by Mrs. Stevenson, of Boise City, was enjoyed by all. A resolution was adopted that each union begin work at once to have a Sabbath law enacted by our next legislature. After singing "Blest be the tie that binds," and benediction by Rev. Morris, the convention adjourned. The same evening a company of ladies and gentlemen met at the parsonage of the Central Park M. E. church, and a very promising union was organized.

The W. C. T. U. of Idaho has been bereft of one of its best workers in the death of Mrs. Louisa Walker, of Kendrick. She was the efficient and devoted president of the district of Northern Idaho. So confident we felt that the work would still be benefited by her earnest and thorough leadership, but she has been called to a higher place, and we are sad and wonder how her place will be filled. She has gone up higher, to be with the Saviour whose service she loved so well.

The sixth annual convention of Idaho will be held at Idaho Falls, October 21, 22, 23 and 24.

On the 19th of July the ladies of the Shoshone W. C. T. U. gave a lawn social at the residence of Colonel Senter. The beautiful lawn was illuminated for the occasion with Chinese and Japanese lanterns, head-lights, etc., the effect being very beautiful. There was a fine string band upon the grounds, and the skilled musicians played their beautiful strains until a late hour. Refreshments were served; the receipts for the evening were $26.

A Demorest contest was held at Nampa, under the management of Mrs. Black, in June. Six young ladies took part. Allie Huff, the youngest contestant, received the medal.

DELAWARE.

A THREE MONTHS' REVIEW.

Our three county conventions were very helpful ones to the state W. C. T. U. First came the Sussex county gathering held in historic Lewes, hopefully called "the future metropolis of Delaware," by Mrs. A. T. MacSorley, president of the local union, in her address of welcome. Next the W. C. T. U. of Kent county convened in Frederica, with the disadvantage of a stage ride through inclement weather. The cordial greeting, however, at the end of the journey, and the pleasant time together compensated us for the difficulties encountered. New Castle's convocation, held in Newport, the town of willing hearts and hands, completed the trio.

The M. E. churches kindly opened to us in each town, were each prettily decorated with blooming plants and banners, the W. C. T. U. of Sussex county displaying for the first time a lovely banner embroidered with water lilies and golden-rods. Speaking of these indispensables, the Clayton union was awarded the county banner (Kent) for the largest increase of membership during the year. The pastors of the three churches, the Rev. F. MacSorley, Rev. S. R. Maxwell, Rev. A. S. Mowbray were most cordial and helpful in their words of greeting. The Rev. Mr. Wickline, of the Nassau M. E. church, and the Rev. Dr. Lafferty, of the Lewes Presbyterian church, spoke encouraging words. The Rev. E. D. Greene and the Rev. T. E. Martindale bade us "Godspeed" at Newport. Another gentleman of Newport, J. W. H. Watson, husband of our efficient county treasurer, also spoke, emphasizing the mission of the W. C. T. U. in bringing to pass, with other high ideals, the universal sisterhood of woman.

The absence from the Sussex county convention of "Mother Jefferson," as she is sometimes called, was much regretted, it being the first time her voice had not been heard in "council" since the organization of the county union when she was elected president, having faithfully filled the office throughout the succeeding years. Mrs. Jefferson's affectionate interest in the work and workers was expressed in her excellent annual address read by Mrs. Hattie H. Phelps, state treasurer. Owing to failing health she could not again accept reëlection. We were fortunate in having our state president, Miss Margaret S. Hilles, present the first day of the convention. The election of officers was held in the afternoon, and resulted in the re election of the tried secretary and treasurer of the past, Mrs. R. H. Tunnell and Mrs. Rebecca Prettyman, with Mrs. Jennie Creamer, of Milton, to guide the county helm from the presidential chair.

The state superintendents of narcotics and suffrage, respectively, Mrs. L. H. Moore and Mrs. Martha Cranston, sent earnest papers upon the work of their departments to the Kent and Sussex conventions, the latter having also made a statement at the New Castle county convention concerning the board of superintendents of which she is president. The other state superintendents, participating either by voice or letter in the conventions, were Miss Bessie Mills of the Y's, who sent a letter in the interest of her work to the Kent meeting; Mrs. W. B. Smithers making in the same manner a touching plea for her special care, the prisoners of our jails; Mrs. Roberta Matlash of the evangelistic department who gave an uplifting Bible exposition at Kent and New Castle; Mrs. E. D. Slaymaker who urged the importance of scientific temperance instruction at Frederica, and the writer who said a few words of her department, the press, at the Sussex county convention.

The county superintendents of scientific temperance instruction, Mrs. E. T. Patten and Miss Jennie McIntosh, of Sussex and Kent, read well written papers upon the work of the department. Attention was further called at Frederica to the hopeful work for plastic childhood by Mrs. Marguerite Greene, county superintendent of the juvenile department. The reports from local unions at the three meetings were quite interesting, as were also the brief speeches of presidents giving the condition of their own fields. In the national outlook the great Boston convention was not forgotten, Mrs. Tillie R. Sudler entertaining the friends at Lewes with her impressions of it, and Mrs. V. L. Hulbertson and Mrs. Kate E. Smithe interspersing their annual greetings with words of practical wisdom and notes of the wonderful W. C. T. U. event. Good thoughts shone too in the bright welcoming of Miss Mollie Caldwell at Frederica, the response of Miss Annie Vandeveer, and the brief yet pointed response of Mrs. Maggie L. Grier, at Lewes. To our disappointment the president of the Newport union, Mrs. Mary Greene, was unable to attend the convention, but sent a cordial welcome address which was read by Mrs. Martha Watson, Mrs. Annie Maloney appropriately responding for the delegates.

An instructive feature of the New Castle meeting was "One Method of Bible Study," given with blackboard illustrations by Miss Mary H. Mather, who also spoke with characteristic brightness of the floral ministry and the picture mission. The aggressiveness of the Wilmington Y, of which Miss Mather is an active member, was shown in the verbal report of the president, Miss Josie Fogg. The account of the adoption of the Evanston plan of giving earned money as a special offering, read by the corresponding secretary, Mrs. H. Berlin, afforded much amusement.

The New Castle convention learned also of Mrs. E. H. Whiteley's somewhat original plan of conducting mothers' meetings, of which I hope ere long to write the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL, and of Mrs. Lafayette Marks' excellent ideas of systematic giving. The public evening meetings in the three localities were largely attended having, with the other attractions, good music. A delightful part of the program at Frederica was the singing of two of Miss Anna Gordon's marching songs by the L. T. L's of the town.

Our New York sister, Mrs. Bullock, gave an earnest address at each evening meeting, and during her itinerary in the state organized three unions, two being Y's, gaining 132 members, fifty-one of whom were honoraries. She gave seventeen evening addresses, and thirteen extra talks. Two other honored National workers have visited us since my last letter, Miss Jennie Smith having spent a Sabbath in Wilmington in the interest of railroad men, and Mrs. Helen G. Rice having spoken in several towns, one of which, Odessa, is now reaping the result of her visit in a newly organized L. T. L. of thirty-five members. In the way of entertainments, the Middletown and Smyrna L. T. L's have given successful Demorest medal contests; the Y's of Milton have held a pleasant parlor meeting; and the young ladies of Camden have replenished their treasury by the "Milkmaids' Convention." Two notable gatherings were held in May, the Prohibition convention in Smyrna, and the Y conference in Newark. Mrs. Barnes and Miss Willia Francis were the speakers from abroad, our own "Peach Blossoms" using the time in the formation of lovely and fragrant plans for others. June's beautiful smiles up and down the state kissed the roses and flowerets into bloom for the mission of our gentle-hearted Jennie Casseday. The three jails, two almshouses, Wilmington hospitals, Ferris reform school (composed of forty boys), the sick and bereaved of Milton and Smyrna were remembered on flower mission day, as both she and our state superintendent, Miss Mather, had desired. We are indeed glad that this ministry of our beloved sisterhood comforts the sorrowing and throws out "the life-line to somebody's brother drifting away."

State Reporter, Smyrna.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

THE state president and secretary of Illinois are busy with preparations for the state convention to be held at Danville, October 4–7. A meeting of unusual interest is anticipated.

A DISTRICT president and pioneer in the W. C. T. U. work in Idaho has recently been removed by death, Mrs. Lou Walker, of Kendrick, whose name is a hallowed remembrance to friends and relatives.

MRS. ANNA M. PALMER, Iowa's evangelist, writes: "I am out for all I am worth to swell the number of votes for prohibition in Iowa, injecting the gospel into politics. Political sinners need looking after. I thank God for the revival upon us. Miss Anna Miller, my niece, is to travel with me as gospel singer."

MRS. MARY E. TEATS, of Las Vegas, New Mexico, a worker of large experience among jails and prisons, and a very interesting and forcible speaker, has recently spent a month in Nebraska, where she added one hundred and sixty-four members to the unions and is assured of a warm welcome on her return.

A LEADER in temperance and missionary work, and an old friend of THE UNION SIGNAL, was Mrs. A. C. Brown, of Canon City, Col., who passed away May 20, at her home, Fairview Terrace. Her talents, which were many, were used without stint in the service of her Master. "The memory of the just is blessed."

MISS ARMA LINDAHL is the only W. C. T. U. missionary that meets all the ships at Ellis Island. She hands to each incoming emigrant a tract, and is especially at home among the Polish, Bohemians, Hollanders and Italians. Clothing for little children sent to her at Ellis Island, New York, would be of great service.

A MONTH ago a Russian Memnonite banker of Manitoba sent to Mrs. Grubb a thousand addresses of his countrymen to whom he desired copies of "Friendly Talks" in their own language sent. As a result of the sentiment thus created the community voted by a large majority for prohibition at the recent election.

MRS. SARAH M. PERKINS, who is widely known as a lecturer and W. C. T. U. worker, has adopted a plan of giving Monday lectures this summer, thereby securing funds for the prosecution of her work as Ohio superintendent of infirmary and insane asylums. The success of these parlor lectures on interesting topics, recommends the plan to white ribbon workers.

MISS MARY C. GREGORY, Illinois corresponding secretary pro tem, has recently organized two promising unions in South Chicago and West Englewood. Miss Gregory will respond to calls to organize unions within reach of her office work. She will talk up the work on Sunday afternoon or evening and organize on Monday forenoon. No charges except carfare and entertainment.

NEARLY every county in Maine was represented at the most successful school of methods held at Old Orchard Beach, August 2-6. Representatives from other states were also there to enjoy the feast, as well as prominent Canadian workers led by Mrs. Ella Williams, World's W. C. T. U. treasurer and Dominion president. Mrs. Mary Livermore, Mrs. Barney, and Rev. Mr. Hastings were the principal auditorium speakers, the school being in charge of Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, president Maine W. C. T. U.

MAJ. J. L. PALMER, of Little Rock, Arkansas, was one of the purest, truest men that the temperance reform and the Prohibition party has counted among its treasures. He was so modest and unobtrusive that his full value was not understood except by those who knew him best. It is proposed to place a memorial of this loyal and brotherly soul in the city of Little Rock, where his active life was largely spent, which is to take the form of a fountain named for him, and helpful to all thirsty creatures that may pass its pleasant shadow. Those who are willing to give will please send to Miss I. C. DeVelling, Little Rock, Arkansas, who is one of our well known white ribbon workers.

THE union of unions of Detroit, Mich., has been granted free space for a literature booth. The young women's work will be given special prominence under the direction of the state superintendent, Mrs. Lillian Hollister. The L. T. L. department under the care of Mrs. Emma Greene, state superintendent, will have a corner in which to display their banners, literature, autograph pledge cards and explain its object. Mrs. A. A. Boutell, franchise superintendent for the city, will have a space for her work. If any National or state department superintendent, desiring to educate the people on her line of work, will send us literature in care of Mrs. Lillian Hollister, it will be wisely distributed. The attendance is notable from the fact that people from Canada and all parts of the United States come to this exposition at Detroit. The date is from August 23 to September 2. Those who send literature are urged to immediately respond.

Official Communications.

WORK AMONG MINERS.

Printed blanks for reports of work among miners have been sent out to all state superintendents who have reported to me. If any one has not received the same, please write to me at once. If any state superintendent has not reported herself to me please do so at once that I may furnish her with helps and instruction for state work. Several states are to hold their annual meetings during August and September. Will they not present the claims of this department? Every state and territory in the Union, except Florida, Louisiana and Oklahoma have some kind of mines; and there are in the United States nearly six hundred and forty thousand miners.

This is certainly an important department and has some claim to your consideration. Let each state superintendent be prompt with her report.

MRS. W. F. ENGLISH,
National Superintendent, Quincy, Ill.

THE EVANGELISTIC DEPARTMENT.

This department has recently issued, through its superintendent, a third circular, consisting of twenty-one most searching questions, and opening with the following appeal to superintendents of evangelistic work:

"The time has again come for gathering the results of our year's work. As superintendent of the evangelistic department in the World's and National W. C. T. U., I am anxious to secure this year a very reliable and thorough report of the spiritual condition, work and progress of our unions,—to ascertain how many state and county conventions have daily observed the devotional hour from 11 to 12 a. m.; how many evangelistic meetings of all kinds have been held in each state; how many pages of temperance literature have been distributed and whether the year has been one of deepening spiritual life and increased outward activity. This cannot be accomplished without your earnest coöperation. Will each state superintendent secure answers to the questions from every local union and send the summary only to the National superintendent? Will she also add a brief letter giving her own outlook over her state and a report of her personal work during the year?"

Already reports have been received from ten nations, expressing the profound conviction that this is the foundation of our work, and warm thanks for the spiritual and practical impulse received from our circular for 1892. Shall we not in our own nation gather such full reports of our evangelistic work for the year, as to inspire to renewed consecration and effort those in other lands who look to us for guidance?

ELIZABETH W. GREENWOOD,
Evangelistic Supt. World's and Nat. W. C. T. U.

CONCERNING ACCOMMODATIONS FOR VISITORS ATTENDING THE NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION.

Hotels and hotel rates for visitors coming to attend the National W. C. T. U. Convention, and for delegates preferring hotels, are being secured by the committee having the matter in charge.

One noticeable feature of Denver is the large number of family hotels or first-class boarding houses, not devoted to the transient trade. These have been taken into consideration as well as the regular hotels within a convenient distance of Trinity M. E. Church, in which the Convention is to be held, and convenient, also, to rapid transit by cable and electric lines.

Brown's Palace, very close to the church, will furnish entertainment at $3 and $4 per day according to location of rooms. This includes meals, as the hotel is conducted on the American plan.

The Palace, just completed and furnished, is probably the finest west of Chicago, and superbly located. These rates are given upon the contingency of securing not less than fifty guests.

The Albany, corner of 17th and Stout, offers most reasonable rates, considering the excellence of the hotel, its advantageous location and admirable management. Room and meals, $3 per day, two persons occupying a room, $5 per day. The Albany is a favorite place for conventions. The use of the club rooms will be donated to the executive and delegates, if the Albany is chosen as headquarters. Its distance from the church is about four blocks, and the managers are noted for their attention to the comfort of guests.

The Gilsey, 18th and Stout, will furnish rooms by the week, price $4 to $6, two occupying a room will pay nothing extra. Meals, short order. The proprietress is willing to do everything possible for the guests.

The Albert, 17th, between Glenarm and Welton, and distant three blocks from the church, offers pleasant and newly furnished rooms for $1, $1.25 and $1.50 per day. An attractive café gives meals at $1 per day; no bar.

St. James Hotel, Curtis, between 15th and 16th, makes reasonable rates. Cars pass the door.

Broadway Hotel: Rooms and board, $3 per day; two occupying the same room, $2.50 each; very convenient to the church; no bar.

The Ramona, 14th Avenue and South 14th.

L'Imperial, Court Place and 14th, and other family hotels conveniently located, will make reasonable rates, conditional upon having rooms to spare.

The Woman's Christian Association furnishes rooms and board at exceedingly moderate prices.

The Woman's Exchange—auxiliary to the W. C. T. U.—is conveniently located, furnishes meals on the short order system, and is convenient to many places where rooms can be secured.

A bureau of information will be established later. Meanwhile, it is desirable that the committee should know as certainly as possible the number of delegates and visitors to be expected, that arrangements can be made more definitely. For the present, all parties desiring information on this matter can address

MRS. FRANCES BELFORD,

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

SOUTH DAKOTA STATE CONVENTION.

The fourth annual convention of the South Dakota W. C. T. U. will be held at Brookings, commencing the evening of September 9 and continuing the 10th, 11th and 12th. The delegates will be composed of the executive committee, superintendents, county presidents, presidents of local unions, one delegate-at-large, and one for every twenty paying members. EMMA A. CRAMNER, Pres.
EMMA P. MYERS, Cor. Sec.

To Illinois White-Ribboners:

DEAR COMRADES:—The list of questions pertaining to the corresponding secretary's state report is now ready, and a copy will soon reach the secretary of each local union. Please do not allow the report of the corresponding secretary to be meager on account of your failure to respond promptly. Nothing will be incorporated in the state report that does not reach us by September 20.

Permit me to remind you that there are yet hundreds of copies of the address given by our president and secretary at Monmouth that should be distributed. Any number from fifty to one hundred or more may be had simply for express charges. Is each officer in your union equipped with a state report? If not she should be. These may be had on the same terms as the address.

Reduced rates on all the railroads of Illinois have been procured for the state convention at Danville. Full instructions will be given in season. Faithfully yours,

MARY C. GREGORY,
Chicago, Ill., August 11, 1892. Cor. Sec. pro tem.

CALL FOR WYOMING STATE CONVENTION.

The tenth annual convention of the W. C. T. U., of Wyoming, will meet in Laramie City, commencing Tuesday, Oct 25, 1892, at 2:30 p. m. The convention will close Wednesday, at 5 p. m., unless otherwise ordered, so that all delegates and visitors may attend the National Convention at Denver, commencing October 28, 1892. It is to be hoped that there will be a grand rally, both at the state and National Conventions. Rates on the railroad will probably be one fare and a third, or less for the round trip. This will undoubtedly be the best opportunity ever offered our state to see and hear the grandest women of the age. The annual state meeting will be composed of the general officers of the state union, superintendents of the state departments, presidents, and corresponding secretaries of local unions, and two elected delegates from each local union. The Y's will be given representation to the state annual on the same basis as the W. C. T. U. viz.: each union will be represented by president, corresponding secretary, and two elected delegates. The W. C. T. U. was born in prayer, and prayer is its hope. So let each one of us come with prayer in our hearts, then we shall receive the promised blessing. Signed

NEXT WEEK.

THE UNION SIGNAL next week will be devoted to and the life there, and the life that went out from there on August 7th last. The editorial page will be filled by Miss Willard's recollections of her mother, of telling interest. The orations delivered during the funeral services at Evanston will be reproduced, and many other interesting incidents connected therewith. There will be a fine illustrated supplement sheet, containing a picture of Madam Willard, her room, her home, a group consisting of Miss Willard, her mother, and Miss Gordon, their church, etc. This will be on fine stock, and suitable for framing.

It will be a valuable memorial, worthy of preservation.

Scatter it everywhere.

Price, single copy, 3 cents. Per 100, $1.50.

A CARD FROM AMANDA T. JONES.

Those who have invested money in my canning processes will receive abundant proof of their economic and commercial value, by addressing me at South Haven, Mich., where I have begun a work, in part for their benefit.

CHAUTAUQUA LAKE

can be reached in the most comfortable manner over the Erie Lines. This is the only route from the West which does not require a change of cars from Chicago. If you are thinking of visiting Chautauqua, write to F. W. Buskirk, A. G. P. A., Erie Lines, Chicago, Ill., for full information as to route, rates, etc.

DELAVAN LAKE.

Friday and Saturday of each week the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway sells excursion tickets to Delavan, Wis., and return for $2.65, good for return until Monday. Special Delavan Lake train leaves Union Depot every Friday and Saturday at 3 P. M.; additional trains, except Sunday, at 8:30 A. M. and 4:30 P. M. Delavan Lake is one of the most attractive resorts in Wisconsin, has plenty of good hotels, good fishing and boating, and is in every respect a delightful place to spend a short or long vacation. For further information apply at ticket office, 207 Clark Street.

Harvest Excursions—Half Rates.

August 30th and September 27th.

The Burlington Route will sell round trip tickets at half rates, good 20 days, to the cities and farming regions of the West, Northwest and Southwest. Eastern Ticket Agents will sell through tickets on the same plan. See that they read over the Burlington Route, the best line from Chicago, Peoria, Quincy and St. Louis. For further information write P. S. EUSTIS, General Passenger Agent, Chicago.

CALIFORNIA.

California is the most attractive and delightful section of the United States, if not of the world, and its many beautiful resorts will be crowded with the best families of the East during the entire winter. It offers to the investor the best open opportunity for safe and large returns from its fruit lands. It offers the kindest climate in the world to the feeble and debilitated, and it is reached in the most comfortable manner over the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad.

Pullman Vestibule Sleeping Cars leave Chicago by this line every day in the year, and go without change or transfer through to San Francisco, Los Angeles and San Diego. This is a feature not offered by any other line.

Write to John J. Byrne, 723 Monadnock Building, Chicago, Ill., if you desire any further information as to the country and the accommodations for reaching it.

THE GRAND CLOAK COMPANY.

The attention of our lady readers is especially called to the advertisement in this paper of the Grand Cloak Company, southwest corner State and Adams Sts., Chicago.

This concern is a new, large and enterprising establishment, devoted exclusively to Cloaks and Cloakings. It claims, and we presume justly, to be the largest exclusive Cloak House in the World. They issue a handsome catalogue and price list, which will be mailed free to any lady. It shows all the latest styles, and quotes very low prices. We advise our lady friends to send for it.

Publisher's Notes.

WHAT DO YOU THINK OF THIS?

The receipts of the Automatic Fountain placed by the Chicago Central W. C. T. U., at the Chicago post-office were $65.04 for the first week. It has been found necessary to place a second fountain at the west entrance to that building. Get a fountain!

NOW IS YOUR CHANCE.

The young people want a business education, and our business colleges are well patronized. Next to attendance in person, home instruction by mail is desirable. We have made arrangements with one of the best, Phillips' Business College, of Syracuse, N. Y., by which we are enabled to make the following advantageous offer:

The price of home instruction from this business college is $5 per month.

The price of THE UNION SIGNAL is $1 per year.

In return for five new subscribers, at $1 each, accompanied by the $5, received before October 1, we will send an order entitling you to one month's instruction from the Phillips Business College without extra charge.

Now is your chance. Waste no time, but secure five new names without delay, and send them with $5 to

AS OTHERS SEE US.

It is pleasant to have friends who are wise enough to speak words of encouragement when the impulse to do so is present. There is no fear of any one being flattered, as the praise has to be divided among the many in this bee-hive of industry, where the faithfulness of each one is needed for perfecting our work. As it is not to any one these words apply, but to many, and to some who are not in Chicago, it is a pleasure to reproduce a few of the kind words of appreciation sent to us by our friends. Read what they think and suggest:

The August Crusader just received. Better than ever.—State Superintendent L. T. L., Michigan.

I shall try to have every L. T. L. in the state observe Miss Willard's birthday, for it is a good start-off for the fall campaign.—State Superintendent L. T. L., Michigan.

One of our strong weapons is our grand Young Crusader. We are very proud of it, and it keeps us well informed of our division of the army. We could not keep so brave at heart, waiting to "grow up," were it not for its cheery, ringing notes.—From the July Responsive Reading, by Mrs. J. C. Fernald.

I am pleased with The Young Crusader as now issued, and so far as I am informed it gives better satisfaction than ever before. Please send me a package of Young Crusader leaflets. I want to put one in every letter, a good way of advertising its merits. I shall do all in my power to secure the banner for Ohio. Yours In His Name.—Mrs. H. B. Wisner.

I was recently talking to a Loyal Temperance Legion in Massachusetts. They sang from Anna Gordon's "Marching Songs" and as I listened to their clear, earnest voices on that banner hymn, "Saloons Must Go," and others, I thought that I would rather be the one who had edited those books than be one of the many brilliant platform speakers of the white ribbon army.

I think THE UNION SIGNAL very excellent, complete and pure. I certainly could not keep house, or keep sweet, without it, and we all love and appreciate the editors.—A W. C. T. U. Worker, California.

A new Version of an old Story.
Three Black Crows

"There were three crows sat on a tree,
As black as any crows could be."
"Alas!" said one, "would I were white
Instead of being black as night."
"Such foolish wishing," said his friends,
"In disappointment often ends;"
But now, forsooth, to make you white,
Will be an easy matter, quite.
We'll wash you well with some GOLD DUST,
And, when you're white, we fondly trust
That while you wonder at the feat,
Your happiness will be complete."
* * * * * * * * * *
Behold him now as white as snow!
Wonder of wonders! saith the crow,
"If GOLD DUST POWDER makes black white,
'Twill surely all the world delight;
And mistress, mother, nurse and maid
Will find themselves henceforth well paid
In using this great help for all,
The household's needs—both great and small;
For dishes, kettles, pots and pans,
For paint, and floors, and milkmen's cans—
It surely will great comfort bring,
And clean each dirty place or thing;
For what will make a black crow white,
Will make whate'er is dingy bright."

ANOTHER OPPORTUNITY.

To superintendents of the Sunday-school department, superintendents of literature, and local officers of the W. C. T. U.

GREETING:

As you well know, the demand for the May 22 Sunday-school temperance lesson was increased over that of January preceding, about 180,000 copies being used. This, however, is only a foundation for the work that is to be, and it should now be our first thought to extend to others not yet reached the benefits to be derived from these lessons.

The lesson for Sunday, September 25, is now ready. It is on "The Lord's Supper Profaned." Excellent opportunity is here offered to emphasize the principle of the use of unfermented wine at the sacrament, and this question has been raised so as to awaken thought. The lesson is beautifully illustrated and will do great good. Now is the time to send in orders. The following liberal terms are offered:

For 100, 50 cents; 500, $2; 1,000, $3.50; 2,000, $6; 5,000, $12; add postage at the rate of 12c per 100. The Young Crusader and the lesson will be sent on the following terms: For 100, $1; 500, $4.75: 1,000, $9; 2,000, $15; 5,000, $35; 8,000, $48. All orders between numbers named at the rate immediately preceding.

A GOOD IDEA

From Wyoming L. T. L. superintendent with a club of 25:

"I am starting Demorest contests at every point possible, and from the collections all the children in those communities are to be supplied with The Young Crusader. I wish I could collect enough to send The Advance Guard to the older ones.

The Young Crusader is getting better and better. Having work done told about makes it more interesting and necessary to the L. T. L. worker.

JUV. SUPT., IND.

DID YOU HAVE SOME?

During the month of July the orders reaching this office called for the following supplies, exclusive of books, pamphlets and miscellaneous articles. We expect the demand to constantly increase as our workers learn more of the merits of these tools:

Leaflets	145,134
Pledges	27,990
Scripture cards	9,471
Badges	5,157
Manuals	4,344
Song Books	1,648

With a membership of 200,000 or even 150,000, this, however, is not more than one leaflet for each member of the organization. Should we not plan so that each one will send out an average of ten leaflets per month and thus multiply the influence of the printed page ten times? Our best thinkers and writers prepare them. It is ours to study when and how to use to advantage. Send for catalogue and bound set of leaflets that you may do so intelligently.

WHY YOU .... WANT THE AUTOMATIC FOUNTAIN.

Which is now placed within your reach:

BECAUSE—People will get thirsty, and a cool drink is a necessity.

BECAUSE—With these fountains you can furnish a cool and tasty drink cheaper than ever was known.

BECAUSE—When the thirsty crowd cannot secure a cool, healthful drink, the drift is at once toward the saloon, with all its baneful influence.

BECAUSE—The fountain is offered to you on terms which will not fail to be advantageous to you.

BECAUSE—An opportunity is here given to enable you to make money for your work.

THEREFORE—Every W. C. T. U. should secure one or more of these fountains. Address the WOMAN'S TEMPERANCE PUBLISHING ASSOCIATION, The Temple, Chicago, Ill.

Signal Notes.

THE National School of Methods for Reform at Prohibition Park, Staten Island, N. Y., will include in its program for August gospel temperance meetings, W. C. T. U. School of Methods, university extension with Sam Jones, Colonel Bain, Joe Hess, John Hector, a colored orator, and H. H. Emmett, the Indian orator of Ohio.

THE fourth International Congress to protest against the abuse of alcoholic liquors will meet in The Hague, September, 1892. The commission divides the subjects for discussion into three classes: First, Alcoholism in its moral, hygienic and medical aspects. Second, Preventive and persuasive measures. Third, Compulsory measures.

AN argument for total abstinence as conducive to longevity is found in the annual report of the United Kingdom temperance and provident institution. There are two sections, one including moderate non-abstainers, the other, total abstainers. In the former there were thirty-nine more deaths, and in the latter, eighty-one fewer than were expected.

SOUTHEASTERN Kentucky, once the scene of wild brawls, raids and terrible debaucheries, is fast becoming entirely changed by the determination of some of its best inhabitants. Many counties have prohibited the sale of liquor, and emigrants of good character are buying the rich farming land. Temperance education and religion have gone hand in hand.

"I DELIBERATELY affirm that Herod, the historical ogre of the New Testament, is a philanthropist compared with the breweries and distilleries of Great Britain. And I say solemnly and deliberately that worship of the child Jesus in sincerity and truth is impossible to those who sit with folded hands, while the pestilential breath of this modern Herod poisons the children whom Jesus loves."—Canon Wilberforce.

THE following is an extract from the platform adopted by the Vermont Republicans, June 22: "We demand a continuance of the prohibitory liquor law. We believe that law is, on the whole, more efficient and better enforced to-day than ever before; and we assert that the attitude of Republicans in the state towards that question is such as to leave the Prohibition party of Vermont without an occupation."

A GREAT temperance revival followed the Moody meetings in 1887 in Chicago. The workers and converts organized and adopted the name The Gospel Temperance League. The movement is founded on the principle of the Golden Rule, their pledge reading, "I, the undersigned, do pledge my word and honor, God helping me, to abstain from all intoxicating liquors as a beverage and that I will by all honorable means encourage others to abstain."

THE Illinois State Liquor Dealers' Protective Association of the first district met in Chicago in June. The president, in speaking of an attack on retail druggists' associations for sale of liquors without retail license said that an agreement had been arrived at between them, the association guaranteeing to aid in the prosecution of all druggists selling unlawfully. Among other matters brought up was one which referred to the fact that at least two thousand persons resident in Cook county were selling without license.

INVESTIGATION into the way that public money is expended in Boston shows that over one hundred and sixty thousand dollars is spent in the City Hospital, of which amount almost six thousand went for alcoholic drinks. It is said that no doctor outside begins to lose the number of patients carried out from this hospital, more than one out of nine. The comparison between that and the Temperance Hospital records would suggest to the physicians in charge that the day for alcoholic prescriptions is fast passing away.

THE church parade of cyclists is becoming a popular institution in England. A service for cyclists was first held several years ago by a vicar in the village of Ripley, Surrey. He saw hundreds of Londoners riding every Sunday, so opened his church for a twenty-minute service, got a leading cyclist to read the lesson, started lively singing and gave a brief address. Similar services are now held in all parts of the country. Bicycling is so largely on the increase in America that a Sunday service by some W. C. T U. is not impractical.

False Economy

Is practiced by many people who buy inferior articles of food because cheaper than standard goods. Surely infants are entitled to the best food obtainable. It is a fact that the Gail Borden "Eagle" Brand Condensed Milk is the best infant food. Your grocer and druggist keep it.

THE RECONCILIATION.

Two urchins strolling on the beach,
Beside the tranquil sea,
Beheld a pearly block, and each
Cried, "That belongs to me!"
And both at once with eager hands,
Began to scramble in the sands.

Like alabaster pure and white,
Upon the pebbled shore,
That treasure lay, a lovely sight,
And well worth fighting o'er;
Long struggled the contending twain
The prize so coveted to gain.

Lo, while they strove, a stranger tall,
Strode quickly to the spot,
He stooped beside the champions small,
And took the prize, I wot;
Then spoke in solmn voice and slow,
"Ye both are richer than you know."

Then with a string he did divide
That precious cake, and smiled;
"'Tis Ivory Soap, share it with pride;
My lads, be reconciled!"
Each took his half and went his way,
Oh, rich and happy boys were they.

COPYRIGHT 1892, BY THE PROCTER & GAMBLE CO

WOMAN'S COLUMBIAN LAUNDRY CO.

Incorporated under the Laws of the State of Illinois.
A WOMAN'S COMPANY, OWNED, OPERATED AND MANAGED BY WOMEN.
Capital, - - $300,000.

A GREAT INDUSTRIAL ENTERPRISE.

SHARES ARE TEN ($10.00) DOLLARS EACH, AND ARE

Sold Only to Women.

We propose to enlarge our business, and give women of large or small means an opportunity to become identified in an industrial and exceedingly profitable business enterprise, and establish 100 or more Branch Laundries: for that purpose we have decided to offer 10,000 shares of our Capital Stock to be Sold Only to Women. Present price, $10 per share, par value, payable, if desired, in monthly installments of $2.50 per hare. Price of stock will be advanced to $12.50 per share as soon as the 10,000 shares now offered are sold.

A SAFE AND PROFITABLE INVESTMENT.

With the complete operation of our laundries we will have a capacity for turning out 100,000 laundried shirts per week, and as the population of Chicago requires many times this number of shirts a week, and as the profit on each shirt is 5 cents, you can easily see that running our full capacity we would be able to make a profit of $5,000 a week, $20,000 a month, or $240,000 a year on shirts alone, to say nothing about revenues to be derived from our other work and departments, which will be large. Taking this, then, as a basis, and that money is worth 8 per cent, we would be enabled to pay a dividend of $8.00 on every share of stock. We do not believe it will be less and it may be more.

AN IMPORTANT FEATURE.—Our improved method of doing laundry work gives better satisfaction than any other process, as NO CHEMICALS ARE USED, therefore the fiber of the linen is not worn or eaten away. Our business has been established four years; the Company owns it absolutely; it is in daily operation, and, better still, is paying over fifty per cent on the amount invested.

HOW MANY SHARES DO YOU WISH?

SEND FOR YOURS BEFORE You Lay Down This PAPER.

They are only $10 each. Better secure as many as you can, as we have now less than 10,000 shares to offer at this price, and they will be taken very fast. Orders for stock will be filled as received, and all subscriptions received in excess of above amount will be returned to subscribers.

No better investment can be found than our capital stock. Invest now while the Company is new, and reap the benefits paid in dividends perhaps for the balance of your life.

Write to-day and send a small deposit to show us you are in earnest, state how many shares you wish, and we will reserve them for you any reasonable length of time. Full information sent free on application.

The Interior, one of the leading religious papers of Chicago, says: "The energy displayed by the officers of the Woman's Columbian Laundry Co. in pushing their undertaking to success, and broadening the foundations of their business, is truly remarkable. They have just closed a number of large contracts for Hotel, Apartment Building and Railroad Laundry work that will be exceedingly profitable to the fortunate stockholders."

"The work of the Woman's Columbian Laundry Co. is important, and should receive the support of every housewife in the country."—MARION HARLAND

Lake and Assembly Grounds are reached in the most comfortable manner by the Erie Lines. All the through trains between Chicago, Cincinnati, and New York and Boston over the Erie run via the Lake; consequently no changes of cars from those points.

LOW RATE HARVEST EXCURSIONS.

The announcement that the North-Western Line, comprising over 8,000 miles of thoroughly equipped railway, has arranged to run two low rate Harvest Excursions during the months of August and September, will be gladly received by those who are interested in the development of the great West and Northwest, as well as by those who desire to visit this wonderfully productive region at a season of the year when exact demonstration can be made of the merits and advantages it offers to home-seekers and those in search of safe and profitable investments.

These excursions will leave Chicago on August 30th and September 27th, and tickets can be purchased at the very low rate of one fare for the round trip to points in Iowa, Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, Idaho and Montana. They will be strictly first-class in every particular and will be good for return passage at any time within twenty days from date of purchase. Full information concerning rates and arrangements for these excursions can be obtained upon application to any coupon ticket agent, or to W. A. Thrall, G. P. T. A., Chicago & North-Western R'y, Chicago.

THREE HARVEST EXCURSIONS.

Half Rates via the Illinois Central.

Aug. 30th, Sept. 27th and Oct. 25, 1892.

The Central Route will sell Excursion tickets to the Agricultural Regions of the West, Southwest and South, at one fare for the Round Trip, from stations on its lines north of Cairo, on August 30th, and September 27th. A third excursion will be run to the South and Southwest on October 25th. Your Local Ticket Agent will give you full particulars in regard to these Harvest Excursions; arrangements can also be made in this connection to visit the desirable Railroad Lands for sale by the Illinois Central in Southern Illinois on obtaining special permission to do so by addressing the Company's Land Commissioner at Chicago, Mr. E. P. Skene. In addition, a few weeks before the first Excursion date, your Local Ticket Agent will be able to furnish you with a special Folder, issued by the Illinois Central, which will give you particulars of these Harvest Excursions in such form as will enable you to plan your journey at home. Should you not be within call of a railroad ticket agent, address A. H. Hanson, G. P. A., Illinois Central R. R., Chicago, Ill.

EVERY W. C. T. U. should secure a copy of the "Young Woman Journalist." Price $1.50. Send for it.

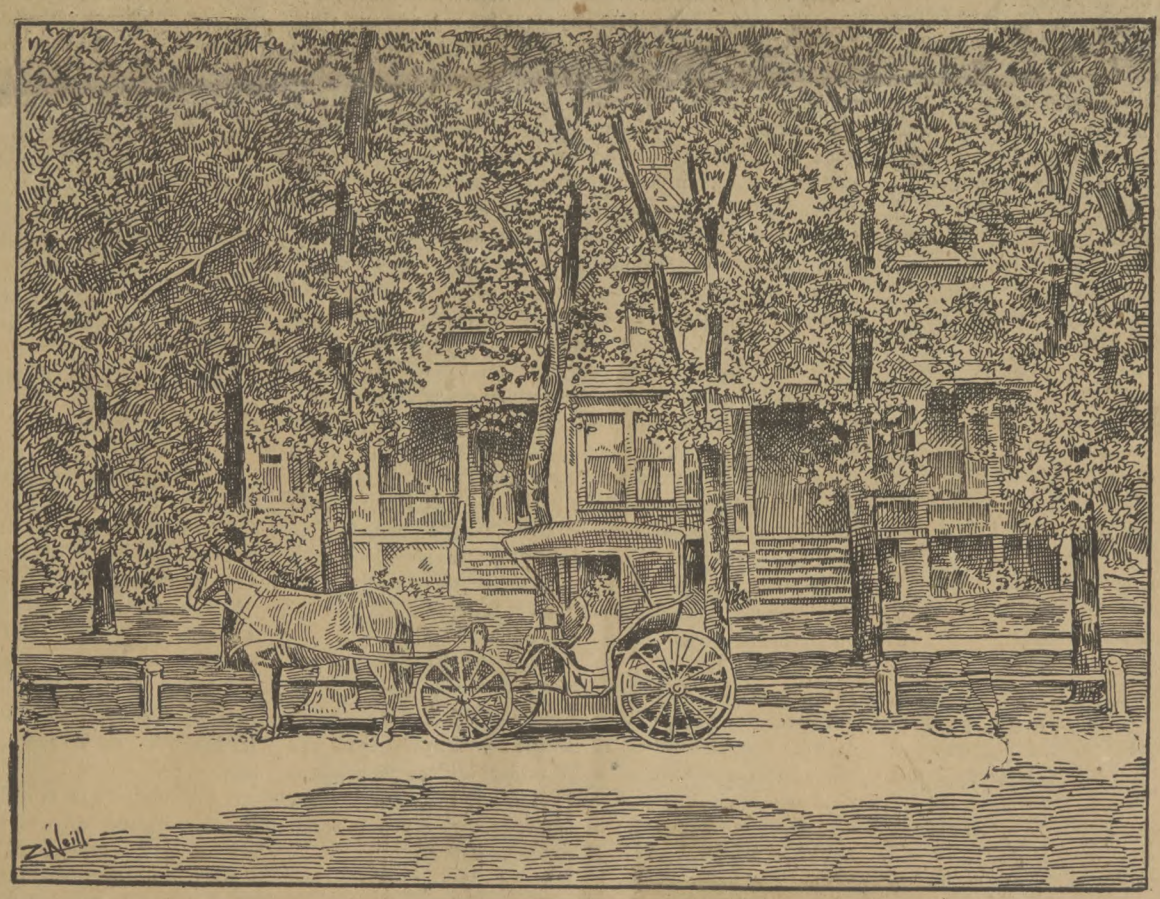
IN MEMORIAM

MADAM WILLARD



. . . REST COTTAGE . . .

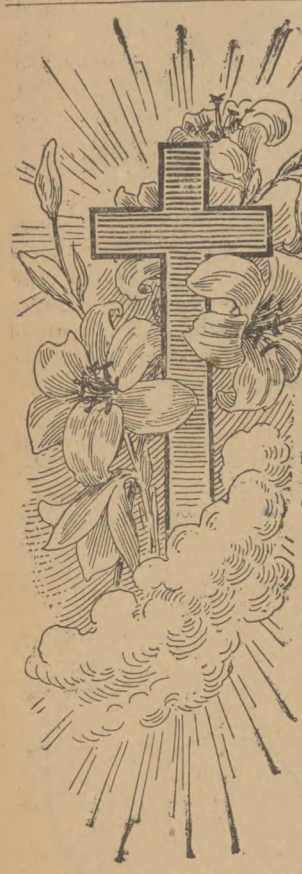
WE walk out into the mystery fearless because we trust in Thee. We face the great emergency with our hearts full of vital questions that cannot here be answered. We leave them all with Thee knowing that Thou wilt cherish our wistful aspirations toward Him who loved and has redeemed us. We would know many things that Thou hast not revealed, but we can only love and trust and wait.

WE thank thee, oh, Heavenly Father, for our far-reaching hopes. Make us grateful for food and home and friends.

Bless the temperance work and workers.

Keep us safe to-night and all our loved ones, and through riches of grace in Christ Jesus may we be brought to break bread together in our Father's house "some sweet day, bye and bye."

In Memoriam.



SHE SLEEPS WELL, FOR SHE HATH LIVED WELL.

BY REV. W. S. STUDLEY, D. D.

Address at the funeral services at the Methodist Church, Evanston, Ill. August 9, 1892.

"NOW rests her soul in Jesus' arms;
Her body in the grave sleeps well;
His heart her death-chilled heart re-warms;
And rest more deep than tongue can tell—
Her few brief hours of conflict passed—
She finds with Christ, her Friend, at last;
She bathes in tranquil seas of peace;
God wipes away her tears; she feels
New life that all her languor heals;
The glory of the Lamb she sees.

"She hath escaped all danger now;
Her pain and sighing all are fled;
The crown of joy is on her brow;
Eternal glories o'er her shed;
In golden robes, a queen, a bride,
She standeth at her Sovereign's side;
She sees His face unveiled and bright:
With joy and love He greets her soul;
She feels herself made inly whole;
A lesser light amid His light.

"Her soul hath now its Father seen,
And feels what kindling love may be;
And knoweth what those words may mean;
'Himself, the Father, loveth thee.'
A shoreless ocean, an abyss
Unfathomed, filled with good and bliss,
Now breaks on her enraptured sight;
She sees God's face: she learneth there
What this shall be to be His heir—
Joint heir with Christ, her Lord, in light.

"We who yet wander through the waste,
In faith, long after thee, on high;
While here the bread of tears we taste,
We think upon that home of joy,
Where we (who knows how soon?) shall meet
With all the saints at Jesus' feet,
And dwell with Him forever there.
We shall see God; how deep the bliss
We know not yet that lies in this;
Lord Jesus, come; our hearts prepare."

Nearly two hundred years ago (1725) the German poet, Allendorf, wrote these verses, which seem to me most fitting to repeat on this day, not of mourning, but as at the coronation of one of our number among the saints of the Most High.

One of the most striking and impressive figures which we can conceive of in poor human life is that of a person well advanced in years, having the mental faculties unimpaired, with every natural endowment broadened by careful study and a wide observation of men and things; keenly alive to everything which concerns humanity; full of intelligent zeal for every righteous cause; as eager for the contest of virtue against vice as ever in youth or middle life; having neither the rashness of youth nor the extreme conservatism which so often attends on four score years; with a spirit so influenced by daily contact with Christ as to be ready for martyrdom, if need be, for the sake of the truth and the right, and yet so gentle and tender and loving as to attract little children to its confidence; looking always upon life as a most serious thing, yet constantly illuminating even its darkest hours with summer lightning flashes of wit and humor; with no agnostic's lack of faith toward God, but with a lively and apostolical hope of Christian immortality; a soul thoroughly equipped for the duties of life, yet never unready for the thought of death or unsteady at his approach—would not such a figure be striking and impressive wherever you might meet it? And till past midnight of last Saturday, when she closed her eyes on all earthly scenes and opened them on heaven, was not this now sainted woman just such a striking figure as I have sketched? Is not my picture boldly photographic rather than an exaggerated ideal? Could any person who knew the subject of this sketch fail to detect in it her lineaments? Could the most idealistic artist give too rich a color to her portrait, or too high a tone?

Madam Willard was in her eighty-eighth year, having been born in Danville, Vt., on the 3d of January, 1805. Even in her childhood she knew something of the adventures and deprivations of frontier life, for Vermont had hardly been recovered from its wilderness state at the time when she was born. At the age of ten she removed with her father to the more fertile fields of Monroe county, New York, and at the age of fifteen she commenced to teach school, a work of which she did more or less till the time of her marriage with Mr. Willard, in 1832. As a rare instance of ambition for mental discipline, and energy in securing it, it may be stated that after three children had been born to this young couple, to the astonishment of their friends, both husband and wife gave the larger part of five years to study in Oberlin College.

She was a woman in whom was mingled great strength with exceeding tenderness. As one who knew her well has said: "She had such equipoise of character, such anchorage in God, that no storm could surprise her or make shipwreck of her sovereignty and faith." She was gifted with a "colloquial quaintness," a drollery of thought and expression which was a source of perpetual delight in her home; while her supreme gift of "motherliness" to those who knew her seemed to reach almost to the height of actual genius; and these endowments of mind and heart were of incalculable value amid the trials and responsibilities of domestic life in a new country.

One of her life-long favorite hymns, a hymn which she learned in childhood at family worship in her father's house, was "How firm a foundation, ye saints of the Lord." One of the stanzas, which speaks of God's people, says:

"And when hoary hairs shall their temples adorn, Like lambs they shall still in His bosom be borne";

and, concerning this assurance of God's care for the old among His children, she once said: "How I enjoyed that sentiment for my old grandmother, who lived to be ninety seven; and then for my dear father, who was eighty-six; and now my daughter enjoys it for me, who am eighty-four; and perhaps she will live on to be as old as I, when I feel sure she will have friends who will enjoy it just as tenderly for her."

Speaking of her children, she said: "They are nearly all gone now, our five, of whom we used to talk so much together, and I shall slip quietly away from you and follow them. Don't allow yourself to grieve, my child, for the time will fly faster than you think until you too are gathered home; and so we shall all be 'forever with the Lord.'"

Both she and her husband had a philosophical way of looking at things. They trusted God as much as the birds trust Him. They never lost sleep through care. They never lay awake nights, or tossed upon their pillows through excessive worry. The mother was always ambitious to acquire knowledge, having a desire and purpose to keep along with her children in their studies, so as to insure their continued comradeship. Perhaps one secret of her long and tranquil life is to be found in the conscientious care which she gave to securing sufficient sleep. Many an evening she would take early leave of the family circle with the remark that she must go to bed and to sleep, for her children's sake, so that she might still be young-hearted when she became old.

As late as her eighty-fourth year she began to keep a journal, writing in it every day things that seemed to be of interest, as well as many choice sayings of the good and gifted. She also occupied herself by clipping from the many newspapers which came under her eye such editorials as she considered to have superior merit, or articles on some favorite topic, and had them preserved in scrap books, of which she kept a numerous collection.

That she had a strong head and a loving heart in her old age may be seen in the views which she wrote not long ago on the training of children. She says: "First of all, I would insist, teach your children to be truthful; by all the incentives that occur to your prayerful thought keep their love and confidence so that they will be open to you as the day. . . Don't regard your child as a mere animal, only to be fed and clothed. It needs sympathy very early. . . Never punish a child when it can think you are in anger. . . Mothers should try to keep their health so as to be bright, agreeable company for the older children, and to be patient with the little ones. . . The habit of unselfishness and kindness cannot be too early impressed. . . The mother should be in spirit and manner, or should aim to be, such as she desires the children to become. . . When they are old enough to commence study, do not be indifferent to the trials they meet with in the effort to solve the (to them) difficult problems, but solve them often yourself; don't be so fearful about weakening their self-reliance and desire for high achievement in the future. On no account allow them to be discouraged at the outset. . . Try to cultivate in them a tender conscience, a delicate sensitiveness to right and wrong. I would place the acquisition of character infinitely before that of wealth, desirable as a moderate share of wealth may be."

"The story of my motherhood," she says, "who can write it?—the material care demanded by helpless infancy; the boundless welcome bursting from parental hearts, the feeling of a new and measureless responsibility, the unspeakable tenderness of parental love, the painful consciousness of limited powers in the presence of an infinite need. Here are wise little faces looking up to you, as to an oracle, every nerve of the soul thrilling to your slightest touch, divining by a strange intuition your tone and spirit, with the certainty of a seraph. Mother, step softly, you shall be the accepted creed of these young immortals; in all the coming years these unwritten lives shall herald your example and counsels when you are resting from your labors. Motherhood is life's richest and most delicious romance; and sitting in sunshine calm and sweet, with all my precious ones upon the other side save the daughter who so faithfully cherishes me here, I thank God most of all that He ever said to me: 'Bring up this child for Me in the love of humanity, and in the expectation of immortal life.'" When you hear her say such things as these, are you not satisfied that she had a strong head and a loving heart?

Her last days were peculiarly marked with courage and confidence towards God. She was satisfied that her work here was done, and that her Heavenly Father wanted her on the other shore. Assured of this she had no will to live. Her desires, her purposes, her affections, all gravitated towards that "new Jerusalem which is above," and of which she and her household had so often sung, especially delighting in the stanza:

"Blest seats! through rude and stormy scenes
I onward press to you."

[Hymn sung at the funeral services.]

THERE IS A LAND OF PURE DELIGHT.

THERE is a land of pure delight,
Where saints immortal reign;
Eternal day excludes the night,
And pleasures banish pain;
There everlasting spring abides,
And never with'ring flowers;
Death like a narrow sea divides
This heavenly land from ours.

Sweet fields beyond the swelling flood,
Stand dressed in living green;
So to the Jews old Canaan stood,
While Jordan rolled between;
Could we but climb where Moses stood
And view the landscape o'er;
Not Jordan's stream, nor death's cold flood
Should fright us from the shore.

THE CHARACTER OF MRS. MARY T. HILL WILLARD.

BY REV. C. F. BRADLEY, D. D.

It is a blessed fact that many of the good and noble speak to a larger number and more clearly after death than they ever have in life. Widely known and greatly honored as Mrs. Willard has been, yet the chosen seclusion of her life, and of late her advanced years, have necessarily limited the circle of her personal influence. Additional multitudes will from this day begin to know of her great virtues and catch the inspiration of her heroic and beautiful life. Yet it is the cause of regret and loss to us all that those who alone could adequately characterize her, must sit among us to-day with sealed and silent lips.

All who had any knowledge of Mrs. Willard recognize in her a woman of a vigorous and original mind, and of strong and independent character. Her personal presence indicated these traits. Her features were of that strongly marked and intellectual type which are characteristic of statesmen and other great leaders of men. Her constitution, inherited from a noble Puritan ancestry, was of rare strength and fineness. Her mind, strong, clear and independent in its thinking, was supported by a will both firm and prompt, and by a courage, physical and moral, such as is rarely found in our day in either man or woman. It is declared by those who knew her best that they never saw her evince the slightest sign of fear about the things that frightened other women, such as animals, burglars, or a night alone in the house, about these she only laughed. This natural courage, supported by divine grace, so prepared her for death that when this King of Terrors came to her she faced him, too, without a fear. Her only anxiety about her dying seemed to be lest it should give trouble and alarm to others. "Do not grieve," she said, "it is all right; I am going to die!"

"She told me," writes one who was constantly with her, "the only thing she dreaded was that we might be pained and hurt; that even when she was in the woman's prayer meeting she remembered something that made her think about death, and she recalled praying then, that when she went she needn't frighten any one, and that her departure might be in such a way as to take the fear out of the people's heads. 'I think your prayer has been answered,' I said.

"At another time she said: 'One of my greatest wishes is not only to make no trouble, but not to have people feel badly because I go away, and I don't want to be sick so as to tax their sympathy, nor to have them be scared about my death. For six thousand years the human race has gone through this, and I can do like others, and I can leave myself in the hands of God, but for you people to be disturbed is what has disturbed me.' "

Prominent among Mrs. Willard's intellectual traits, and closely related to her phenomenal courage, was her independence of thought. Her steadfast convictions were the result of her own thinking and study. She was greatly influenced by the strong minds with which she came in contact in her life and reading, but it cannot be said that she called any man master save Christ. She admired the great evangelist, Finney, who was at the zenith of his remarkable influence when she was at Oberlin, but she was not dominated as a weaker mind would naturally have been by his theology and methods. Her sympathies were too catholic, and her breadth of view too extensive to allow any one's way of thinking to overmaster her personal independence. She was fitted thus to stand among pioneers in the great reform movements of her time. She was among the earliest to sympathize with the abolition movement; to accept the principles and adopt the practice of total abstinence and to take a larger view of the true education and sphere of women; her views of physical culture, her ideals of home life, and her religious views were early marked by a breadth and true liberality to which the general thought of our times has been slowly advancing. It was only consistent that such a woman should put a high estimate upon education. Her own college course at Oberlin, already alluded to, was a proof of this. She said: "I was determined that my children should be well educated. I struggled for that. It was the great struggle of my life."

As would be expected of such a woman, her ideals of life were uniformly high. For herself and others she "coveted earnestly the best gifts." She spurred her children on to earnest endeavor, to worthy ambition, to the attainment of noble character and the achievement of lofty and benevolent aims.

The originality of her thought gained force from a certain quaintness of speech which was natural to her. Even the last days were brightened and cheered by many examples of this.

But if one can give in a brief address but a faint idea of Mrs. Willard's intellectual traits, it is still more difficult to describe the qualities of her heart. Her character, like her face, was not only strong, but benignant. She not only gave her whole heart's love to her family circle—such motherly devotion is, happily, not rare in the world—but her heart beat with affectionate consideration to all about her and she cherished good will toward all men. Those who served in the household became strongly attached to her and are among her sincerest mourners. She devoted many hours of her time to giving them instruction in such studies as interested them. Her spirit was eminently philanthropic. She spoke evil of no one. She never repeated any unkind thing which was told her by others to any one's disadvantage. One who knew her for thirty years says: "She seemed never for a moment to harbor the least ill-will towards any human being. Of resentment she seemed incapable. She would speak a kind word and do a friendly act as readily for those who had done her injustice, as for those who had done her a favor." When asked at a mothers' meeting what changes she would make in her method if she had her children to educate over again, she answered: "Only this—to blame less and praise more."

Of one who had given her much solicitude and whom she greatly loved, she spoke these memorable words:

"I wish you two, and all who care for me, to send him good thoughts, for I have come to believe that thoughts are things, and that just as you can send a current of electricity along a wire, so through this fine ether that is perhaps solid to more refined beings than we are, we can send currents of thought, and if they are good they will help. I believe that we owe it to one like him to think of him at his best, to hold him steadily in our hands at his highest valuation. We ought to present him to ourselves constantly, as just the sort of man we wish him to become. If we do this we can help him at a distance, and we can help him more perhaps than in any other way, or by sending him money, or by any other materialistic method of coming to the rescue. To think of him in this way is a method of praying—it invokes all the divine influences for him, and perhaps helps apply them to him, for aught we know it furnishes a conductor along which these heavenly powers may travel. Then I wish you to remember that by doing what I have asked you are ennobling your own characters. You are lifting up your natures into a higher and purer atmosphere. People who think meanly of others make fools of themselves—the harm they do is double, one half to the person of whom they think, the other half is visited on their own heads, for God's system of compensations and offsets is complete down to the nicety of a hair. From the other side I hope myself to send waves of good thoughts to those of you who try to send good thoughts to him."

The lofty philosophy of these injunctions she daily practiced. Not only was her own manner uniformly cheerful, serene and affectionate, but she entered with an indulgent and tolerant sympathy into the hopes and plans of those whose lives were widely different from her own. She loved all things beautiful and good. She trusted in God with a childlike confidence, and she ardently expected the triumph of God's kingdom on the earth. Her assurance of immortal life seemed to be absolute. She once said to a young man who was just starting out in the ministry: "This is what the world is saying: 'If you have hopes, tell them to me; if doubts, keep them to yourself, for I have plenty of my own.' Tell the people of your hopes. Tell them of immortality. There is nothing in the world they want to hear of so much, because this is the short life—that the long one. They need to be assured of immortality and told how to win its bliss."

Among her favorite hymns were these:

"I'm a pilgrim and I'm a stranger,
I can tarry, I can tarry but a night."

"Lead, kindly light, amid the encircling gloom Lead thou me on."

"Gently, Lord, O gently lead us."

Her first choice for the temperance workers was:

"There are lonely hearts to cherish
While the days are going by."

And so she passed through it all and fell asleep—and so she was not, for God took her. And so she is satisfied for she has awaked with His likeness. She is in His presence where there is fullness of joy. She is at His right hand where there are pleasures for evermore, and there she praises God who has given her the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.

[Hymn sung at the funeral services.]

WHILE THE DAYS ARE GOING BY.

THERE are lonely hearts to cherish
While the days are going by;
There are weary souls who perish,
While the days are going by;
If a smile we can renew,
As our journey we pursue,
O the good we all may do,
While the days are going by.

CHORUS:—

Going by, going by,
O the good we all may do
While the days are going by.

There's no time for idle scorning.
While the days are going by:
Let your face be like the morning,
While the days are going by.
O the world is full of sighs,
Full of sad and weeping eyes;
Help your fallen brother rise
While the days are going by.

All the loving links that bind us,
While the days are going by—
One by one we leave behind us,
While the days are going by.
But the seeds of good we sow,
Both in shade and shine will grow,
And will keep our hearts aglow,
While the days are going by.

MADAM WILLARD AS A PHILANTHROPIST.

BY REV. H. A. DELANO, D. D.

Death, the great leveler, reduces everything to its commonest terms at last. All the wretched inequalities of life, all the strife of tongues and all debate are hushed at the tomb.

We have here the calm and most rational view of life. When a Judson or a Spurgeon dies you claim and have part in the heritage! When a Susanna Wesley or a Hannah More or a Madam Willard dies we come to claim our right. Death makes us one. Sorrow makes all common.

God incarnates and glorifies Himself in the individual, in the great fixed stars rather than in the rushlight. We can count the light-houses but not the fire bugs. The rocket sputters out its empty secret and leaves the greater darkness. The light house shines out through the night and grows brighter as the world grows blacker.

Our refreshment comes through the nobles—the unselfish and the faithful—those who have made impressions that outlive fleeting self and become a part of the eternal influence.

And now I am sure I shall not transgress the solemn courtesies due this trying hour, if I say a personal word. A word that she, our great leader of womanhood, and endeared to so many here, would have said. I simply take for her, in this supreme hour, all the laurels of praise, well earned, all the eulogies, all sober adulation, all the spontaneous and affectionate tributes so often spoken, the laudation of paper and review, the tender sentiments of a half million of women for this citizen of ours, the flowers of noble consideration, dropped from the chivalrous hands of knightly men, all these things by which her own plain path has been garlanded in spite of herself, and I place them upon the silent heart of this consecrated mother. If the barbed spear or poisoned shaft, or keen stiletto of criticism have ever come, I know she would say, "Bind these all for me, but heap every flower upon mother's casket; she deserves and shall have them all."

I speak of Madam Willard's silent, life-long, courageous relation to philanthropy and reform. The philosophy of it, certain of our own poets has told better than I can:

"Great is the symbol of being, but that which is symboled is greater,
Vast the created and known, but vaster the inward creator.
Back of the sound broods the silence; back of the gift is the giver.
Never a daisy that grows but a mystery guideth its growing;
Never a river that flows but a majesty scepters its flowing;
Never a Shakespeare that soared, but a stronger than he did enfold him,
Nor ever a prophet foretells but a greater than he hath foretold him.
Back of the canvas that throbs, the painter is hinted and hidden;
Into the statue that breathes, the soul of the sculptor is bidden.
Space is nothing to spirit; the deed is outdone by the doing;
The noblest are reared by example, and blossom by nursery wooing.
Back of the foreguard and leader, stands silent, heroic, some other;
And colossal behind the achievement, stands meekly, that angel, the mother."

In the royal burying ground of Austria rests the noble, pitiful Maria Theresa, by the side of her governess—teacher and taught. The world sees George and Mary Washington in the one halo. Monica and St. Augustine, Cornelia and her "Jewel" sons, John Wesley and his mother, Napoleon and the lofty soul who gave him indomitable nerve, Harriet Beecher Stowe and the twain parents of New England granite—and so is ever the inevitable, absolute hand back of the doer, out of whose moulding, prophetic touch the hero and heroine come, fated, almost, because of what was mighty over and around them. Omnipotent the laws of the nursery and the fireside. Fatal for weal or woe the atmosphere of the home.

Given a face like that, "brave, benignant," patient yet resolute, a will inflexible for duty, a heart sensitive to righteousness and truth, yet tender as a child's; given New England Puritanism and rigor, its habit of looking deep into every problem; its consciousness of God; its lofty ideals of freedom, and its final espousal of every noble cause, and you and I shall never blame the stalwart heart, well-nigh crushed to-day because mother is gone. Your Carlyles, Stuart Mills, Mary Livermores, explain themselves by referring you to what lies back of them.

Of hardy, New England stock, weathering its changeableness, inbreathing its moral as well as its physical atmosphere, educated at Oberlin College amid its refining influences, its reformatory and revival tendencies, its bold championship of freedom for all, she was moulded to that high sense of justice, that self-discipline of mind and body, that evermore engagedness and zeal for God always characterizing her.

Radical and progressive ideas were native to her, natural. A reformer by nature, philanthropy was a sort of study with her. She gave the two mites as willingly out of hard beginnings and trying days in Wisconsin, as afterward; and the other day upon her couch of suffering and death, she articulated, "give this, and give this, or this, to that one, and the other, and this to another." Thought, all the time, went out of self and away to others. Seldom, unless prompted, did she think of self.

Her country, the state, the school, the boys and girls, the church of Christ, and the church of her choice, its ministers and missions, its colleges and its conquest, her neighbors, the slave, and the inebriate, the wrongs of Ireland, the persecutions of the Jews, the needs of a Kossuth, or a poor domestic—all these, and more, found hospitable place and warmth in her ever enlarging heart.

Aye, friends, such cosmopolitan tenderness, such world-wide interest in the kingdom of Jesus Christ; such unselfish love of men for whom Jesus died, would soon answer our Lord's Prayer, unite us in holy bonds, and restore the Edenic music of earth's first creation to our ears. In such retrospect of so self forgetful a soul, the very memory of her sufferings is consumed. "She hath done what she could," all she could.

I say it reverently, and I repeat what Mary Livermore says in that poem-lecture, "A Dream of To-morrow," "God wants to teach men to do grand things, like His own great doing." I say it reverently, this mother spared nothing, kept back nothing that would save and bless the world. She spared not her own child.

Helplessness—old age, is sometimes liable to grow selfish. Not so did she. When duty called, and the daughter must needs go—go in storm, cold, heat, sometimes to toil, and days of anxious conference, to go and only, as is sometimes possible even in Christian lands, to the martyr's recompense of misjudgment and reproach—this mother who fain would have kept her for herself, to love, to comfort and for communion, said, "go!"

This dear old "Saint Courageous" sustained her; against the tender bosom of her deathless love, held loyally, sweetly, restfully (and may I not say, proudly?) the weary head of the ever busy worker. She was, for years, inspirer, companion, helper. There was always perennial, fresh life there, for your pilgrim hearts at Rest Cottage.

"And whenever the way seemed dark,
Or, whenever the day seemed long,
She would tell a more marvelous tale,
Or sing a more wonderful song."

Surely, she has earned her rest. She has known the cost and comfort of the reformer's faith. She was never ashamed of her religion, her opinions, or the advanced position taken. "Children, when I am gone, you must sing a psalm of praise." Thus murmured the mother of your mighty Wesleys.

Her life of love, love for family, and home, and country, is a blessed memory. The emancipated soul has gone to enrich and glorify other realms; upon her stainless brow God's angels have set the wondrous seal of a triumphing and eternal peace. She seemed ever conscious that she must leave service here some day for destiny yonder, and a purpose philanthropic, high and holy, and world embracing girded her from hour to hour.

She was a teacher, she was possessed of high ideals, she was a patriot, loyal to every interest of her native land. She loved music, she kept young of heart, joyous and fresh until almost the last. She made the world's cause her own and identified herself with all its fortunes. Nothing of its sorrow, sadness, or pain was foreign to her. This greatest, this present, this dearest and most vital reform, temperance, absorbed her, enlarged her, and filled her with enthusiasm. She, though four score years and more of age, was at the center of it. Her dear old eyes gladdened and brightened at the latest bulletins of its success. She did not say, "I am too old, too fixed in habit and opinion to enlist in the better effort of to-morrow, to inquire of woman's higher responsibilities and duties, to have some opinion as to the damnable and unholy traffic whose licensed ravages are destroying my country." Nay, she had opinions, and held them, expressed them, prayed over them, and went, with the dream at her dear, loyal heart, that she might help "Franccs" more from the other side than from this.

Mary Clemmer Ames said of Margaret Fuller, "Universal sympathy with human nature was her prevailing characteristic. Her magnanimity, her large intelligence, her tenderness made her not only comprehend, but feel for every struggle of the human heart. There was no soul so lonely or abject that she did not feel drawn to it through the virtue of its humanity." In two or three sharp, short sentences Madam Willard could give you a clearer and cleaner cut exposition of the temperance question than could half the delicate, careless butterflies of society, or even many of our namby-pamby men.

But her work is done; with a genius, a consecration, a beauty and youth which had outlived her years, a soul eager still to know, to learn and catch every word God had for her, she lived on—a center of joy and comfort in this typical and almost best known home in America. As the mountains round about Jerusalem, so she stood a veritable Matterhorn of strength to this daughter. She has fought a good fight, finished her course, kept the faith, and she waves the victor's palm and wears the conqueror's crown to-day.

Only a little longer and we too, shall go, only a little longer and the right shall conquer, only a little longer and the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ, a little longer and the dead who sleep in Him shall rise, "Christ, the first fruits, afterwards they that are Christ's at His coming, then the 'main body,' the rank and file—when He shall have put down all rule, all authority, all power, for He must reign."

Till then, great heart, sleep on; sleep, blessed mother, for thou art weary; sleep, grand Saint Courageous, for thou didst fight long and hard, and at last didst earn repose; sleep, loving and beloved mother, sleep!

A MOTHER IN ISRAEL.

BY MARY LOWE DICKINSON.

THE "Great Cause" had great lovers; one by one,
In through the lifted gates at eventide,
Many have passed in triumph or in peace,
Into the presence of the King of Kings.

Now, one has gone, so loved and longed-for there,
That, from "the many mansions"—and the fair,
Green fields, where ever stillest waters glide,
All these, who journeyed earlier home to God,
Come, hasting, with glad welcomes on their lips,
And God's calm lovelight in their radiant eyes.
So glad are they,—and she who dwelt apart,
Holding the "Great Cause" close to her great heart—
In silent gladness, yielding it her best—
Now past all pain, or care, or anxious quest
For God's grand day of triumph—SHE HATH REST.

And we, who wait and struggle, "What for us?"
When, long ago two walked toward Emmaus,
An unseen Friend was with them; even thus,
To-day, full often do His angels walk
Too close for nearness; while His grieved ones talk
Of all the love that gladdened once the way,
God "gives His angels charge," and glad surprise
Breaks swift through sorrow. From their clouded eyes,
The shadows flee; they walk in God's new day,
Yet walk alone no more, nor weep, nor moan;
Seeing from far His kingdom come, His throne
Set in the midst of nations; and the strife
For the "Great Cause" ended—in endless life.

CONDOLENCES AND TRIBUTES.

Telegrams and letters to the number of 600 have been received to date at Rest Cottage, and every mail brings a large number. It is probable that no other personal bereavement has ever received so hearty, spontaneous and abundant sympathy. So beautiful are all the letters that a selection has been very difficult. The desire influencing the following extracts was to bring out strongly the characteristic attributes of the deceased, and also the triumphant assurances of victory over death and reunion with Christ and dear ones.

MY VERY DEAR FRIEND:—I know what it is to lose a mother—a loss I have never forgotten. But how much we have to be thankful for in the blessed assurance that all is well with our dear one! I am sure the calling home of thy blessed mother will only stimulate thee in thy work for the living. We can leave our dead with the Lord. They are safe with Him. His blessing be upon thee! Ever affectionately thy friend,

Hampton Falls, N. H. JOHN G. WHITTIER.

MY DEAR MISS WILLARD:—No stricken heart ever had such world-wide sympathy as have you; you are enveloped in the prayers of thousands, and thousands of loving hearts mourn with you. To me it comes as a sore personal loss, it seems like parting with my own mother over again. I believe those two will find each other out in heaven. And I am so grieved not to have been with her at the last. The one great thing which made me hate to go to Japan was the fear that I should never see her again. Yet, somehow, she seems nearer me than before.

Astoria, Ore. MARY ALLEN WEST.

May God comfort you as He alone can! Many thousands of prayers are being offered for you and among them mine. I am sure, however, that your great bereavement will lift you to a supreme height of spiritual transfiguration and that you will never come down from it. Multitudes of your personal friends in many lands mingle their tears with yours and also their thanksgiving for the wonderfully fruitful life of your blessed and now sainted mother. Her presence was an inspiration. But I doubt not that she is nearer to you now than she ever was before. Her mission as guardian and ministering spirit has just begun. JOSEPH COOK.

Ticonderoga, N. Y.

I know the thought of her happiness, as a spirit freed from the encumbering clay, will cause you to forget your own loneliness. Can you not hear her say, "If ye love me ye will rejoice!" MRS. G. H. COOK.

Cliff Seat, Ticonderoga, N. Y.

We have just received our first word about the angels' visit to Rest Cottage. Silence is golden now, only know we pray for you and love you. JOHN G. WOOLLEY.

Rest Island, Minn.

Eternal youth has set its seal upon her brow. What would not you or I give to know what she knows now. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man" the glories that hath been revealed unto her. Yes, it is well with her, none of us can doubt that. It is one of the things we are assured of. . . . My spirit is bowed in sorrow for you to-night, but somehow I feel, of all the women I know you can bear your bereavement the best, for you are a woman of the people. Every woman is your sister, and every man your brother. All hearts will go out in sympathy for you and your sorrow will be their sorrow. Who would have thought a year ago this time that before the September moon of 1892 should light the world with beauty, the youngest and the oldest members at Rest Cottage would have passed into the glory of the unseen. Truly we see but one step before us. MATILDA B. CARSE.

Algonquin, Franklin County, N. Y.

How glad I am for her, and how sorry for you when you are on the human side of your loss. But from the other side, you too are glad, I am certain. After all I did not see her but shall, sometime. MARY A. LATHBURY.

Twilight Park, Haines Falls, N. Y.

Your home over there is so radiant with happy smiles of welcome and gladness that our beloved "Saint Courageous" is now safely resting there. That blessed woman, how we all loved her—how we were all made better by the holy influence of her life. The fragrance of such a life cannot die. So your mother will still be a presence in your home. A. R. KNOX,

Janesville, Wis. [Miss Willard's first teacher.]

It may be a comfort for you to think she is at rest, that she is happy and all that, but it will not be

"The touch of a vanished hand,"

"The sound of a voice that is still."

Chicago. CAROLINE B. BUELL.

The whole world loves you for the honor you always paid your mother, and the whole world will revere the memory of that womanly mother and motherly woman who helped so tenderly to keep you constantly girded for conflict for "God and Home and All Lands." Yours,

Evanston, Ill. F. CLATWORTHY.

Your dear mother has had in her day an unusual share of the comfort and delight that makes glad this life, and yet her longing to go tells us that she had learned that

" . . . life at best,
With all its joys is not our rest."

South Evanston, Ill. WILLIAM H. HOLMES.

May yet another of your myriad friends scattered around the white-ribbon-belted world, tender to you heartfelt sympathy in the separation of you and your noble mother—so well named—"Saint Courageous."

Springfield, Ill. EVA MUNSON SMITH.

I shall ever remember the mother and daughter as one and yet two. MRS. HOMER A. NELSON.

Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

You have the sympathy of the hearts of the intelligent world, probably of more hearts than any bereaved private home ever had before. E. L. PARKS.

Kyte River, Ill.

I have learned a lesson from her in these past years, the immeasurable influence of a grand, true life, nobly lived, even when great activity is not possible in many directions, that to be is better than to do, and this morning I am thinking of what her life must be now, with all these earth limitations removed. MARION H. DUNHAM.

Burlington, Ia.

God is alive and not dead. He is near to you, and I am sure that as the blessed mother mounted the ramparts of heaven, she turned to look back upon you. Are you not happy that you are not to stay here forever? "Forever with the Lord" is the promise. How glad I am that He who made the earth knows how earthy we are, and how we need Him. ARTHUR EDWARDS.

Chicago.

She is young and strong now, and you will take up the work she loved and you will do just as she would wish you to do. You will rest because she would say "rest awhile," and then you will work, and you will take every good gift God gives you to help to the work that is for you to do.

Intervale, N. H. MARGARET BOTTOME.

I know that we can actually lift a portion of the oppressive weight which crushes, by sharing that sorrow, that weight of sorrow with the stricken one. What must be your helps with the heart of the Christian world, the whole world, lifting your burden, and your dear Lord, so very dear to your sainted ones now with Him in glory, lifting it too! I am so thankful to have had the blessedness of meeting your dear mother, and almost as she was stepping into her heavenly home. God grant you His peace.

San Francisco, Cal. ANNIE K. BIDWELL.

Ten thousand pray-ers are your stout allies. Of these, herself and I are one—in this hour as always. It strengthens us to have the sweet privilege of tears and prayers with you. In truest sympathy, faithfully yours,

Bethesda, O. ALFRED A. WRIGHT.

Her presence with the redeemed in paradise can still be an inspiration to you. Being dead she yet speaketh. Praise the Lord. MARY GRANT CRAMER.

East Orange, N. J.

Rejoice and be exceeding glad for great is her reward in heaven.

Rejoice that you had her so long.

Rejoice for the usefulness of her life, and its wide influence for good.

Rejoice that her life was made so happy by your life.

Rejoice in the good that you can do and in the thought that her spirit will be with you.

Rejoice in her reunion.

Rejoice and be exceeding glad for great shall be your reward in heaven. O. B. Bird.

Vineland, N. J.

In the name of the Pacific Coast Women's Press Association, I tender you our heartfelt sympathy upon your bereavement. While in session this afternoon there came to us the announcement that your blessed mother had "put on immortality." It seemed that a sense of personal loss has come to each member of our dear circle. "But for such a mother there had not been such a daughter," said all. Nellie Blessing Eyster.

San Francisco, Cal.

The sorrow is but for a day. How fast we go trooping on to meet the Beloved and our beloved.

Poughkeepsie, N. Y. Emory J. Haynes, D. D.

In this, your hour of affliction, may you be upheld by the everlasting arms and comforted "as one whom his mother comforteth." Charles N. Crittendon.

San Francisco, Cal.

Your blessed mother is enjoying her first Sabbath in heaven. She has met the loved ones. Oh, the meetings and the greetings! It is all brightness there, this beautiful Sabbath morning, in the Paradise of God.

San Francisco, Cal. Sarah B. Cooper.

I am glad for you that duties are ever pressing, so the hours must be full. Friends, with the tenderest affection, seem only to reach the edge of the heartache which comes when the dearest of earth has been taken away. May the Spirit of God comfort and strengthen your heart.

Chautauqua, N. Y. Caroline A. Leech.

She has "come to her grave in a full age like as a shock of corn cometh in his season." "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble." "Send thee help from the sanctuary, and strengthen thee out of Zion."

Cottage City, Mass. Sarah A. McClees.

My heart almost gives thanks this morning that the beautiful saint on earth is now a saint in heaven. Gone home without suffering any of the infirmities of age. Only translated. Blessed be the name of the Lord.

Dorchester, Mass. Susan G. Fessenden.

I pray earnestly that the work which she so loved, and about which she so often wisely counseled, may be to you a blessing now, in filling at least in part the vacancy in your heart. God knows how to comfort you and "A bruised reed He will not break." Josephine R. Nichols.

Indianapolis, Ind.

How beautiful her life and abundant entrance into glory unending! Lucia E. F. Kimball.

Woodfords, Me.

May you in your great work know more fully the mind and guidance of Christ through this strong link which unites you anew to Him. Ella H. C. Kellogg.

Rochester, N. Y.

We all loved your mother and revere her memory because of the life that she has given to us, and while your heart will be drawn more closely to the "circle that is widening in the sky" we know that it will find its sweetest comfort in blessing others. Julia C. Turnbull.

St. John, N. B.

May God bless you in this new trial and grant abundant comfort through His Holy Spirit. Anna C. Singer.

Spokane, Wash.

Never surely had a daughter a nobler mother, so intellectually rich, so full of spiritual wealth and so blessed in the result of her parental care. With prayer that you may be sustained in your great work,

Montreal, Can. Geo. Douglas.

The days go by and the sun sinks, and at last we are all at home, at peace, safe from all harm. In the meantime our soul's energies are tested, for through our weak endeavor the world is to be made better.

Lancaster, Pa. Emilie D. Martin.

Jesus, whose spirit is love and service, will surely send now the reflow of His love and service to you; and the mother loved send back her own sweet message of "a cheer across the wave." Robert Halloway.

Alexis, Ill.

I know that every white ribbon in Tennessee rests over an aching heart to-day because of your loss.

Memphis, Tenn. Lide Meriwether.

From a heart that knows all the sorrow of living here with a mother "there," I congratulate you—while I condole—on your heritage. Such a life, such a mother, such an eternity before you. Mrs. C. H. Johnson.

Flint, Mich.

With a world of people remaining, to whom your presence and deeds are a continued and growing benefaction, it seems to me that with father and mother, sister and brother gone before, no shadows darken the present, but those cherished ones of the past are transferred and await you in a glad and sunlit future.

Chicago, Ill. Alanson Stewart Appleton.

You will be brave because of your faith, because of your dear mother's teaching, because of what you will be to others in sorrow, and because you are sheltered in the cleft of the "Rock of Ages" that will hide you in the lonely hours. Your dear mother was an inspiration to me, spiritually and intellectually. Knowing her has made me a stronger and better woman. Franc E. Finch.

Evanston, Ill.

How sweet to realize, as you must, that hundreds of hearts now turn to you with a love and sympathy which words cannot express, and that all over our land, and in other lands, your name is mentioned to our Father with loving tenderness. Elizabeth W. Greenwood.

Chapenville, Conn.

Your mother was to us the very perfection of humanity, and we think of her as going home not through "the valley of the shadow," but like Moses, from the very mountain tops of Nebo. She had viewed the promised land from the highest peaks a long while, she was near it and had a foretaste here of its glories. May the Father comfort you and bless you, and give you the strength to "take up the burden of life" as bravely as you have done in the past. Nannie A. Munnell.

Louisville, Ky.

That the love of our Father which has ever overshadowed you may now envelop you more completely than ever, is the prayer of your true and sympathizing friend,

Streator, Ill. Mrs. L. H. Plumb.

Thousands of women, whom in the peculiar type of your leadership you draw by cords of love, give you a sister's sympathy. We have been entering into the fellowship of this grief as we saw it coming.

Western Springs, Ill. Esther Tuttle Pritchard.

I know your noble mother becâme clothed upon with immortality in her own sweet, dignified way, and that your loneliness and sense of bereftness are the only causes for sympathy. Geo. C. Hall.

New York City.

I am beginning to see even clearer than ever before that He, whose power can reverse the action of any wheel, works all things together for good to us.

Green Brier, Tenn. Elizabeth Scovel.

I know the depth of your loss; and I know, too, how only the presence of the Great Comforter can lighten the "loneliness of sorrow." That He will do, for has He not promised? "Lo, I am with you alway."

Chicago. Jennie A. Stewart.

Your esteemed mother was beloved not alone by her own family circle and by those who knew her best, but by all white-ribboners. To her surely belongeth the promise "to him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne." Mary A. Babcock.

Monmouth, Ill.

I have honored her for your sake, as well as for her own noble character, and the W. C. T. U. shares your grief and loss. J. E. Sibley.

Bath, Ga.

Out of my own sorrow my heart goes to you in tenderest sympathy for the loss of your all.

Lawrence, Kan. Mrs. S. F. Grubb.

How solid was her faith! How clear her vision! How boundless her charity for us youngsters! How kind her words of encouragement! Not many like her touch the springs of one's best ambitions! She was an inspiration to do and dare more and higher every time I saw her.

Auburndale, Mass. Charles Bragdon.

In leaving you what a solace it must have been to the great-hearted mother to feel that by God's blessing her daughter had become a nation's pride and the well-beloved of all whose aims in life are high and noble.

Elmhurst, Ill. Jane Byrd Bryan.

All your sisterhood grieves with you, and if human sympathy can avail aught, we would help you bear your sorrow. Narcissa White Kinney.

Astoria, Ore.

You will, from this on, feel that there is one more spirit in and around and over you, beckoning you on to heights yet to be reached. Susan B. Anthony.

Rochester, N. Y.

I know these hours have in them "the radiance from afar." The glow of all she is and has been and to which she has gone will rest upon your life henceforth as the afterlight upon the hills when the sun has set at last.

Lady Henry Somerset.

God be praised for such a woman, such a life, and such a death. R. H. McDonald.

Catskill, N. Y.

Not far away. And "are they not all ministering spirits?" "Rest Cottage is a joyous place" because of her. She is with you. Cheer up, sad heart, and journey on. Ever at thy side is the gentle, brave, strong mother—heart and hand, guiding and ever beckoning onward. Not long the journey, but great the work for God and Home and Native Land. Courage! Do not falter.

Evanston, Ill. Ella H. Delano.

Beautiful, sacrificing, firm, she has kept your lighthouse, and sent you forth—only to be anxiously watched and prayed for. She was—if anybody saw and talked with her ten minutes, an explanation of yourself. "The band of ribbon white around the world" was woven by her hands first of all. H. A. Delano.

Evanston, Ill.

Her life seemed so complete, so harmoniously ended—because so truly lived. To have known her is already an inspiration and a benediction, making one long to grow old as she did—to know that the best is yet to be—the last for which the first was made.

Evanston, Ill. Mary E. McDowell.

Few lives have been so whole and rounded as that of your honored mother, and now that you stand in a deeper sense than ever before face to face with life and eternity, her memory will always be a comfort and inspiration.

Evanston, Ill. Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Pearson.

We know how desolate the earthly home must seem without her, but how few, my dear friend, have such a precious legacy of holy memories left them as it is thy privilege to enjoy. In thankfulness for these, and strengthened and guided and comforted by Him who was the all-sufficient helper of thy dear mother through the many vicissitudes of her life, may thy remaining days continue to be full of blessing and of blessed service.

Hampton Falls, N. H. Gertrude W. Cartland.

The peace of God be with you, as I know it is with your dear mother. Sarah Hackett Stevenson.

Polo, Ill.

May I not hope that even amid the sympathetic murmur of all the world's workers of good, my reverent tribute to your noble mother may have its place?

Chicago. Lorado Taft.

In your mother there has been exemplified the grand possibilities of a true motherhood. Who can imagine what this world would be with such a mother at the head of every home? Heaven would indeed begin below. Does it not seem to you as each friend passes beyond the pearly portals that they are left a little wider open each time, so that as we draw nearer to them we may catch some glimpses of a new glory, some new and tender strain of heaven's rapture. L. D. Carhart.

Marion, Iowa.

We have but one mother, and you had a remarkable one, and a brother, too—a great favorite of mine, whose memory is precious to me. The world will now seem lonely to you, but our dear ones live and wait for our coming. Franklin W. Fisk.

Lake Geneva, Wis.

We were all with you in thought on Tuesday when you were laying out of sight the empty casket which had so long been the shrine of your beloved.

Somerton, Phila. Rachel Foster Avery.

We know the memories which come to you from time to time from out a past so hallowed by sacred associations will have a sweetness of utterance beyond any words of living friends and yet we would join the many who rejoice in your joys and weep with you in your sorrows. We feel assured that He to whom you have been so faithful in your life work, and of whom 'tis said "faithfulness is the girdle of His reins," will not forsake you but be your greatest comfort. Geo. W. Bain

Keuka College, N. Y. Anna M. Bain.

Please allow me to express my sympathy for you in this hour of your great sorrow. I pray that He who "doeth all things well" will guide and keep you and give you an everlasting crown of glory.

Chicago. James B. Hobbs.

The whole world is in sympathy with you, I know, but I cannot help telling you how dear to me had become the name of dear Mother Willard, as I fondly called her. Such a beautiful life and triumphant death is rare.

Auburndale, Mass. Mary E. Gordon.

It is impossible to sever these ties of love without sorrow, but thanks to the kind Father who has given a healing in time, and a promise of restoration, and compensation in the home beyond. This for us here, and oh, what joy to the one who sleeps to awake in His likeness. Be assured of my sympathy and confidence in you. May you be kept in perfect peace. Mrs. J. P. St. John.

Olathe, Kan.

The day is done and the twilight that falls upon Rest Cottage casts a shadow deep and dark; out of the darkness, by faith, behold a new star to light thee heavenward.

Evanston, Ill. Edward S. Taylor.

I am so glad I saw your mother when I passed through Chicago on my way here. She seemed so well, so bright and so dignified and also so loving. I was a little envious of you then, not on account of your pretty study, your hosts of friends or your fame, but because you had kept your mother longer than I had kept mine.

MARGARET E. WINSLOW.

When sunshine changes to shadow even in the early dim of bereavement, the resurrection promises fill our lives or hearts with the blessed peace. My own dear mother is recovering from quite a severe attack of sickness; the fever is passing away, and we hope she will be up again in a few days—but I know you will accept my loving sympathy until she is able to write to you.

MARIE T. RIVES.

Hillsboro, O. [Mother Thompson's daughter.]

Your mother is not lost, only gone before. Her influence will still console. Her love will never less be yours than in the days of her life. SARAH J. WHEELER.

Nantasket Beach, Mass.

In your grief accept my love and sympathy. May God comfort you now and keep you always.

New York City. MARY T. BURT.

One might well covet the precious memories of such a noble mother. What a legacy! That the Arms of Love may be about you to sustain and comfort, shall be the prayer of your sincere friend,

Chicago. MARY MARILLA HOBBS.

How could we measure His love but for this love? He knows best. Heart-strings are leaders in God's hands, to gently, lovingly guide us apace heavenward.

Mansfield, O. FRANCES W. LEITER.

Our loved ones may "step forward" joyously, even triumphantly, but for a season there must come to us tears and heartaches, and for all time a pitiful, painful silence which no sound except the sound of our beloved's voice can break. But tears and heartaches and the silence conspire to work out for us an eternal weight of glory.

Chicago. LOUISE S. ROUNDS.

I can almost see her for heaven is nearer than Evanston, and as one of the redeemed who have come to that heavenly home out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, "to her is granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white;" she sees the face, at last, of Him whom she so loved and served here, and His Name is in her forehead. Don't you wonder what that name is? May it not be "Saint Courageous"? Ah, my sorrowing sister, I know you love her too much to want her to stay away from all the glory that awaited her; I know you are not repining, but with a new light in your face, a new song in your heart, you are coming out from under the shadow of your great grief radiant with the light of your new experience of the power and the goodness of your God, into a new sweetness in your life, a still more glorious consecration to the place of duty and of glad, Christ-like obedience and service.

Louisville, Ky. JENNIE CASSEDAY.

"The Lord bless thee, and keep thee; the Lord make His face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee."

The Temple, Chicago. RUBY I. GILBERT.

As one wrote to us of mother, so of your precious one —"she has pointed out the way to the only source of all comfort long ago in her works, and most of all in her life, and you have a well-worn path to your Saviour to walk in." MARY C. BANART.

Brookline, Mass.

The Evanston W. C. T. U. has delegated to us the sacred office of conveying to you their deepest sympathy, in the greatest bereavement which will ever come to you—the loss of the visible presence of your honored mother. She was our oldest and best beloved member, and revered counselor; upon whose decision we rested our most difficult matters, in perfect trust and satisfaction. We thank God for her life, which has strengthened and instructed us in the following of Christ and we pledge ourselves anew to the service of God and Humanity.

GERTRUDE M. SINGLETON.

Evanston, Ill. KATHARINE A. JACKSON.

God be very gracious to thee, and comfort thee "as one whom his mother comforteth." ESTHER T. HOUSH.

Brattleboro, Vt.

I am glad to say that I have met her, for no one can know such a character without feeling morally uplifted and her good works will follow her.

Chicago. MARY SHUFELDT.

Is there another such gift in this world as a loving, "old-fashioned" mother? Thank God for that older fashioned yet of immortality. MRS. R. H. KERR.

Birmingham, Ala.

We see her to-day in the mind's eye clearly, radiant in her power of good will to all; her influence, her spirit of life and light as strong as when in the mortal form. She is our bright morning star.

Lincoln, Neb. H. C. AND ADA M. BITTENBENDER.

How marvelous His power to so intoxicate us with His Spirit that we become insensible to the griefs and pains of this mortal state! "Be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess (French version—dissolution), but be filled with the Spirit." FANNY D. NELSON.

Nashville, Tenn.

A beautiful life, rounded, full, complete, has closed on earth and opened in greater beauty in the sunlight of heaven, to bloom forever beside the throne of Christ, our Elder Brother. D. W. ENGLISH.

Quincy, Ill. W. F. ENGLISH.

To Miss Katherine Willard:

We read in the papers of your grandmother's going. I can readily imagine it was very solemn and very beautiful to you. There cannot be much sadness about the peaceful passing away of one growing so very old who has lived as your grandmother and my grandmother lived, but they leave terribly vacant places behind them. I trust you will tell your Aunt Frank how deeply I sympathize with her in her loneliness, and that you all may know that I am very sorry.

FRANCES FOLSOM CLEVELAND.

Buzzard's Bay, N. J.

There are times when the anticipation of the joy of the meeting by and by almost overcomes me, and my heart sings with gladness, so I trust your grief and pain at parting may be overcome by the anticipation of the happy meeting by and by, and with the thought of your beloved mother's happiness in being with Jesus, and the other loved ones who have gone on before.

Tacoma, Wash. MELINDA A. SHAFFER.

Human love is comforting. Remember we love you; that you are to us a most sweet sister, and a type of loveliness and force and progressiveness to which the whole world is in debt. MRS. LAURA M. JOHNS.

Salina, Kan.

My heart keeps very still in prayer for you to the dear Father, as I think what it must mean to you to be left alone. I feel a thrill of holy joy, when I remember what it means to her to be this Sabbath day in glory!

New York City. J. ELLEN FOSTER.

Oh, the joy of such a life! the grandeur of such a character! the magnificence of such a consummation! Oh, the inestimable legacy of such a womanhood and motherhood! She was so gentle and so strong, so tender and so true. I have no doubt you feel now, and shall ever feel about you the embrace of those strong arms. I shall never forget my first visit with her nor any visit since. She always refreshed me. SYLVESTER T. JONES.

[Madam Willard's pastor for five years.]

Cottage City, Mass.

No amount of preparation can help us to bear these shocks, and words seem very empty of consolation in the face of such a sorrow. Nevertheless I cannot refrain from sending a line to say that the hearts of all your friends are with you in your bereavement. You should feel sustained by the love of countless numbers whom you have helped in their times of sorrow and trouble—you who are always so near the great heart of humanity.

Chicago. BERTHA HONORE PALMER.

You and she are still one among the things which are real and eternal, and the land that she is in is not very far off. So I can only wish you joy in all the sweet thought of her, so much a part of all your past, and a great anticipation in your future. ALICE FREEMAN PALMER.

Boxford, Mass.

How I praise God for your precious mother's rich ripeness and readiness of heart and mind to depart this life, which she so often expressed. MATTIE M. GORDON.

Green Brier, Tenn. (en route.)

I somehow feel your life is to be richer and broader from this on He would not take your mother from you unless He had some greater blessing ready for you.

Cleveland, O. J. JENNIE DOTY.

I have been with you all these sad days. I am thankful you could be blessed so long with a mother like yours.

Metcalf, Mass. KATE SANBORN

Sadly will be missed her noble presence, her wise words and loving deeds, but we like to believe her hallowed influence will ever enrich Rest Cottage and rest like a benediction upon its inmates. Happy they who knew and loved Madam Willard! EMMA C. BASCOM.

Williamstown, Mass.

Dear "Saint Courageous" went to meet her Lord at the very dawn of the Sabbath day, and to you what a hallowed day it will ever be. HENRIETTA L. MONROE.

Xenia, O.

"Saint Courageous" was a kind of mother to us all. Her gracious words have been a blessing to the world. Her loving loyalty to our cause, in so often permitting us to enjoy the presence and counsel of our "Chieftain" at conventions and public gatherings, with so much of self-denial on your part, should make this an occasion for gratitude and thanksgiving to the dear Lord.

Des Moines, Iowa. ANNA M. PALMER.

Knowing how deeply you loved your sainted mother and for how many years you have been wrapped up in each other, I can understand somewhat the terrible blank and loneliness her promotion will mean to you.

MAUDE B. BOOTH.

New York City. [The Salvation Army.]

What a lovely life, what a lovely age, what a heritage to her child! PROF. SUE M. D. FRY.

Le Sueur, Minn.

To be a child of such a mother is now a compensation, and that part of the human race seeking the betterment of the world rejoices that God gave the mother, and we shall ever bless and honor her memory, and pray God's benison on the daughter. E. T. SCOTT.

Santa Cruz, Cal.

A perfected, glorified life, matured, rounded, finished on earth, begun in heaven. Ah, we should not weep for beautified lives—for glorified saints. Never, never! But with pride and gladness remember they were ours. We were theirs. "Were?" No. Are! Nothing has changed. They have only gone before. CLARA C. HOFFMAN.

Bainbridge, O.

To the W. C. T. U. she was as Phanuel's daughter—the aged prophetess, who for these long years has departed not from the temple, but has served the Lord with watchings and prayers night and day. We, at a distance, only saw her now and then at the great feasts in the court of the women and near as possible to the Great Altar. You saw her daily at the altar of incense, ministering and offering the morning and evening sacrifice. The worship will continue but the priestess of the household has gone forever. Yet the Shekinah remains, the spiritual presence will still hover about its old abode and make itself felt through cords never touched in the earthly life.

Emory College, Oxford, Ga. H. A. SCOMP.

"I enter into it all vicariously," she said to me, "and I often think I enjoy it more than Frances does; for she is too busy to take it all in." I hope for humanity's sake it will be a long time before you go to her in the "Bright Beyond." But when you do, there, as well as here, I am sure she will point out for you many joys upon which you may enter, because she reached Home first.

Charleston, S. C. S. F. CHAPIN.

Comparatively few knew her personally, yet all knew her, loved her, quoted her, would have done anything for her pleasure or assistance, and all had in mind an ideal of her. She was a spiritual force in the W. C. T. U.

Melrose, Mass. MARY A. LIVERMORE.

A request reached me from Miss Willard that I go to Rest Cottage to consult with her on matters of business. When admitted on the afternoon of August 2, I learned that a decided change had been noticed in the condition of Madam Willard, and to all appearances she could stay but a few hours longer. "But it is marvelous how she talks; we are all æstheticised," said Miss Willard. She talked incessantly, and her utterances were of spiritual things, of haste to depart, or so amusing that one could but smile. Passing into the sacred precincts of her room, I looked for the last time upon the wasted form—the chrysalis of an imprisoned soul, and a longing to be so near a perfect rest could not be resisted. To words of congratulation and the assurance that she would have a glorious entrance she replied with gratitude and good cheer, and we exchanged "farewell" until we should meet beyond. "She doesn't want me to live as long as she has lived," said Miss Willard. To which I replied: "You cannot, you work too hard." "And here is another who works hard, mother," was the response, as Miss Willard laid her hand upon my shoulder.

Every word Madam Willard spoke to me was a word of encouragement or appreciation. Sacred memory. "The sheet anchor of Miss Willard is removed, and consequently the sheet anchor of the National W. C. T. U.," was my involuntary cry. How much her departure means to us, individual members of the white ribbon host in far away places, who can measure?

The Temple, Chicago. FANNY H. RASTALL.

"Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?" Yea, indeed with keenest sorrow we do know that the life which has flowed like a great river fructifying all its borders has gone out into the boundless sea of immortality.

Hers was that rarest life which had a cultured intellect, a quick power of observance, a keen discrimination, a heart divinely equipped for life or for death, a faith immutably centered upon God and His word, and which held in calm, serene equipoise of soul a complete mental control up to the threshold of four-score years and ten. The fact that for many months I came in and out at her home at all hours has turned to me so many of the facets of the marvelous cutting of her character, that I am asked to give a brief glimpse of some of them, just a faint, reverential, affectionate picture.

Was it the morning worship, listen to the "favorite" hymns, and there were many, but it was only the best poetry, the finest sentiment that had that title. The prayer of this blessed saint at this hour was more communion than supplication, and the absent were always remembered in this talking face to face with God.

Later, I see her tall, commanding figure, with so little visible weight of years, framed in the doorway of Miss Willard's Den as from the morning paper, in which she kept step with the pace of the whole world, she brought some special item, or from the books which she read with the zest of youth she gave a thought.

The grace of the noon hour meal brought the world-wide force of the white-ribboners always into remembrance before the throne, and I always felt that the prophetic influence of that voice must vibrate the world around.

Were there afternoon callers in the parlor each must learn some lesson from that store of wisdom in whose presence was never small talk or gossip.

Was it the Sunday evening "sing," those hours seem the very entrance to the gates of pearl as hymn after hymn, the "favorites" again, were sung to the accompaniment on the piano by Anna Gordon.

In the ordinary conversation there was only the best and highest thought, but lighted with the keenest wit and quickest flashes of humor, like sunshine on snow, so scintillating and bright.

Did some of our hearts need mothering, how quickly that great mother heart responded, and now how doubly bereaved we are as we have lost another mother, so ready, so sympathetic was she to us.

Whatever might be the object of interest in the house she entered into it with zest and appreciation; hers was a dignity to which all interests might be carried.

But my narrow limitations do not at all suffice for justice to this most remarkable woman. We find old age does not necessarily impair the faculties, nor use nor years dim the powers. To have known Madam Willard intimately, to have been admitted to the inner sanctuary of her life, is a rare privilege indeed; to associate with such mental breadth, to drop my little plummet into such spiritual depth, is of itself a liberal education.

COME, LET US ANEW.

BY CHARLES WESLEY.

[Last two verses sung by the household around Madam Willard's bedside, when she repeated—"Eternity, that's what I want."]

COME, let us anew our journey pursue,
Roll round with the year,
And never stand still till the Master appear.
His adorable will let us gladly fulfill,
And our talents improve,
By the patience of hope and the labor of love.

O that each in the day of his coming may say,
"I have fought my way through;
I have finished the work Thou didst give me to do!"
O that each from his Lord may receive the glad word,
"Well and faithfully done!
Enter into My joy and sit down on My throne!"

Our life is a dream; our time, as a stream,
Glides swiftly away,
And the fugitive moment refuses to stay.
The arrow is flown—the moment is gone;
The millennial year
Rushes on to our view and eternity's here.

IN EXTREMIS.

BY JOSEPH COOK.

BETTER to go than stay,
I would not live alway;
If pardon through heaven's grace is won,
Be heaven this hour begun.

Almighty God, give peace,
In swift or slow release;
My empty, frail, poor hand in Thine,
Thy sight and strength are mine.

The glory of Thy deeds,
The highest heaven exceeds;
Thyself, Thyself more glorious still—
My bliss to do Thy will!

The world is out of joint;
Swift messengers appoint
To set it wholly right, and I
In serving them, will die.

And after death, my soul,
As the vexed ages roll,
Do Thou as ransomed spirit send Man's miseries to mend.

Great mansions in the sky
Hast Thou for loyalty;
Life, hope, peace, strength, atonement now,
My all in all art Thou!

Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world.—Matt. 28: 20.

TWICE in less than a year has THE UNION SIGNAL issued a memorial number—the first one for one of its editors, Miss Julia A. Ames, and this one for the mother of its editor-in-chief who, it must be understood, has had no part in its composition other than furnishing material at the request of her loyal coadjutors in the editorial rooms. Madam Willard said with great earnestness on one of the last days of her life, "I have ardently desired to take a little of the harm out of death in my own departure. I have prayed all my life to this end, and now if I can only make it seem less dreary to the living, it will be an added and the final blessing of my history." Because she was divinely helped to do this in a manner so remarkable, her daughter as well as the office editors feel it to be a duty no less than a pleasure to share the knowledge with their fellow men and women of like faith. Hence the chief object in publishing so extended an account is to help everybody to be less afraid of life's last hour. Lack of space only has prevented the publication of more extracts from the beautiful letters which are arriving daily at Rest Cottage. These will all be acknowledged in another way. Some of the rich material that has been crowded out of these columns will appear in subsequent issues of the paper. For a full account of the funeral services read the editorial, "Last Loving Rites," in THE UNION SIGNAL of August 18. The supplement, with the beautiful composite picture of Rest Cottage and its family, will doubtless be cherished as a valuable souvenir, particularly as its shape is suitable for framing.

A GREAT SUNSET.

WE have never heard or read in history of a more wonderful going to heaven than that which crowned the life of "Saint Courageous." It was the full and fit crescendo of her character. Of ample physique, dignified bearing, deep, rich voice and gracious manners, it was to have been expected that this woman, who, after seventy years of age attained a national reputation as unexpected to herself as it was merited in the judgment of others, should have had a beautiful sunset to her full, rich day of life. But none of those who loved her, could have dreamed of such glory as that sunset was to display, so that her last days "left along the mountain tops of death a light that makes them lovely."

For two years there had been a very gradual decrease in physical strength, but as her daughter often playfully said, "Her five senses and her seven senses were perfect." When she ceased to be able to go to church or to look in upon the one or two neighbors nearest her, a temperance horse was bought—"Old John," famed for his service to the cause—and an easy carriage was presented to Miss Willard in which her mother was taken to ride on pleasant days. About ten months ago her appetite began to fail and steadily declined, until this spring, when nothing but her energy of will caused her to eat at all. She became, as summer deepened, so weak that she said, "To walk from my room into the Den (only two doors away) fatigues me so that I wish to ie down and rest." Her last appearanec was chronicled in the account of Anna Gordon's birthday fête, July 21, when Madam Willard sat on the Den balcony and, after the singing by the company assembled on the lawn below, of

"E'en down to old age
All my people shall prove,"

she rose and bowed.

One year before, our beautiful Yolande Ames had been foremost in congratulations to Miss Gordon, on that same anniversary, but now the youngest and the oldest members of the Rest Cottage family were soon to rejoin each other in heavenly habitations.

Miss Willard has kept careful record of her mother's last days and placed it in our hands with permission to make such extracts as our space permitted and our judgment advised. We know they will be read with profound interest by white-ribboners the world around.

MOTHER'S LAST DAYS.

AUGUST 8, 1892.

Sitting here alone in the Den this bright August morning, where I have so often sat dictating with my blessed mother lying on the lounge and occasionally putting in a word, I wish to set in order, as best I may, the history of her illness.

Coming of a remarkably long-lived stock, among whom eighty years and upwards was a frequent figure on the tombstone in the old cemetery, mother had remarkable vitality. When she was eighty-four years old she went to the National W. C. T. U. Convention in Battery D, Chicago, going down early in the morning so as to be present at the nine o'clock prayer-meeting. She stayed all day and seemed entirely equal to the excitement of her reception by our women, which was such as they accorded to no other, and to their personal salutations, which came to her by hundreds.

I often asked if she did not feel "the weight of years," but she said, no she had no pain,—no sense of weakness, except a little uncertainty in walking. During her whole life she had no organic difficulties whatever, but was always of a noticeably small appetite. Four years ago she was for seven weeks ill with La Grippe, from which she perhaps never wholly recovered so as to regain the same physical tone she had enjoyed up to that time. In the spring she had always exhibited more lassitude than at other times, and this spring she was in a languishing condition though her inexorable will power caused her to rise, as had been her life-long custom, earlier than any other person in the house, so that the click of the front door as she opened it to get the morning paper at about half-past six or seven, often an hour earlier, was the first sound in the household. At the breakfast table she would mention the principal news items she had gleaned from the morning Inter Ocean, and she would take her cup of coffee, with a little oatmeal and fish, but she would tell us at every meal, "I do this as a matter of duty. I force down this food as with a probang." Two weeks before she left us, as she lay here on her lounge in the Den, she said to me, "I feel as I did before you were born. How well I remember my anxiety so long ago! What I realize now is exactly the same. Death is but another birth and I am about to be born into a better world. I am straitened until this be accomplished and I shall be in travail from now on until my heavenly birth." She said this with the utmost serenity, but with great earnestness. Astonished by her words, I said, "Mother, dear, you cannot know—none of us can know when God is coming for us and I can't bear to have you be so sure about it."

But she answered, "I know what I am saying, and you will see that it will all come true. Food is the only material that can furnish the vital forces to make the machinery of the body go on; to 'make its wheels go 'round.' I am like an engine whose fires are out already. It is now only a question of how long my vitality and the nutrition that the body itself will furnish can hold me here. I have lived long, happily and without pain. It is a beautiful time to go, and you must see what a blessed thing it is for me and I really think a better thing for you. I have never been a hindrance in your work and I have always prayed that I might not be, but if I should go on drawing out my life as I now am it would be neither a blessing to me nor to you and it would hinder the work which you and I have always had so much at heart."

Mother said one morning, as she reclined on the lounge in the Den, a few days before she was taken sick, and when she was predicting to me that she would soon enter upon her last illness: "I tell you, Frank, the coming of Lady Henry lighted up the whole world like electricity. God sent her as much on my account as for your sake, and for the sake of the cause. I believe that the Lord sent her as surely as He made our moon. I think it was all planned on the other side to set this new planet in our sky. I think one reason was that I might leave the world in peace. I feared I must live to be ninety or more years old, and the weight of years would have become very heavy; but for your sake it seemed to me that I must stay. You would be so lonely as the last of our family. I should not now be content except I know that she will not only give you the strength that I could not at my age, but she will also give you the love and sympathy without which you could not live, and which you have always had from me. It would be almost unbearable to leave you if this were not the case. The problem was upon us; in a few years I had to go, or you; one must be left alone. I could not bear to think of that. I could not endure to remain in the world after you had left it, but now that will not be, nor will you be so grievously alone as I had feared. I never think of you and Anna as separate; I expect you always to go on together just as you have done so long. But to breast the waves of this great reform, who can so well keep step with you as Lady Henry, for you are in perfect harmony of head, heart, hand, motive, enthusiasm and life. You could not have planned for this to be so if you had tried a thousand years. God had it to do, and He did it."

On Saturday, July 23, she said to Anna Gordon: "I wish you would brush my teeth and put them away in their box; I have no further use for them, I shall never taste food again." I said to mother, "Aren't you taking this matter into your own hands—will it not be thought that you, with your imperial will, decided to go and then went?" She looked hurt at this, and replied, "No one can say that of me, for I have nourished, and cherished, and fostered, and guarded my poor wayward appetite with all the ingenuity of which I was capable, but it has surely and steadily departed. There is nothing more to be said or done but to wait—just wait."

This was during the heated term, which mother said she did not mind, and that she felt sure she was the most comfortable one in the house. All through those trying days she was the picture of content lying on her pillows or sofa either in her sleeping room or mine. We had family prayers in her room, and she repeated with great emphasis as her verse, "God is love." Another morning her verse was, "Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me be with me where I am." When we read from the Bible and from great authors, as our custom is at family prayers, she would make some word of comment and greatly enjoyed the hymns that were her favorites, such as:

"I'm a pilgrim and I'm a stranger,
I can tarry, I can tarry but a night."

Or:

"Our life is a dream; our time, as a stream,
Glides swiftly away."

"Gently, Lord, O gently lead us."

"Lead, kindly light; amid the encircling gloom, Lead Thou me on."

"There are lonely hearts to cherish
While the days are going by."

I read her favorite poems, especially from Whittier—those exquisite delineations of his home people in "Snow Bound." She knew them all by heart, "The Eternal Goodness" and "My Psalm," which she said was her creed, and she repeated over and over,

"I have no works my faith to prove;
I do the little that I can
And plead His love for love."

July 16, 1892, is the date on which mother sent for Dr. Bragdon, saying playfully to us it was the first time in her life she had ever asked for a doctor for herself. When he came she told him that she would like to know if he could cure her of being eighty-eight years old.

About one week before she was taken really ill, so that she went no more to the table, mother said to me, as we were sitting on the piazza looking out over the sweet little lawn with its blooming hollyhocks, the vine-clad arbor and the horse chestnut trees from her old home. "Frank, there is a verse that keeps coming to my mind," and then she repeated it in her beautiful tones:

"His purposes shall ripen fast,
Unfolding every hour;
The bud may have a bitter taste,
But sweet shall be the flower."

"I think that is going to be the way with me, and that perhaps 'I'm nearer home now than I think.' "

About the 24th of July there were tokens of dysentery, which became the main feature of her illness, and in which she rejoiced, saying, "It is God's painless way of wearing out my thread of life." She was very bright and cheery, talking of home affairs and was most earnest in the hope which she expressed over and over again that she might keep up until her granddaughter, Katherine Willard, should get through with her two concerts. When the first occurred, on the evening of July 22, mother was able to come to tea; that was her last meal with us, and the last time she came down stairs. When the second occurred, one week from that time, she insisted on my going, and had my niece and myself come into the room that she might see how we were dressed.

During the first nights of her illness Anna Gordon and I, who slept just across the hall, were called by her whenever she wished us, then one of us slept on the lounge in her room, and on the 4th of August we sent for a nurse as mother had become so much weakened that she was not able to help herself much, and we wished skilled handling for the weary frame. Miss Beedy, who had been at Battle Creek with our friends, Dr. and Mrs. J. H. Kellogg, came that day and remained until the end, rendering us inestimable service by her skill, gentleness and devotion. On the 2d of August we thought mother was going. We gathered at her bedside, myself, Katherine Willard, Anna Gordon, Alice Briggs, Kate Jackson and Irene Fockler; we sent for her dear friend, Madam Bragdon, and Emma Lindberg, the stenographer, was present, of whom mother thought a great deal, and to whom she spoke very tenderly, and we had a record made of the things that mother said, so far as possible, the stenographer, keeping carefully out of sight, as we did not wish mother to have the least intimation of our action.

That night mother called me and said, "I want to know if I have it right about our lot, the order in which our graves are to be. I wish you to be beside me and according to my recollection that is the way it is." I then told her the order, and how often she and I had looked at the vacant place between my father's and my sister's graves and said, "Here we shall lie side by side who were the last to go;" and then we no doubt said in our hearts, "Which will be first?" and each wished that it might be herself.

Mother seemed perfectly content and said, "All right, that is just the way I thought it was," and went to sleep.

July 25.—Mother is very feeble but without pain. She has no fever, her head is perfectly clear and she is cheery and bright. I told her this morning, recounting the lives of her seven brothers and sisters, that it seemed to me that she had had more exemption from pain and more overwhelming mercies and gifts in all her long life (much longer than any of theirs) than they had had if all put together. Their painful diseases and hardships were in such contrast to her painless and successful life that we could not in this world account for it that the member of her family who was always considered the weakest, physically, should have been so fortunate in all respects from her cradle on. She said it was true, and that we could only have it explained when we reached the Better Country. She had no doubt but that it would all be made perfectly fair, just and right in their eyes and in those of all.

July 29.—She said to Anna: "How well it is that I am the one who is going and not Frank, for if she were to go before me all the light in this world would have died out, but as it is I leave the world while it is radiant with light to go to one still brighter."

July 30.—I said, "If you were not so cheery and beautiful this house would be clothed in sackcloth, but you keep telling us that you do not suffer pain at all, and you seem so full of brightness that it takes away our grief and makes us like yourself." She answered: "Well, God is here just as He has always been. Why shouldn't we be cheery where He is? Why should one be any other way?"

July 31.—"Mother," I said, "you have cured me of the fear of death. You never feared anything. When I was a little child, and we had terrible storms in Wisconsin I just put my head in your lap and you stroked my hair and sang hymns. You always said that if burglars came you should go straight after them and drive them out, and you have never had any dread of the dead or of death. You now seem so natural and bright about it all that I, who have a constitutional fear, find nothing whatever that is other than most wholesome and sunshiny in your presence, either by day or lying here on the lounge in the dark at night." And she who had known this peculiarity all my life, said with a faint smile: "It is a thing of temperament. I have known some of the most tenderly uplifted natures that had an inherent fear of what Shakespeare calls being 'we know not what, we know not where,' and that sleep of death, into which those dreams may come of which he speaks."

Aug. 1.—I told mother the doctor said one could live on peptonoids and we had tried to get her to take them for sometime before. She was willing and did her best, but at last she said she couldn't "take them any more than she could save a world."

Aug. 2.—This afternoon mother seemed to be very near her departure, but it proved to be a sinking spell.

About five o'clock I said to her: "Looking at the out lines of your face and the record that they furnish of your noble life I am reminded of what the German poet Schiller said when he was passing from this world and the question was asked him, 'How do you feel?' whereupon that great man replied, 'Calmer and calmer.'" Mother said, "I like that—that is just as he ought to have felt. It is like what your sister Mary said, 'So quiet, no noise.'"

She was fanned for hours by the young women who for years have been members of the family or workers in the office and who formed her circle of special friends and helpers.

Anna Gordon said, "Rest Cottage won't seem like home without you, beloved." Mother replied, "I have talked it all over with Frank, and there are enough resources left to make Rest Cottage a joyous place. When I go, I do not take all the resources with me, and I shall be often here."

Dr. Bragdon told her he was not going to let her go to heaven in such a hurry; and raising her finger, she said emphatically with a smile, "But the Lord is going to get ahead of you, Met," calling him by his home-name.

She spoke of Kate Jackson, who took me abroad in 1868, and who was with us all through these days of trial. "Kate," she said, "God sent you just when we needed you most, and you needed us. We have been blessings to each other for many a year."

She spoke of Anna Gordon, saying: "There is no language to tell what I think of her and that is why I have not tried. I have never known her equal in all kind and tender care." Later on I said to her: "If Anna had been your own daughter she could not have done half so well." Mother quickly saw the point and smiling said: "You are right, for although you are a most attentive nurse and willing, you have not the sleight of hand that Anna has; perhaps because you have not had so much experience, perhaps because you have not the talent for it." Then she said: "If you want to fan a little harder there will be no objection," smiling as she spoke. "It has come down to a pretty fine point when all in the world that can be done for me is to see that I am fanned, but that is just where I am, and it is most pleasant to have these cool breezes on my face."

"You don't know how beautiful the air is," mother was saying, as we entered the room late this afternoon; "it has become my only food" I said to her, "Don't you remember, dear, how every night my sister Mary and I asked each other's forgiveness, and thanked each other for every good thing we had done, and how I said that to her when she was going away? I should like to say it to you, too." Mother answered, "And I should like to say it to you." "Then we will consider that we have," I said. "Well, we will," she answered, tenderly. I said, "You never did anything but good to me." "Nor you to me. You have made every effort for my comfort, Frank; don't you see I couldn't do for you what you did for me?" she asked, and I replied: "I have seen your hand lying here on the counterpane and I have said, 'What a kind hand; it never did anything but good to me. It stroked my hair when I was a little baby and petted me all my life long.'" Anna continued in her sweet way, "Nor did it ever do aught but good to anybody else." Mother answered: "If I have done as you say it was because it was a natural impulse, given me of God. You have always praised me as if it were a part of your work in the world. 'I have no works my faith to prove, I only know that God is love.'"

August 3.—This morning mother opened her eyes wide, looked up and said, "I can see so many bright, glittering stars—they are just like diamonds overhead."

She looked up again with wide open eyes and we asked her if she could see them still. "Oh, yes, they are all there of different shapes—just about so big (and she measured with her beautiful hands the size she thought they were); they are different on different mornings."

Very soon after mother said, "I would like to tell you what I saw just a little while ago if I could only describe it." "Well, what was it like? We have wondered if you have seen Mary since you have been asleep," we asked. "No, it wasn't Mary, but it was a beautiful spirit in spiritual dress." We told her how much we should like to know what the dress looked like for we had always wanted to know what the angels wore. I said that was true dress reform! and asked her if she wouldn't try to describe it. "No, I cannot tell you exactly, but it was beautiful and the diamonds were all about her. I think she was sent to me—this spiritual presence—to show me what it was like 'over there,'" and again she fell asleep.

As the twelve o'clock noon hour struck it seemed to remind her of the noon-tide hour of prayer in the W. C. T. U. which she has faithfully observed in her saying of grace at the table for many years, with the words, "Bless the temperance work and workers everywhere;" or "Bless the temperance cause and all good causes." She had not been speaking for a long time, but on the stroke of noon she said: "I wish I could pronounce a benediction upon the whole world." Then, with an effort, added: "I want you to place the white ribbon on me when I am gone;" and then again: "The Convention; that's where they sum up the year's work." She was evidently thinking of the white-ribboners who have thought of her so tenderly.

She murmured, "I believe you will all be taken care of and I fully believe better without me than with me at my present age." She also said: "My mother would never allow her children to stay at home for work. She always insisted that we should go to school, no matter how much extra work it brought upon her there on the farm. I was just so. I would rather my girls came to their best, physically, mentally and morally, no matter what it might cost me, and I always held the 'housework,' as folks call it, subordinate to that intention."

This afternoon she was lying on her pillows in the extremity of weakness, with her hand under her cheek. Sometimes she would open her eyes, which were very dim and colorless, but for the most part she kept them closed. She hardly moved, moaned now and then, and when asked if she were in pain said: "Oh, I had a little sensation"; she will not admit pain, and calls it a "sensation," to quiet our distress. Her head has been perfectly clear from the first.

Between all her little episodes of talk she would sleep and moan softly from time to time. She showed wonderful vitality. I asked her to-day how she was and she said, "I am in some haste." "But not impatient?" I inquired, and she softly answered, "No."

After she had lain quiet awhile, she opened her eyes and looked at me and said, "The result of all this that I am passing through will be, 'I shall be satisfied.'" Then I said, "No one can be satisfied in this world; we are too great, and besides the astronomers tell us there are 250 millions of worlds, so it stands to reason that we could not be satisfied with one when we have them all to explore," and mother smiled her assent.

I told her that we had had a letter from Whittier's cousins to-day—most tender and loving—and that as they read to him what I had written about her he said, "We might well wish our last days to be like hers."

Mrs. Rastall, of our publishing house, came in last evening for a moment, and congratulated "Saint Courageous" on her prospective preferment to a better world. Mother said to her, "I think you do well; it is a great dignity conferred upon me."

She said to-day, "There is no food but in the breeze." We read the usual morning verses in "Daily Light." As we read those that speak of being "Hidden in the Rock, from the strife of tongues," mother said smiling, "Hoodie (Miss Helen Hood) was very strong on verses of that sort. She seemed to have a spirit of prophecy that God would do just that for the white-ribboners."

After a long silence she said to me, "You know I say that the matter with me is really *con*gestion, and the way I remember it is by *di*gestion, which I haven't got."

Aug. 4.—When I came in this morning mother told me all she had done in the night in the way of giving away what she had, and I said, "Mother, there is just one thing I want, and that is your dear Bible. I want you now to put your hand on it," and I held it as her dear white hand was laid over its worn cover. She smiled into my face and said "Oh, that was always yours." I read some of the beautiful extracts that she had pasted in her Bible—Longfellow's sonnet on death, and she said, "Yes, I always liked that." I said, "How beautifully I have heard you read that, mother; how exquisitely I have heard you read Wordsworth's 'Intimations of Immortality.'"

"Good morning, Eda," she said as she saw our Swedish housemaid standing at the door. "I wish," Eda said, "that I was Mrs. Villarts." "Well you may, Eda, you want to go as badly as I do, and I can tell you I shall be a sight better off," said mother with energy.

Anna asked mother if she had seen that bright presence again. "No, not since yesterday. I noted then that she had no fleshly wants, no possibilities of pain. I saw bright sparkles overhead."

Mother said, "Frank, you and I have been set against the wearing of black clothes. We didn't for your father nor for Oliver, I don't want you to change your dresses on account of my departure; and as for the display of flowers at funerals—that is all foolishness; you know we always struck against that. It is not the thing." I said, "You mean it is not the Christian thing." "Yes, that is what I mean." She added, "I think that spiritual being of which I had a vision a day or two, was sent to show me what I shall be like."

"Give my grandchild, Mamie Willard, a little purse with some money, two dollars and one-half, I think, and tell her that it was sent to her grandma by the white ribbon women for recipes of grandma's doughnuts that she made when she was eighty-seven years old. The women saw in THE UNION SIGNAL that grandma had earned a dollar by making doughnuts, and they wanted the recipe and there is the money."

Watching her face, it seemed to me more and more in its brave, wise, benignant outline, and its patience of faith, like the famous stone face in the White Mountains about which Hawthorne wrote.

There came a telegram from Lady Henry, and as I kissed mother I said, "Lady Henry asks, 'How is mother?' and in a letter just received she told me to give you this kiss, and she also writes, 'I love you and I love your child.' You know she calls herself your English daughter." Mother smiled brightly and replied: "She can have anything she wants of this mother; she is a thousand million times welcome, for she has lighted up the world for me. I rolled the burden of my child over on her, and she seemed perfectly willing to take it."

A cable was sent to Mrs. Mary B. Willard by her daughter, thus: "Grandma almost home. Sends benediction." It was read to mother, and she said, "That is good," and then added: "The world is not so large when we can hear so soon and send so far; nor do I believe the other world is far away." She paused and then said solemnly: "What I want is to drink at the fountain of salvation."

"Give my love to Mrs. Carse. You said you wanted me to be there when Willard Hall was dedicated, but I shall never see the Temple—that is, not that one—for I am going to the temple not made with hands,—eternal in the heavens! I am glad that Lady Henry will make the dedication speech. Tell Mrs. Carse that I am thankful that she succeeded so well, far beyond my hopes or expectations. I consider the Temple and Lady Henry the two great marvels of the white ribbon cause. But all this work a-day world is past and, oh, I have so much the feeling settling upon me that I have nothing more to do!"

Another time she said: "I have been a very fortunate woman. I have been well all my life, I have enjoyed the world, the greatness of God's thoughts in nature and in the human heart, I have lived to see all the things come true that I have desired. How very few can say that! I was determined that my children should be well educated. I struggled for that. It was the great struggle of my life—and you all made a success. Then I wanted to see this house grow to be a beautiful home and little by little it has done so. I have lived on here nearly thirty years and there is hardly a plank in it that you have not pulled out, Frank, and put it in the other end first! The women gave you that beautiful Den. The house is packed full of souvenirs and tokens of the good-will of our friends in every part of the world."

We sang: "Gently, Lord, oh, gently lead us," and chanted, "The Lord is my Shepherd"; "There is a land of pure delight," and closed with a hymn the first verse of which she had quoted to me, "His purposes shall ripen fast," I lining it out and those around the bed singing it. Then we sang, "Lead, Kindly Light," and when we came to the lines

"O'er moor and fen, o'er crags and torrent till

she repeated those lines slowly after us. We knew then that she was passing over the crags and through the torrents.

Again and again it came to us in the night watches and in the day watches of those four memorable dates, August 3, 4, 5 and 6, what was said of the friends of Christ: "And sitting down, they watched him there"; for it was about all we could do. She took absolutely nothing in the way of medicine or foods. We bathed her head, wet her lips, touched her cheek, smoothed her hand, sang a little, but repeatedly she said: "Still; still."

Aug. 5.—At two o'clock we sang, "Our life is a dream," and during the last verse mother appeared to be repeating the words, then she said, with great difficulty, "Eternity—that is just what I want."

At one o'clock this afternoon Dr. Bragdon came in. She was lying as one asleep. He put his hand on her face and said, "Well, Mrs. Willard, how are you doing?" "Not very well," she said, slowly, and with difficulty, and then added, "Dr. Bragdon, you have done all you could. If you can get a balloon and start it for heaven, I will step on board with great alacrity. Give my love to your mother." Then with somewhat of her old energy: "You cannot think how glad I shall be when this is over." He said good-bye to her, to which she responded smilingly.

At four o'clock this afternoon as we sat there in the sweet summer time listening to her moaning breath, the bugle of a Salvation Army soldier sounded outside the window playing, "The sweet bye and bye." She seemed to hear it. She had said the day before: "I wish to drink from the wells of salvation." It was unutterably pathetic to hear the Salvation Army boy playing that song just then and there, and to think of what it meant.

Later I said to mother, "You and I have said our loving words to one another all along through our lives, so we have nothing new to say now. We have told everything to each other, we have never had a secret from each other, so we have none to tell now. We understood one another perfectly, so we have no misunderstandings to straighten now." She smiled and said, "Yes, that is the way it has always been. Most relatives have misunderstandings even as much as they love each other; there are little envyings, bickerings, ambitions, miserable jealousies which are the foxes that spoil their vines; but in a better world we hope that all those things will be wiped out."

Her beautiful hands have been one of the most notable features all along to us who watched beside her bed. They are a remarkable index of her character; long, shapely, beautifully proportioned, white, with elegant nails, wrist and arm. Indeed, she has a most noticeably well-proportioned, symmetrical and vigorous body, with very high breastbone, which she has always said she was told was an indication of long life; her lungs have certainly stood by her in a marvelous way.

Her granddaughter says that these graceful hands, always falling into attitudes pleasant to look upon, full of expression and much used in gesture when she was able, with the thought of all their good deeds and their purity seemed to her to be the best illustration that she knows of the song Chaplain McCabe sings, "Beautiful Hands."

Aug. 6.—Her dear eyes were full of eternity. They had in them a solemnity deeper than can be told in earthly words. She opened them often and fixed them upon us, and especially upon me as I sat beside her bed all day with long and unspeakable regards She moaned at almost every breath like a tired child and panted constantly. It was pitiful to see her. I could think of nothing but some hunted creature scourged to its covert. She tried and tried and tried again to speak, opening her eyes wide and intently for some little time gathering up her energies, planning what she should say and then her swollen tongue refusing to give out any sound except a gurgle. She tried this repeatedly until it became so painful that I said: "Dear mother, we cannot understand. We know all you would say of good and loving and beautiful things. You have been saying them all your life. We are more sorry than words can tell, but we do not understand and we cannot bear to have you struggle to speak to us when you are so weak. Mother, you know how much we have loved that poem of Sir Edwin Arnold that describes death. After this I shall change the last two lines and say not as the poem does: "I am your angel, who was your bride, and though I am dead I have never died," but shall make it read:

"The utmost wonder is this: I hear
And see you and love you and kiss you, dear;
And am your angel who was your guide
And know that though dead I have never died."

Then I knelt beside her and she kissed me on the cheek as I kissed her on the brow. It was our last greeting.

I said, "You are almost home, poor mother, rich mother, blessed mother. Our faces are set the same way—we shall come after you—it will not be long. You know that this is Frank?" She bowed her head. Once we distinguished the word "happy." Once when we said, "We cannot bear to think you are in pain," she struggled out the words "restless." She tried and tried again to speak but the tongue refused its office. It grieves me to the heart that she said so much we lost, but I was not willing that she should tax herself with trying, even though we might after awhile have understood.

A few hours before she died she struggled out the word "Berlin," and soon after the word "Mamie," and then, with a great effort the words "awful sorry." Then I bent over her and said, "You mean you are sorry you will not be here when they come?" she nodded. "You want us to give your love to Mary Bannister Willard and your youngest grandchild, Mamie?" Again she nodded.

[Mrs. Mary B. Willard and her daughter reached Rest Cottage July 16, just one week after the funeral, and without knowledge of "The Great Sunset" until landing in New York.—Eds.]

Bending over her and stroking the dear cheek, I said, "Mother, give my love to Yolande, dear Yolande!" She bowed her head.

No pulse since yesterday; no heart beat perceptible, except with the ear close against her breast; and yet her wonderful constitution, in spite of her great age and the weakening character of her disease, keeps her with us—she who is so anxious to be gone.

This afternoon her granddaughter sat beside her with me and sung the beautiful Scotch air, "I'm far frae me hame." She also sang Mrs. Joseph Cook's beautiful adaptation of Tennyson's song, "Twilight and Evening Bell," which was a great favorite of my mother.

About five o'clock on that last afternoon Anna and I sang "Oh, mother dear, Jerusalem," two verses, the last being mother's favorite:

"There happier bowers than Eden's bloom,
Nor sin nor sorrow know;
Blest seats through rude and stormy scenes,
I onward press to you."

As we did so she, with great effort, lifted her hand and pointed upward.

The last verses sung to her as she lay breathing out her life on that bright August afternoon were,

"God be with you till we meet again,
Keep love's banner floating o'er you,
Smite death's threatening wave before you,
God be with you till we meet again."

After a weary, panting, struggling night, she sighed out to Anna Gordon: "S—o l-o-n-g." But she never from the beginning seemed discouraged, she had her great work on hand to be born into heaven, and she kept strictly about it, seeming to be an active factor in it by her own conscious volition. Her whole appearance reminded me, until the last day or two, when she was so heartbreakingly worn and weary looking, of what she had said a hundred times in life: "This is what the world is saying! If you have hopes, tell them to me; if doubts, keep them to yourself, for I have plenty of my own." And of what she said to Charles Logan, an excellent young theologian in whom she took a great interest, when he was going away to preach: "Tell them of your hopes, tell them of immortality; there is nothing in the world they want to hear of so much, because this is the short life—that the long one. They want to be assured of immortality and how to win its bliss." She seemed to me these last days like one on the keen stretch for immortality, crying like Bunyan's pilgrim, "Life, life, eternal life," and not by any means to be stopped or hindered in his swift, flying journey.

On the last day of her life (Saturday, August 6), when she seemed so restless, the nurse said: "I think she should have a hypodermic injection, that will quiet the pain and put her to sleep," for, although she had slept a great deal both day and night, this last day she slept almost none at all; so I bent over her and said, "Mother, the doctor could give you a hypodermic injection of morphine and you would have no more pain and you would sleep, and perhaps you wouldn't wake up any more until you awakened in heaven. Shall we do it?" She gathered up all her strength and with strong effort and a clear emphasis she answered, "No."

Aug. 7.—She breathed more lightly the last hour before her departure, still the sound was not at all painful and could not have been heard out of her room with the door closed. It had a remarkable cadence. About every fifth or seventh breath there came something so sweet, so tender, so poetic, eloquent, ideal, full of eternity, full of love and heart and soul, just a cadence soft as the Æolian harp, and like some of the most heavenly tones of that mystic instrument. It seemed to occur at regular intervals and drew upon all there was in us that was celestial or that cared for love or immortality. It seemed to speak to us, and yet it was only a breath. We hoped she would last beyond midnight and so pass away upon the "day divine," as her only son, Oliver Willard, had done fourteen years ago, and as her beautiful daughter Mary had done more than thirty years ago. We also remembered that her daughter was born on Sunday, and her sweet granddaughter Mamie, was born on Sunday. It came about that she remained breathing in this wonderful way until the clock in the University steeple struck twelve, and the sweet-toned clock on the mantelpiece in the parlor of Rest Cottage a moment after struck twelve, her breath coming in between these strokes as regularly and full of music, and full of God and life eternal as the breath of a passing saint could be. She breathed on twelve minutes after midnight a little more softly, a little more tenderly, while we sat around her listening—her only living daughter, her eldest granddaughter, her faithful Anna Gordon, Irene Thompson Fockler, her relative, Alice Briggs, her faithful stand-by, and we called Eda, whom mother loved, and who had served her so well for six years past. We could see that the breath would soon stop, because it was in regular gradations, as everything has been from the beginning of her life and the beginning of her illness, like the intervals between the notes of an octave.

I could think of nothing as we sat listening to the breaths save the sweet words:

"As sink the winds when storms are o'er,
As die the waves along the shore."

Then, quietly and softly, came the last breath; there was no movement whatever of the head or hand, no upturned eyes, no death rattle; but there came into the face on the pillow a look wholly seraphic, tender, ineffably loving, expectant, blissful, as if to say to us, "I love you and I leave you; it has all come true." We sat in a rapt state, watching that wonderful, etherial, flitting, evanescent, immortal look. We knew it was a prophecy of endless, beatific life. Then with my hand on that dear head, so wise, so kind, we all knelt and I prayed to the God of love and life, who had given us such a treasure and had now laid up our mother and our friend, a treasure in heaven. I prayed for her children, her grandchildren, the great company of good and true women who love her the world over; for those who were on the ocean coming over to see her, for the young life beside me—the daughter of her beloved son—and that we all might by what had come and gone, feel more and more deeply that we had given holy hostages to immortality and God. We all joined in the Lord's prayer at the close, as we had so many hundreds of times with her, and I was glad that with us knelt the faithful nurse who had done so much to smooth her dying pillow.

Dear Anna Gordon's faithful fingers closed her eyes. I went to my room and lay upon my bed saying in my soul, "Oh, Life, thou art strange; Oh, Beyond, thou art sweet!"

Five minutes later, the telephone had summoned the undertaker, the reporters who were sitting in the office below had started for the city; Irene and Alice had gone with cablegrams to Lady Henry Somerset, and twenty telegrams to our relatives and friends in different parts of the nation. Kate had gone to our pastor to secure the church for her grandmother's funeral on Tuesday next. We placed upon the door not the black crape symbolic of mourning, but a cluster of long white ribbons surmounted by a wreath of evergreen. Though it was midnight, the world, with its relentless, strong waves rolled into the quiet cottage where the blessed saint had so lately breathed her last. Her life from cradle to skies was one long path of broadening light. I went down through the vacant rooms, sat alone in the deserted office and heard Swedish Eda who in the kitchen was making coffee for us who had been up so late, singing in her soft voice and broken English, "Angels to beckon me, nearer, my God, to Thee."

And I knew that my earthly anchorage was gone; that Rest Cottage was henceforth a house and not a home; that I was motherless.

As thirty years ago, when my sister Mary died, so now, my deepest heart cried out:

"Well done of God to halve the lot,
And give her all the sweetness;
To me the empty room and cot,
To her—the Heaven's completeness."

EXTRACTS FROM MADAM WILLARD'S DIARY.

In the year 1887, when she was eighty-two years old, Miss Willard gave her mother a beautiful copy of daily thoughts selected from the writings of Charles Kingsley by his wife. Miss Willard had seen this book on the table in the "Prophet's Chamber" at "Cliff Seat," the home of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Cook. At her request Mrs. Cook ordered a copy of the book from London which she gave to her mother asking her to write a little every day, and she did so, with no break throughout the year. It is Miss Willard's choicest memorial of her, and is in appearance an illustration of her mother's remarkable neatness for it was so carefully kept that there is not a blot on any of its pages, and the entire volume looks as if it were fresh from the publisher. Sometimes she wrote the occurrences of the day, at others she would copy a favorite quotation. Below are given some extracts :

Jan. 2, 1887.—A sacramental service will be held in our church to-day. It is intensely cold. I shall not go out but will think of its solemn significance at home. F. speaks to-night in the interest of women in Chicago.

Jan. 3.—To-day completes my eighty-second year. My brother John was eighty yesterday.

"I mourn no more my vanished years."

Jan. 5.—"Take your loftiest moods and make them the guiding constellation of your lives," so says great-hearted Joseph Cook.

Jan. 8.—

"Kind hearts are here, yet would the tenderest one
Have limits to its mercy ; God has none."

Jan. 9.—I did not go to the union temperance meeting that F. led in the week of prayer, it was so cold ; but sent a note expressing my sympathy and interest.

Jan. 13.—F. and A. left this morning at six o'clock for a six weeks' absence. I pray that they may be kept from all danger and accident and may the Lord "bless them and keep them and cause His face to shine upon them and give them peace."

Jan. 25.—Blessed are the peace-makers ! A practical illustration can be furnished at Rest Cottage where from eight to ten temperance women with two temperance housemaids abide in the pleasantest relations. This includes the family in "Rest Cottage" and the white-riboners in the "annex."

Feb. 1.—I cannot write my inmost thought. It refuses to be imprisoned in my vocabulary.

Feb. 2.—That my dear, loyal daughter has such an exacting and intensely busy life, with so little rest, is a grief to the one who once

"Rocked her in the cradle all the day."

Feb. 4.—The eternal years! The hourly miracle of life! "O love divine; O Helper ever present, be with me when all else is from me drifting, be Thou my strength and stay."

Feb. 6.—"God is love," and "Eternal life by Christ" are the two great facts of Bible teaching.

Feb. 8.—Hon. Justin McCarthy lectured at our church on "English Statesmen, Orators and Parties." He considers Gladstone the greatest living orator.

Feb. 12.—John Bright has truly said: "The methods employed to gain success must be persevered in to retain it."

Feb. 17.—"He builds too low who builds below the stars."

Feb. 21—

"May I reach that purest heaven,
Be to other souls the cup of strength in some great agony,
Be the sweet presence of a good diffused."

Woman in this age is endeavoring to ascertain her special calling, and she thinks the unfolding will not come to her at second-hand.

March 2.—Oh, the mystery of life, and full of meaning as of mystery! This isolation, this individual responsibility and destiny, how they press upon my spirit, but

"Heart to heart we'll bide the shadows
Till the mists have cleared away."

March 12.—"Duty done is the soul's fireside."

March 14.—Took a drive with F. and A. The first time I have been out since early in January. It was a lovely day, almost like June.

March 22.—Why do my days go on, go on? The three score and ten are past by more than a decade. Is it that I may be the central care and thought of those whose orbit lies outside of home, or is it that I may keep nightly vigil for imperiled loved ones?

March 25.—

"I sometimes feel the thread of life is slender,
And soon with me the labor will be wrought;
Then grows my heart to other hearts more tender,
The time is short."

March 29.—My dear F. will speak to-day in the amendment campaign at Grand Rapids, Mich. This is the day of prayer for Michigan and other states working for constitutional amendment.

Apr. 5.—Returns indicate the adoption of the prohibitory amendment in Michigan.

Apr. 9.—That my years have been passed with those whose early religious and intellectual training was not unlike my own gives grateful memories.

Apr. 13.—All at home. A busy household at Rest Cottage. "He setteth the solitary in families." Took a drive with F. and A. and our good Alice Briggs.

Apr. 14.—I went to Anna Gordon's Loyal Temperance Legion and was greatly interested in the speaking, music, close attention and decorum of the young people.

Apr. 21.—Organizations are relentless in their demands upon the responsive. There is a limit to human endurance. Let this be a warning to W. C. T. U. workers.

May 4.—No matter how well the track is laid; no matter how strong the engine is made; when you find it running on the down grade put on the brakes! Moral: Don't overwork.—Addressed to the W. C. T. U.

May 6.—"What is excellent, as God lives, is permanent."

Hearts are dust, heart loves remain.
—Emerson.

May 7.—It must be possible that the soul made should absolutely meet the soul that makes; Lord, till I meet Thee thus life is delayed.

"I am not I until that morning breaks,
Not I, until my consciousness eternal wakes."
—George MacDonald.

May 14.—

Grow old along with me,
The best is yet to be;
The last of life for which the first was made.
—Robert Browning.

May 19.—I am rising I know towards the skies; the sunshine is on my head. The nearer I approach the end the plainer I hear around me the immortal symphonies of the worlds which invite me.—Victor Hugo.

May 23.—Why is it that I allude so seldom to those tangible things that control my thinking and inspire my prayers; that revel in my consciousness and point me upward to that Presence I feel but cannot see?

May 28.—

"He will give back what neither time nor might,
Nor passionate prayer nor longing hope restore,
Dear as to long blind eyes recovered sight—
He will give back those who are gone before."

May 30.—Decoration Day comes not with a roll-call of enemies, but with a loving roll-call of friends; sectional feeling is passing away.

"Under the laurel the blue,
Under the willow the gray."

Several of our household at Rest Cottage went to Rose Hill to witness the exercises attending the decoration of the soldiers' graves. I was glad to learn that none of the graves were forgotten, but those of the unknown dead were as tenderly and beautifully decorated as were the monuments of those who acquired national fame.

June 5.—It is raining; I cannot go to church so I sit here and query: Who is sufficiently impressed with the fact that our casual friendships and social minglings have so much to do with shaping not only our character but our final destiny?

June 10.—

We should fill the hours with the sweetest things
If we had but a day;
We should love with a lifetime's love in an hour
If the hours were but few.
—Mary Lowe Dickinson.

June 14.—F. and A. left last evening for Winnipeg, Manitoba, engagements of long standing. They will also be at Duluth, Bismarck, Fargo, St. Paul, and other towns, and be absent some weeks.

June 25.—Attended commencement of the University. President Joseph Cummings presided. Thirteen ladies and twenty one gentlemen graduated. Orations all good, some excellent.

July 15.—My dear F. will come home this evening expecting me to go to Lake Bluff in the morning. She thinks I need an outing; perhaps I do, but I like home the best.

July 22.—Pundita Ramabai is a marvelous creation. She has a most comprehensive intellect, as open to perceive truth as the daisy to the sun. I went to hear her speak in the meeting of the W. C. T. U.

July 30.—My dear grandsons, Robert and Frank, are very much in my thoughts. They must be heart-sore sometimes being separated from each other, and from the home of their early childhood. I hope they find kind friends in their new surroundings.

Aug. 3.—My dear F. will leave reluctantly at 4 p. m. to meet an engagement at ———, made after much importunity.

Aug. 17.—Autumn is coming. It has few demands upon the aged, but for those in meridian life it is freighted with exacting responsibilities and cares.

Aug. 20.—In a few days F. and A. will leave home for two or three months to attend conventions of the W. C. T. U. in the South and East. We shall miss the inspiration of their presence at Rest Cottage,—their cheerful aspect, the click of the typewriter, the rapid movement of pencil and pen.

Aug. 28.—This is the last Sabbath that my girls will be at home for many weeks. We shall be very lonely. May the Lord bless their sacrificing efforts "For God and Home and Native Land."

Sept. 10.—The days go by, oh, how swiftly, presaging that the future hastens to be here. "My times are in Thy hands."

Sept. 18.—I hope my weary ones are having a quiet Sabbath in Anna's home at Auburndale this day. They call it "rest" when they go there but they are obliged continually to grapple with their interminable correspondence.

Sept. 28.—The birthday of my dear F. In early life she had much of aspiration, promise and possibility. She was a prophecy and an inspiration in our home. In later years she has been my strong staff and beautiful rod, anticipating my remotest wish, convenience or need. "He saved others, Himself He could not save,"

Oct. 5.—Our local paper pleasantly says: "The lay delegates did a very graceful thing by electing Frances E. Willard, of Evanston, to represent them in the General Conference."

Oct. 27.—The birthday of my dear son Oliver. He was the beginning of our strength; he was inspiration, brilliancy, buoyancy and sunshine in our home.

Oct. 31.—The toilers will leave Baltimore this morning for North Carolina, "God be with them till we meet again."

"God did anoint thee with His odorous oil
To wrestle, not to reign."

Nov. 1.—A small unkindness is a great offense.—Hannah More.

Nov. 7.—My dear husband's birthday. There was much of faith and hope, much of contentment and home comfort, much of care and sorrow in our lives. "All things work together for good to them that love God."

Nov. 16.—To-day the National W. C. T. U. convenes in Nashville, Tenn. May wise counsels prevail and Christian unity be promoted, and may the interests of temperance and purity be greatly strengthened and intensified.

Nov. 25.—Thanksgiving morning. We are very happy to welcome home our toilers after an absence of more than twelve weeks. We had prayers in the north room conducted by F. and singing "Lead, Kindly Light," with A. at the organ. F. is now closeted with her thoughts. Anna has gone to church. My mind goes over the sea to the home in Germany and to the dear boys away from home who, I fear, had a desolate Thanksgiving.

Dec. 4.—I have been reading H. W. Parker's argument for the unseen. He relates it as a fact that dying people often appear to behold the beings and glories of another world, and infers that he who believes in a personal God acknowledges that there is at least one unseen being near us; one glorious inhabitant of an unseen world, and that he who believes that man is made in the image of God, must realize that every human assembly that he enters is really an assembly of spirits unseen.

Dec. 8.—The Kansas prohibitory law was declared valid by the United States supreme court, Washington, December 5. The judgment of the court was pronounced by Justice Harlan, in a long and elaborate opinion.

Dec. 14.—Are we not anxious sometimes for a glory to be revealed in our consciousness that belongs only to another world?

Dec. 15.—The itinerants are expected at evening. How long will they have a mother at home to watch and wait for their coming?

Dec. 27.—

Love watches o'er my quiet ways,
Kind voices speak my name;
And lips that find it hard to praise
Are slow at least to blame.
Methinks the spirit's temper grows
Too soft in this still air,
Somewhat the restful heart foregoes,
Of needful watch and prayer. —Whittier.

Dec. 31.—Good-bye, dear journal, you have occupied a moment now and then that but for you might not have been so pleasantly employed. I shall no longer confide to you in language of my own nor that of others the secrets of my consciousness. I have a tender feeling towards you somehow, and this is more than a formal leave-taking.

1887 has uttered its message. It has assured us of but one thing, and tnat is, it will never be repeated. A little is photographed on the memories of the observant, a few extracts have been recorded by those who wield the pen. The year has left some scars, but it has also healed many wounds. Its discipline has been mild when safety would permit, stern only when well-being so demanded. and then with every possible mitigation consistent with our highest interest and the interest of good government.

REST ISLAND MIDSUMMER CONVENTION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—It is thought to be a marvel that this loveliest bit of scenery in the northwest should have escaped the greedy grasp of speculators. But fortunately the sordid hand of trade spared it, and one of those divine impulses that sometimes hallow the groping sons of God, consecrated it to the upbuilding of the broken wills and shattered lives of the most pitiful class of men, the legally tempted to self-destruction.

Rest Island lies to one side of Lake Pepin, separated from the Minnesota shore by Fern Creek—in the midst of a lake eight by about three miles.

The history of Mr. Woolley is well known to our readers. He was a brilliant and wonderfully successful attorney in Minneapolis, stood at the head of the bar, was repeatedly honored with important official position, managed the legal affairs of some of the most influential and successful business men of the state. He had a splendid home, a beautiful family, was a leader in social affairs, and a man of whom the world was proud, and petted accordingly. Mr. Woolley has told in his inimitable manner the story of his decline, step by step, until he had reached almost the lowest round in the social scale. Four years and a half ago he was converted, and immediately consecrated himself to the service of Christ and of his fellow-men. In this work he has been steadfast and wonderfully successful, under God.

In his attempts to save drinking men he has encountered the grave difficulty that has met other earnest workers in this cause, i. e., what to do with the men who have heard his words and are ready to turn away from their wicked lives, but who are surrounded by continual temptations, by old companions in the midst of their former favorite haunts of vice—weak, sick, trembling, but anxious to be saved. He felt, as he took the fevered hand of one of these men, and gazed into his tearful, earnest eyes, that if he could send him for temporary seclusion to some quiet place, until his nerves could become strengthened, and the Christian hope and acceptance could be given a chance to do its blessed work, he could more readily combat the wiles of Satan. A desire to accomplish this end was the origin of Rest Island Mission.

There is no stock company or profit sharing. The victim of appetite simply comes and around him are thrown all the refinements and graces of the highest Christian life, and the powers of the unseen realm of spirit are set in motion to assist the struggling will, having done all by renunciation, to stand in the might of Christ. Five acres of berries and good crops of potatoes and cereals are under cultivation here, and in the healing occupations of gardening, contact with the restoring forces of mother earth, men may pay for their board by work. There is no compulsion, but a constantly increasing acreage is being redeemed for the support of this great enterprise. About four hun(dred acres are included in the Island, and the mainland adjoining.

This natural mission work is under the charge of Superintendent and Mrs. Harry N. Timolat, who have consecrated themselves to this work, and who, at the invitation of Mr. Woolley, surrendered their beautiful home near Duluth to devote their time and their talents and labor to this cause. Mr. Timolat was a successful real estate and insurance agent at Duluth, and enjoyed a good income therefrom. He was formerly a drinking man, and was saved by the power of God, as a result of the work of Mr. Woolley. At the call of his Master he gave up business and home and took up this work. He is a man of rare executive ability and deep religious fervor and a close Bible student. His wife is a charming, accomplished member of a good family in Minneapolis, fully consecrated to her present work, and rarely fitted for it with zeal, patience and tact.

A great convocation for the formal opening began at Rest Island on July 17, and continued one week. There is a beautiful hotel, owned by Miss Etta Thompson. Here were gathered many guests and helpers, prominent among them, Mrs. E. A. Russell, of Minneapolis coffee-room fame, full of cares but with a cheering word for all; of the various churches and benevolent societies there were too many distinguished and earnest representatives to admit discrimination, unless all could be named; but the kindly brethren of the pulpit were numerous and most helpful; and of noted women there were not a few.

The chief feature of the July meeting was the laying of the corner-stone of Willard Cottage, which will accommodate many persons. Until its completion only a small number of inebriates can be taken care of, though Mr. Woolley had applications from sixty before this summer convention.

The movement is unsectarian; one of the propositions is to establish a "Church of the Strangers," toward which Dr. Deems of New York—a staunch friend of Mr. Woolley and the Rest Island Mission—has subscribed one hundred dollars, and whose corner-stone he ardently hopes himself to lay. Men baptized in this church may go forth with the safeguard of a Christian profession of faith and their letters of membership should be recognized by all Christian denominations.

This enterprise is purely philanthropic. With a noble spirit of self-sacrifice, John G. Woolley has devoted himself to the establishment of this home in which, amid the redeeming influences of an outdoor life, away from temptation, assisted by all the spiritual forces which can be put into action, a man may find himself once more, and it is believed, may find his way to God. VISITOR.

THE NATIONAL TEACHERS' ASSOCIATION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The thirty-second annual meeting of the National Educational Association closed Friday, July 15. This session, held at Saratoga, N. Y., was considered one of unusual significance. It was a notable gathering of educators from all parts of the United States and the Dominion of Canada.

The great hotels of this famous resort were thronged with those who are standing for this republic in its endeavor to train rising generations for citizenship. It was no idle assembly that convened in midsummer heat to weigh the important interests growing out of the education of the masses.

From the timely and enthusiastic address of President Harrison, in beautiful Congress Park, on the morning of the 12th, on through the general and department sessions, even to the transfer of the official gavel by the retiring president to his successor, every utterance gave the true ring of loyalty to a system of government whose greatest success must embody the highest welfare of the individual. President Cook proved himself a happily constituted presiding officer, holding the reins of parliamentary control faithful to the interests of that great deliberative body, yet sacrificing no essential in the courteous bearing of the gentleman.

It was stated authoritatively that more than five thousand names appeared on the new membership roll of the association. Of this number, the larger proportion are women, as they constitute the "rank and file" in the profession of pedagogy. A glance at the official Bulletin shows, however, that a very meager representation of this bigger half is found in the executive roster as it stood for the year just closed. Of the twelve vice-presidents, one was a woman; of the eighty-six members of the board of directors, only eight were women; of the five trustees and sixty-four state and territorial managers, women were conspicuous by their absence; of the eleven papers read during the three morning sessions of the association, one was presented by a woman—Mrs. Delia Lathrop Williams, of Ohio—participating most efficiently in the consideration of Ethical Culture, while the ten named on the various discussions were all men. In the departments of normal education and art, the name of a woman is found as vice-president or secretary. In the department of music, one presented a paper. The department of elementary education honored Miss Julia Tutwiler, of Alabama, as president. In the kindergarten department woman was permitted to reign supreme. Of the eight general addresses announced for the four evenings, two were assigned to women. Mrs. Mary A. Livermore was detained at home by illness; this left Mrs. Frances W. Leiter, of Ohio, the only woman who appeared in the great Casino rink, presenting the latest interest of our organization—physical education for the children of America, under the subject, "Educational Equipoise."

Every great gathering whose mission must necessarily be progressive in results, is generally marked by some characteristic evidence of progress. Most emphatically did this last National Conference of educators evidence the stride that has been made in the direction of physical training as an imperative part of the education that should be provided by the state. Two of the eight general addresses were upon the subject, while an afternoon in the secondary section was given to the discussion of this important question, following a paper admirably presented by Miss R. Anna Morris. Repeated reference to the subject by other speakers, not excepting President Harrison, showed that the lack of physical discipline in our school system is recognized as a serious defect.

Mrs. Leiter's hearing before the committee on resolutions, and upon the floor of the Association, supporting an amendment that she offered, cannot fail to be of service to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union in its efforts to secure compulsory physical education. The sixth resolution referred to the importance of condensing and coordinating the work of graded schools, securing without cram or pressure the most fruitful results. After commending efforts to enrich the course of study by incorporating elementary science, literature and hygiene, making mention of free-hand drawing and perfected plans for manual and artistic training, the resolution adds:

"The importance of physical education is fully recog nized, and provision for such training is heartily recommended."

Necessary initiatory steps were taken by prominent specialists and other interested members of the association to establish the department of Physical Education. This will bring our public school system in harmonious touch with other countries which are far in advance of us in this direction, making the conferences to be held during the World's Congress at Chicago, next year, of inestimable value to us in securing legislation in the various states. More than thirty years ago the educators of the country, assembled in the same capacity as at Saratoga, declared that physical training should become, by law, a part of the public school system. Not until last winter, however, did the first and only state crystallize this judgment into law. It was fitting, indeed, that Ohio, the mother of the Crusade, should take this initial step. The work is gradually being incorporated in the schools of our cities and most enterprising towns; but a tuition which is proving so essential in these favored places should be made to yield its benefit alike to all children under the care of the state. Nothing short of compulsory legislation will accomplish the desired result. It may be necessary to meet with argument the cry against added taxation which this will sooner or later involve, as so important discipline should not be placed in the hands of convenient make-shifts, or broken-down athletes. The end to be obtained will surely justify the outlay.

Dr. Seaver, of Yale, has pertinently said: "It may not be the province of the state to see that each child has medical care, but so long as a state takes a child from home five hours a day, it is bound to see that no physical harm comes to the child in that time."

This new phase in education will open to the sisterhood in pedagogy a promising field for labor. The large number who are training as specialists at the various summer schools show that the situation is appreciated. The future pledges for our children what the past has not given—healthful, educated bodies, as well as disciplined minds.

This suggests answer to a question recently asked: "Why are not women more largely represented on the executive corps of the N. E. A?" Eligibility demands more than qualified brain. Women are not wanting in ability and faithfulness; they lack, rather, courage that grows out of a just appreciation of personal fitness for superior positions. This qualification cannot fail to come through increased physical powers. Here is found the key to the situation. Men do appreciate the peculiar fitness of women in the realms of education; but if women are slow to expect recognition through appointment to responsible places, we cannot consistently censure if our brother educator is equally slow to yield his long established and almost unquestioned privilege of appropriating these honors to himself.

Under suffrage accorded alike to all members of the association, there is no reason why the votes of women may not carry out their intelligent convictions along this line. The hindrances that exist to-day, holding the majority of women, as with the force of gravity, to the level of servile service even in this field of noble labor, are largely the result of education in the past, and unrequired submission in the present.

When women stand physically as well as mentally upon the same plane with men, as fully emancipated as are men from the thralldom of barbarous ideas in dress, this discrimination upon the program of a representative educational body will no longer exist.

THE SOUTHERN ASSEMBLY.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The third annual session of this Assembly convened in Waynesville, N. C., on the last day of June. Last year an offer of land, valued at $4,000 and a cash subscription of $3,500 was made to the Assembly to entice it away from Asheville, where for two years its sessions had been held. A committee went up to spy out the land and the wonderful beauty of the location, and the kindness of the citizens lured the Southern Assembly to settle permanently on the handsome domain donated by the Love heirs, situated just within the corporation.

On the 4th of July the corner-stone of a handsome, permanent building was laid with joy by the Assembly and the people. The distinguished President Carlisle, D. D., of South Carolina, ex-Gov. Anderson, of Ohio, Rev. Mr. Lambuth, of China, Rev. Richard Webb, D. D., Mrs. Sallie F. Chapin, Mrs. M. L. Wells, president of Assembly, and Miss Belle Kearney, Capt. Alden Howell, of Waynesville, made addresses and assisted in the ceremonies. On the corner-stone was cut "W. C. T. U., 1892," and the word "Love" in commemoration of the donors of the site.

Mrs. Chapin presided over the departments of organization and social purity; Mrs. Bateham, Sabbath observance; Miss Clara Baer, of New Orleans, physical culture; Miss Mary Yeargin, elocution; Mrs. Dr. Walter, Bible readings; Mrs. Richard Webb, of Savannah, prison and jail work; Miss Belle Kearney, the Y's; Miss Anna C. Aston, flower mission; Mrs. Prof. Hobbs, of Guilford College, N C., health and heredity.

It was decidedly the best Assembly we have yet had. Gov. Anderson, grand old man that he is, said he had attended many conventions, but had never been more delightfully entertained and instructed. Dr. Carlisle wrote a letter of high commendation to the Southern Methodist. Mrs. Wells appeared with health restored and spirits en rapport with the thermometer and filled every gap with power as an executive and presiding officer. Miss Kearney was a great feature, made seven addresses, commanding crowded audiences wherever she spoke. Miss Baer and Miss Yeargin filled their offices with perfect acceptance. Beside my regular departments I took charge of parliamentary drills, made a 4th of July address and held meetings for the colored people.

The outlook for this work is very gracious. Waynesville is the most beautifully located town in this grand mountain region; it is thronged with summer visitors from all sections, and with the new buildings completed for occupancy next year, no gathering place can offer more to W. C. T. U. workers and the general public The site that has been selected for the temple commands a magnificent view of the surrounding mountains. The granite foundation of the building is already laid. There will be fourteen rooms in the temple, which will serve as homes for the workers, and a large auditorium; the whole will be surmounted by high towers that will be observatories for wider views in more ways than one. The cost of the building will amount to between seven and ten thousand dollars. The inspiration that may be caught within these walls will be an enlargement of the sphere, not only of the gentler, but equally of the strong sex. All visitors whose happy privilege it was to be here at this convocation expressed themselves as delighted with the work and the workers. This school of methods is the expression of a long-felt want in the South; we need to know better how to work, and it is impossible for many of us to find our way to Lake Bluff and other resorts for W. C. T. U. workers in the North.

The officers elected for the coming twelve months were Mrs. M. L. Wells, of Tennessee, president; Mrs. Mary Woody, of North Carolina, vice-president-at-large; Mrs. Harney Walter, of Alabama, secretary; Mrs. Dr. Hilliard, of Asheville, N. C., treasurer; Mr. R. O. Gilmer, of Waynesville, attorney. Each W. C. T. U. president of a charter state is a vice-president ex-officio. The sessions of the Assembly will begin hereafter on the first Thursday of August. SALLIE F. CHAPIN.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Mountain Lake Park Interstate Conference and W. C. T. U. School of Methods held its annual convocation July 13–17.

The morning hours and part of each afternoon were devoted to discussion of topics in regular school of methods fashion, with an address each afternoon and evening by some speaker of national reputation.

Rev. Anna Shaw, who is a great favorite at the Park, gave two addresses on "Woman's Enfranchisement." She also took part in a discussion on franchise in the morning school of methods which was almost equivalent to another address, perhaps better, for she gave every one an opportunity to "answer back" or ask questions. Joseph Cook, of Boston, drew a large audience to hear his lecture on "Rumsellers as Robbers and Rulers."

Mrs. Helen G. Rice aroused an interest in Loyal Temperance Legion work. She held a conference with the workers in the morning, a children's meeting in the afternoon, and gave an address on "God's Hand in History" in the evening. She won every one by her congeniality as well as her tact and talent.

Miss E. Abbie Thomas, of Indiana, the whistling soloist, added much to the entertainment of the evening audiences, and visitors to the Park will not soon forget her whistling and singing.

Mrs. Barney was not permitted to be present, owing to the serious illness of her son, but Dr. C. H. Mead, of the quartette, took her place on Sabbath morning, and preached from the text, "And God said, let there be light," and Mrs. Buell, president of the conference, gave an excellent address in the evening on "The Analogy of Two Great Reforms."

In the school of methods a variety of topics was discussed: "Scientific Temperance," Mrs. A. E. Albert, of Bridgeport, Ohio; "Railroad Work," Mrs. S. H. Martin, of Washington, D. C.; "Franchise," Mrs. S. N. Tudor, Maryland; "World's Fair," Mrs. R. H. Jones, Virginia; "Narcotics," Mrs. Mary Haslup, Maryland; "Alley Work," Mrs. Martin, District of Columbia; "The W. C. T. U.: What it is, and What it is Not," Mrs. Jane A. Johnson, West Virginia. Bible Readings were given. A "promise meeting" led by Jennie Smith, and a white ribbon conference in which about twenty-five took part.

Mountain Lake Park is a charming spot, and our program offers a richer feast each year to all who attend. This school of methods, which takes in seven states and the District of Columbia, has been under the management of Mrs. C. B. Buell for several years, which is a sufficient advertisement of its merits. JENNIE MCCLURKIN, Sec.

A "VESPER SERVICE" AT CHESTER.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—It was the habit of the camp to gather at Prospect Point each evening to see the glory of the setting sun. Prominent in the group assembled on Sunday, July 17, were Rev. Joseph Cook, Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts and Miss Leitch, of Ceylon.

Great cloud mountains of crimson, rich purple and gold made a magnificent pageant in the west, while a warm red glow of reflected color was over the two rivers with their many curves, the green forests and fields between the rivers; and through this haze of bright mist could be seen the outline of blue hills in the background.

Heads were bared, and in the silence as a softer glow enveloped the camp, some one started the doxology, in which the people joined spontaneously. Professor Jacoby scattered the leaflets among the crowd, and, led by the musical voice of Professor House, of Bunker Hill, all joined in singing "Day is dying in the west." This was followed by selections of a similar nature.

As the group dispersed, one could feel that it had been a time of uplifting, that the pettiness of life had been forgotten upon this higher spiritual plane. Joseph Cook pronounced the view from Prospect Point as one of the finest that he had ever witnessed.

One of the campers this year said feelingly, "It seems that nature intended these grounds for such a purpose, that this might be a place from which influence for good in every direction, and along all the lines of gospel and reformatory effort would be sent out broadcast." The opportunity to hear the grand talk given by Rev. Anna Shaw was one of the ways by which influence is propagated. ELIZABETH HOLBROOK.

OLD ORCHARD SCHOOL OF METHODS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The W. C. T. U. school of methods at Old Orchard, Maine, from August 2 to 5 was an all-round success. It was conducted by the state president, Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, and brought together prominent workers from all parts of Maine. Among those present from out of the state were Mrs. Ella Williams, treasurer of the World's W. C. T. U., and president of the Dominion of Canada union, Mrs. Sanderson, president of the Province of Quebec, Mrs. Congall and Mrs. McDowell, of Montreal, Mrs. Duran, of New Mexico, and Miss Underhill, of New York. Among the speakers were Mrs. Livermore, Mrs. J. K. Barney and Rev. Mr. Lansing, of Worcester, Mass.

The morning sessions were given to the discussion of topics of vital interest to local unions. At one of these meetings Mrs. Stevens announced that a Boston reporter had called on her the previous evening, stating that he had instructions to send fifty words on the horse race and five hundred about the school of methods. The audience rose and sang "The Morning Light is Breaking." Rev. Mr. Lansing gave a very fine address on the last evening, the venerable Father Randall pronouncing the closing benediction which he prefaced with words like these: "God bless the W. C. T. U. and Mrs. Stevens who has so successfully steered the ship in this state for many years, and whose last great success is the school of methods just closing here." REPORTER.

ANOTHER ENGLISH TEMPERANCE CAFE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—When visiting Derby a few days ago, to give a lecture under the auspices of the Derby Temperance Society, I learned some particulars of a very interesting local work, some account of which will appropriately follow what has already appeared in THE UNION SIGNAL about the English Coffee House movement, the more so as this enterprise is the work of some devoted women, and is of a kind that does not depend for success upon either particular persons, places, or circumstances, but may as readily be adopted in America as in England.

Derby is a large town of 100,000 people, situated in the midlands of England. The drink traffic finds its votaries and victims there as elsewhere; but a specially vigorous temperance organization gives the enemy no peace and no quarter. Not by any means the least successful department of the temperance society is the Woman's Auxiliary, which, under the able and devoted leadership of its president, Mrs. Boden, does a most excellent work. The whole town is divided into districts—the municipal wards, and each district is placed for facility of visitation, circulation of literature, and other purposes, under the care of a district superintendent and committee. The spacious Temperance Hall is by this means constantly filled by interested audiences at all sorts of meetings.

Not content with beaten tracks, Mrs. Boden gathering around her a few faithful ones, started some time back the special effort of which I want to tell. She calls it "The Golden Bell Café," but the singular feature is that it is a movable café, having no fixed habitation; the silver plated urns and delicate glass and china being utilized at various points as need arises.

Mrs. Boden's starting point was the idea that non-alcoholic refreshments ought to be obtainable on public occasions, such as foot ball or cricket matches, agricultural, horticultural and other shows. Unfortunately in England such gatherings are almost universally left to the dispensers of alcoholics. The mistaken idea on the part of professed temperance caterers is that "it won't pay" to set up temperance bars at such times. Mrs. Boden was met at Derby with exactly that reply, when as a first step she approached some of the business men to see if they would take the matter up, and carry it through on business lines. A good many people would have been discouraged and would have dropped the thing. But very slight contact with this lady is enough to show that she is not one of that sort. Therefore she set to work, and with the aid of others, instituted the Golden Bell Café, with the view of "supplying the general public with good refreshments, without subjecting them to the unpleasant custom of having to visit an ordinary bar where alcoholic liquors are sold."

The workers are voluntary. They comprise the president, manager, corresponding and financial secretaries, treasurer, clerk in charge, five superintendents and thirty-five waitresses and waiters. Their efficiency and attention has been warmly commended by the public press, and on every occasion win the admiration of all with whom they come into contact.

During one winter season four refreshment bars have been provided at twenty-six largely attended Saturday evening entertainments held in Temperance Hall. In the middle of a musical program a temperance speech is given, followed by an interval for "Refreshments—Golden Bell Café." Besides these, the refreshment bars have been carried on at each of twenty-five foot-ball matches, and the catering has also been done by the café at twenty-two conversaziones, or other public gatherings. Among the latter was an agricultural show, when five thousand persons visited the refreshment tents, which is evidence enough that the people are glad to have such provision made for innocent refreshment.

The bars are made attractive and tempting. The tea and coffee are of the best, as are the cakes and other eatables. The apparatus and all about it is cheery and bright; the waitresses ever pleasant looking, and neatly attired in a trim, distinctive uniform that but adds to the attractiveness of their appearance. They do not undersell the trade, but they give good value, and those who once try their commodities are found ready to come again. That is always a capital test by which to measure whatever appeals to large bodies of people for support.

Of course there have been carpers, what good work ever escaped them? But the position of usefulness to which the café has attained has pretty well silenced all objectors, except, of course, the drinksellers, who chafe to see the Golden Bell successfully competing with them on their own ground; demonstrating the needless character of their business, and best of all, winning many from the liquor bar to the temperance café.

"Does it pay?" is a natural question. The answer is that the work makes a profit so far as outfit and material are concerned, but not sufficient, as yet, to cover any cost for staff services. These, as already stated, are freely given. But it is evident that an enterprising caterer might soon make the thing pay, in the business sense. The primary object of those who conduct the Golden Bell Café is to prove that. H. J. G.

ANOTHER OPPORTUNITY.

To superintendents of the Sunday-school department, superintendents of literature, and local officers of the W. C. T. U.

GREETING:

As you well know, the demand for the May 22 Sunday-school temperance lesson was increased over that of January preceding, about 180,000 copies being used. This, however, is only a foundation for the work that is to be, and it should now be our first thought to extend to others not yet reached the benefits to be derived from these lessons.

The lesson for Sunday, September 25, is now ready. It is on "The Lord's Supper Profaned." Excellent opportunity is here offered to emphasize the principle of the use of unfermented wine at the sacrament, and this question has been raised so as to awaken thought. The lesson is beautifully illustrated and will do great good. Now is the time to send in orders. The following liberal terms are offered:

For 100, 65 cents; 500, $2.75; 1,000, $5. This includes postage, which has been added so as to avoid mistakes. The Young Crusader and the lesson will be sent on the following terms: For 100, $1; 500, $4.75: 1,000, $9; 2,000, $15; 5,000, $35; 8,000, $48. All orders between numbers named at the rate immediately preceding.

DO NOT FORGET,

In planning decorations for your booth at the Fair, that we still have some of the aquarelle-tint pictures of Miss Frances E. Willard. You should introduce her to all new-comers. So send for one or more copies. A letter recently received says of it:

"The picture of Miss Willard was duly received. It is very beautiful and far surpasses my expectation in every respect."

Washboards Make It Warm.

Bobbing up and down over them is pretty hot work. That rub, rub, rub on them is the best thing in the world to warm you up, and tire you out, and wear holes in light and delicate summer garments. Why don't you use Pearline, and take it easy? You can keep cool—and yet have the work better done.

Pearline takes away the rubbing, and the washboard, and the warm work. It gives you more time to yourself—and saves your money.

Send it Back Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, be honest—send it back. 336 JAMES PYLE, N. Y.

Manitou

MINERAL WATER.

It flows from the celebrated soda springs at Manitou Springs, Colorado, and is naturally effervescent. In the spring house it noisily churns and bubbles like a thing of life. The American Indians looked upon this as the one great fountain of life and a cure for all their ills. Hence they called it "Manitou Spring" (the Great Spirit spring).

People who use it for the first time exclaim,

"Such a Draught."

It hisses and bubbles when poured from the bottle, just as it does at the spring, being heavily charged with its own surplus gas. It should be drank with meals as a table water.

THE JUNIOR PARTNERS.

FACT is admitted by all that the people want books, and the supply is constantly increasing. But good books should be carefully selected.

We have something new to offer—something good. It is new in design, new in its method and a new production.

It is a decidedly interesting book, and everybody should read it. As soon as presented the demand for it will be very great. It is not only interesting, but helpful. It will arouse thought which must result in the formation of temperance sentiment.

Here is a chance for you to make money. If you want to know how, address

THE UNION SIGNAL SPECIAL LIMITED $5 PREMIUM.

To any person who shall send us a club of five new subscribers, at $1 each, received before October 1, 1892, we will send a scholarship for one month's instruction in the Phillips Home Study Business College, with a choice of shorthand, book-keeping, or penmanship. This very liberal offer presents a remarkable opportunity whereby any young man or woman may, without any expense whatever, secure a month's instruction at home, and thereby lay the foundation of a business education which will undoubtedly lead to success in life. Every energetic reader of THE UNION SIGNAL who is ambitious to better the condition of life, will at once set to work to secure the small number of subscriptions required, and this will be easily accomplished, for your friends will readily subscribe to assist you in so laudable an undertaking. The offer is limited to one month's instruction; beyond this, satisfactory arrangements can be made with the college.

THE ADVANCE GUARD

for August might well be called a Graduates' Number. It contains a ringing message from Miss Willard to the "splendid young recruits," and the salutatory and valedictory addresses given at the Wisconsin L. T. L. convention in June. "Here and There," its editorial section, is full of suggestions; Miss Gordon reports the Prohibition Convention, and "The Cheeryvale Law Club," and the serial story by Faye Huntington increase in interest. A bright poem, "When the Temp'rance People Win," is a fitting prelude to "The Way of the World," wherein are set forth liberal extracts from the platforms of the Prohibition and the People's parties, with enough questions thereon to set a whole community to thinking if a wide-awake L. T. L. ask them.

Where is your subscription for The Advance Guard? Can you afford to be without it? Price per year 50c.

FOR THE FAIRS.

This is the time to plan for work for the fairs.

We have the usual large supply of suitable literature for the seed-sowing which can then be done, and of which you should secure a liberal supply.

We have the fair number of THE UNION SIGNAL, with its World's Fair supplement, which should be scattered generally.

And then we have the Automatic Fountain, from which a cool and tasteful drink may be obtained by the thirsty crowds, and from which you can secure the pennies or nickels with which to meet your expenses. You should send for one or more without delay.

Have you received our terms circular? If not, write and ask for it.

Two penny-a-drink fountains furnished more than 2,900 drinks in one day, in the Chicago post-office. That means more than $29, from which the Chicago Central Union is reaping a benefit.

The Des Moines union will have three fountains on its fair grounds.

There is money in it for your work. Investigate, and prove the truth of this assertion.

. . . FOR OUR . . .

NEW BOOK. .

This is an opportunity which should be improved. This book is entirely different from any heretofore on the market, and will be in greater demand because it will be enjoyed by business men as well as by their families. Not many books are written which appeal to business men as this does. Those who have read it voluntarily testify to its merits in this direction. A prominent and wealthy business man of this city who employs

HUNDREDS OF MEN

Wishes to place it in the hands of each one that they may be benefited by its teachings. This is valuable indorsement. It will be of especial help to young men

JUST STARTING in BUSINESS LIFE

Employer and employed, as showing where the shoals lie upon which they may make shipwreck. The influence of is also portrayed with power, and that of a noble-minded daughter, in restraining destructive tendencies is outlined in detail in the course of the narrative. The fallacy of the belief, "I can use it or let it alone" is fully exposed. The circulation and reading of this book will be a blessing to thousands.

Signal Notes.

THE world's type-writer record is one hundred and eighty-two words a minute and is held by a lady.

FOUR reasons for being a total abstainer: the head is clearer, the health is better, the heart is lighter and the purse is heavier.

A RECENT title to an article on the exportation of rum to Africa is "Devil's Missionary Enterprise" which, if startling, is not inappropriate.

BY a standing vote, the Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian church adopted the report condemning the sale of liquor and the opening of the gates on Sunday at the Columbian Exhibition.

APPROPRIATIONS for Indian education have been cut half a million dollars, notwithstanding there are among the Navajo Indians alone, over three thousand children of school age for whom no school advantages are afforded.

ALTHOUGH women are entering most of the pursuits of men, there is one which the men still hold alone and that is the occupation of tramp. The absence of the woman tramp is a tribute to the industry of the feminine portion of humanity.

IN an attempt to defend the cause of moderation in the use of alcohol, a prominent English physician really indicts it, for he says, "Mix all liquors with food which shields the tissues from its contact and aids its safe dispersion through the circulation."

MISS STIRLING'S Homes for Children now established in Nova Scotia, had their beginning in Edinburgh, where she opened a day nursery, a home for motherless children and one for the wretched little inmates of baby farms. These charities laid the foundation for a Scottish national society for the prevention of cruelty to children.

THE latest figures of the Census Bureau show that immigration is a great source of pauperism in this country. Of the white paupers who constitute 91.15 per cent of the total, only 29 per cent are of native born parents. If something is not done soon the next census may show that American citizens are working to support an army of foreign paupers.

THE protegés, patrons and sympathizers of Dr. Bernardo recently made their third annual pilgrimage to Albert Hall, Kensington, England. It was a mighty object lesson of the sins and sorrows of the great city of London with the Christlike endeavors to relieve them. The boys and girls to the number of fifteen hundred provided the really beautiful music, for music has always been a principal item in the training of the waifs at the Homes. The boys gave military drills, ten workshops were seen in ful operation for a few moments, but the mostl touching sight of all was the procession of boy and girl waifs fresh from the slums. A band of sturdy young emigrants, ready to start for Manitoba, showed what could be made of the raw recruits in time. Dr. Bernardo keeps an eye on those who have left the Homes for situations, and every year he gives prizes or certificates to those who fill such situations creditably. The number of England's waifs who were cared for in 1891 was six thousand eight hundred and sixty-six. Including the two hundred about to start, Dr. Bernardo has sent five thousand five hundred emigrants to Canada and the British Colonies.

SOME remedies recently given by Rev. M. C. Peters, of New York, in a sermon on the evils connected with women's wages are as follows:

1. Let every woman learn to do some one thing. Unskilled labor must take what it can get.
2. Never slight your work. The disparity wages is largely due to the difference in grade of work.
3. Train our women for housework.
4. Let store-keepers and manufacturers be made to understand that the low wages they pay contribute more to the social evil than any other one thing.
5. Let woman cease her inhumanity to woman. Some women beat down to the lowest figure every woman who works for them.
6. Show shop girls and sewing women more sympathy. Do what you can to cheer the women who have to fight the battle of life alone.
7. Avoid bargain counters. Prices are forced down by wages of workers forced back. God only knows how much buying on the cheap plan is responsible for fallen virtue.

Sickness Among Children,

Especially infants, is prevalent at all times, but is largely avoided by giving proper nourishment and wholesome food. The most successful and reliable is the Gail Borden "Eagle" Brand Condensed Milk. Your grocer and druggist keeps it.

GENTLEMEN: This bank has recently erected a new office building, which is now being occupied. The entire building is supplied with lime-stone water from a well sunk by the owners. It has come to the ears of the officers of the bank that we will have considerable complaint from the tenants in using this water for toilet purposes, and we are anxious to avoid any such complaint.

The bank has used Ivory Soap for several years with river water, and as it is found equally satisfactory with the lime-stone water, it is desired that all of the tenants should know this; we write to ask if you will send about a dozen small placards, somewhat similar in substance to the slip enclosed, which may be hung in the lavatories.

This will serve to advertise the soap and satisfy the tenants.

BUTTERMILK TOILET SOAP.

Our readers will do well to read the advertisement of the Cosmo Co. in another column, regarding Buttermilk Toilet Soap. This soap has only been on the market a little over a year, but judging from its immense sales and the large and progressive merchants that make it a specialty, it is the most popular toilet soap now on sale. It is absolutely pure, and most excellent for the skin. We advise you to try a sample cake.

CHICAGO PAPERS THE WORLD.

The Inter-state Commerce law, by the protection which it has furnished to shipments in small packages, has enabled Alfred Peats, of Chicago, to build up the largest retail wall-paper business in this country.

He will send through the mail to any address samples of wall paper of the very latest styles and colorings, artistically arranged, with borders and ceilings to match, and at much lower prices than the small dealer can offer.

Peats papers the world. He wants your trade. He sold 1,500,000 rolls of wall paper the first six months in 1892, which would make, placed end to end, four arms of beautiful coloring reaching from Chicago to the four extremes of this great country.

Send your name and address to Alfred Peats, 136-138 West Madison St., Chicago, and he will send you, free, assorted samples of wall paper and a book on "How to Paper" your walls.

Never sit down to dinner without a bottle of "Manitou Water." It will make you healthier and happier.

CHAUTAUQUA

Lake and Assembly Grounds are reached in the most comfortable manner by the Erie Lines. All the through trains between Chicago, Cincinnati, and New York and Boston over the Erie run via the Lake; consequently no changes of cars from those points.

A CHANCE TO MAKE MONEY.

I have berries, grapes and peaches a year old, fresh as when picked. I use the California Cold Process; do not heat or seal the fruit, just put it up cold; keeps perfectly fresh, and costs almost nothing; can put up a bushel in ten minutes. Last week I sold directions to over 120 families; any one will pay a dollar for directions, when they see the beautiful samples of fruit. As there are many people poor like myself, I consider it my duty to give my experience to such, and feel confident any one can make one or two hundred dollars, round home, in a few days. I will mail sample of fruit and complete directions to any of your readers for 18 two-cent stamps, which is only the actual cost of the samples, postage, etc., to me.

CALIFORNIA.

California is the most attractive and delightful section of the United States, if not of the world, and its many beautiful resorts will be crowded with the best families of the East during the entire winter. It offers to the investor the best open opportunity for safe and large returns from its fruit lands. It offers the kindest climate in the world to the feeble and debilitated, and it is reached in the most comfortable manner over the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad.

Pullman Vestibule Sleeping Cars leave Chicago by this line every day in the year, and go without change or transfer through to San Francisco, Los Angeles and San Diego. This is a feature not offered by any other line.

Write to John J. Byrne, 723 Monadnock Building, Chicago, Ill., if you desire any further information as to the country and the accommodations for reaching it.

LOW RATE HARVEST EXCURSIONS.

The announcement that the North-Western Line, comprising over 8,000 miles of thoroughly equipped railway, has arranged to run two low rate Harvest Excursions during the months of August and September, will be gladly received by those who are interested in the development of the great West and Northwest, as well as by those who desire to visit this wonderfully productive region at a season of the year when exact demonstration can be made of the merits and advantages it offers to homeseekers and those in search of safe and profitable investments.

These excursions will leave Chicago on August 30th and September 27th, and tickets can be purchased at the very low rate of one fare for the round trip to points in Iowa, Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, Idaho and Montana. They will be strictly first-class in every particular and will be good for return passage at any time within twenty days from date of purchase. Full information concerning rates and arrangements for these excursions can be obtained upon application to any coupon ticket agent, or to W. A. Thrall, G. P. T. A., Chicago & North-Western R'y, Chicago.

THREE HARVEST EXCURSIONS

Half Rates via the Illinois Central.

Aug. 30th, Sept. 27th and Oct. 25, 1892.

The Central Route will sell Excursion tickets to the Agricultural Regions of the West Southwest and South, at one fare for the Round Trip, from stations on its lines north of Cairo, on August 30th, and September 27th. A third excursion will be run to the South and Southwest on October 25th. Your Local Ticket Agent will give you full particulars in regard to these Harvest Excursions; arrangements can also be made in this connection to visit the desirable Railroad Lands for sale by the Illinois Central in Southern Illinois on obtaining special permission to do so by addressing the Company's Land Commissioner at Chicago, Mr E. P. Skene. In addition, a few weeks before the first Excursion date, your Local Ticket Agent will be able to furnish you with a special Folder, issued by the Illinois Central, which will give you particulars of these Harvest Excursions in such form as will enable you to plan your journey at home. Should you not be within call of a railroad ticket agent, address A. H. Hanson, G. P. A., Illinois Central R. R., Chicago, Ill.

The president and secretary of the Ohio Christian Endeavor union have declined to allow their names to be used in connection with the Columbian Endeavor Association or Hotel Endeavor enterprise, at the World's Fair, because the Columbian Exposition directory favors the Continental Sabbath and the interests of the rum power.

"THE temperance plank in the Republican platform might have been adopted with perfect propriety by any Liquor Dealers' Association, cruelly remarks the Wine and Spirit Gazette," says the Springfield (Mass.) Weekly Republican.

IT is a pretty good indication of activity in our work that in August, the hottest month in the year, our publishing house sold over 145,000 leaflets, 28,000 temperance pledges, well-nigh 10,000 Scripture cards, over 4,300 manuals, over 5,000 badges, and over 1,600 song books. The steady growth of the business, under the careful management of Mrs. Rastall, is most gratifying to white-ribboners.

THE Christian Endeavor Society is sending out temperance literature to all its local auxiliaries. We are glad of this, and hope that the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association will be on its lists extensively, as we doubt not will be the case, for we have in our large, new catalogue a great variety from which to select, and the young people will be sure to find interesting material on our shelves.

MISS IRENE FOCKLER has been appointed associate superintendent of the press department National W. C. T. U. to coöperate with Mrs. H. B. Kells, editor of the contributed departments of THE UNION SIGNAL, Mrs. Kells being superintendent of press work in the National W. C. T. U. Miss Fockler has been for three years one of Miss Willard's secretaries and has acquired experience in journalistic lines.

THE American Sabbath Union is vigorously at work preparing to secure the enforcement of Sunday laws in Chicago. It is well known that saloons and theaters thrive at their own sweet will by Sunday patronage, in direct violation of law, and have done so for years. We rejoice in this new movement for enforcement, and hope our local white-ribbon societies will help it on by every means in their power.

MISS ANNA DICKINSON gave her famous lecture, "Joan of Arc," in the Asbury Park Auditorium, August 5th, to a large audience, many of whom were there perhaps as jurors self-appointed. The verdict was an enthusiastic acquittal from all the charges of mental incapacity that have been spread abroad. The applause was honest and hearty, and when, after the closing sentences of her lecture, she immediately retired from the platform the audience persisted in an enthusiastic recall until Miss Dickinson returned with the same beaming countenance and dignified bearing as she ever possessed and smilingly bowed her thanks. Her magnificent voice remains as melodious as of old.

MRS. LEONORE BARRY-LAKE, 1204 St. Ange Avenue, St. Louis, Mo., has formed the first white ribbon society of Catholic women of which we have knowledge. She did this with the full approval of the Vicar-general, who enthusiastically indorsed our work. There are sixty members in this first Woman's Temperance Union. They wear the white ribbon attached to a small silver cross. Mrs. Barry-Lake is an Irish woman of exceptional eloquence and large experience in labor organizations. We wish our local presidents would invite her to their towns to speak before the Catholic women and enlist them in our work. We hope to have Mrs. Barry-Lake with us again at the Convention in Denver, as we were glad to welcome her in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York City, when she came as a fraternal delegate from the Knights of Labor to the National W. C. T. U. in 1888.

THE short trip of Misses Willard and Gordon to England is purely for purposes of recuperation, physically and spiritually. They are both exceedingly worn, and will hold no meetings, be present at no receptions nor other gatherings of any sort. They will be quietly in retirement in some one of Lady Henry Somerset's homes, and count much upon the rest, the change, the voyage and the gentle ministrations of their loyal friend. We say this that there may be a perfect understanding from the first and in order that no pains may be taken by our kind friends across the water who we are sure would gladly welcome the president of the World's W. C. T. U. with every token of the love and confidence which they have often testified and which will now be best manifested by leaving her in complete quiet for the purposes we have mentioned. Miss Willard has resigned all official relationships to any enterprise or society except the W. C. T. U.

ONE of the greatest among our religious weeklies, in an editorial item concerning the Christian Endeavor convention, says: "Prohibition is one of the cardinal features of the movement. One of the most prominent among the list of speakers declares that he has not preached a prohibition sermon since the subject was a political issue." Those who read the resolutions of the Christian Endeavor society know that it declared a belief that any man, who voted for parties that licensed the liquor traffic, committed a sin. This is valuable reading on the subject of politics. As to the minister who does not feel ashamed to say that, in the twenty years since prohibition was made a political issue, he has not preached a prohibition sermon, we do not envy him, nor his record in this or any other world, so far as the causes of Christ and humanity are concerned, in the American Republic and in the nineteenth century where this good brother has had his chance to do or not to do, to speak or not to speak.

REST ISLAND, Minn., goes forward mightily. "Somerset Cottage," with a capacity for twenty men, is finished and occupied; cost $10,000. Willard Cottage, with equal capacity, is under way, and will be done November 1. The laying of its corner-stone, late in July, was made memorable by the raising of $1,215 in the audience, beside the gift of a diamond ring worth $500. Rest Island is unique and wonderful; only penitent men get there, and every day is some drunkard's pentecost.

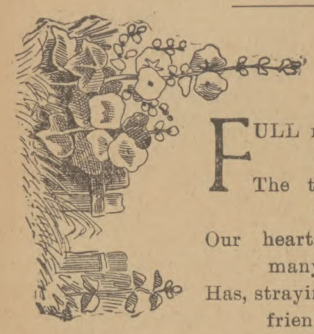
THE bust of Miss Frances E. Willard by Miss Whitney has been completed and is pronounced by Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, Miss Lillian Whiting, and other distinguished friends of Miss Willard, to be remarkably excellent as everybody knew would be the case when Miss Whitney undertook the work. A plaster cast has been made from the clay model for which Miss Willard sat and it is now in Italy where it will be wrought into marble by next autumn. The bust of Mrs. Matilda B. Carse has been executed by Mr. Carl Rohl-Smith, the distinguished Italian sculptor who is in Chicago, making a group symbolic of the founding of the city, which is to cost thirty thousand dollars and be presented to the city by George M. Pullman. The plaster cast of this bust, which has received the warm, favorable verdict of Mrs. Carse's friends, has also been sent to Italy and the two will be in readiness to occupy the pedestals prepared for them in Willard Hall when it shall be opened to the public in October next.

THE following sentiment from the Golden Rule is too good to keep: "It is proposed to coin from silver now in the treasury, ten million silver half dollars, which are to be souvenirs of the World's Fair. They will have a special design, and the design should be an appropriate one. We venture to suggest that in case the Fair is to engage in the saloon business and keep open on the Lord's day, the following emblems should find place on these souvenir half-dollars. It would be absurd under the circumstances to enthrone the Goddess of Liberty on the coin; put in her place a bloated drunkard astride a beer barrel. The thirteen stars are all right, only the ordinary drunkard sees more than thirteen. Let the obverse bear a carrion crow, rampant, torn fragments of the Bible in either claw, on its breast a shield with the design of a church turned upside down, and, above, the inscription 'In coin we trust.' Instead of 'United States of America,' put 'United States of the Rumsellers.' And, by the way, why use a noble metal? Make the half dollars of brass. Foreigners would then cease to sneer at our coin, calling it commonplace and lacking appropriateness."

THE new English Parliament is unique as the first to go into office with temperance legislation as one of the great questions of the leading political party. The late general elections returned three hundred members pledged to support the direct popular veto. For a half dozen years the Conservatives have tried to place the liquor traffic upon a sure foundation, and have suffered humiliation in so doing. "The trade," too, has "shown its hand." But if the Liberals go into battle with no masked batteries of the enemy to uncover, they have yet to learn whether their friends in the House of Commons will be a working majority or will redeem their pledges by a "masterly inactivity," which, at any rate, will prove to their constituents that the power to crush the drink traffic must be in the hands of all "the people," not half of them. Scotland and Wales will demand the direct veto for themselves; it is therefore probable all forces will concentrate for the Irish Sunday Closing Act, and England will come in at the close with her great temperance question. Mr. Herbert Gladstone says: "The Liberal party has made great sacrifices for this temperance question, having cost it more votes at the polls than any other. Surely the men who ought to lead the van against the evil, so far as it can benefit by legislation, are the clergy of the Church of England; yet, I had not a single clergyman of the church supporting me."

A VICTOR-SONG.

BY ALICE M. GUERNSEY.



FULL many a time my pen has sought to tell
The tender love and loving tenderness
Our hearts which thrilled. Full many a time my hand
Has, straying, touched the strings of friendship's harp,
Has waked its songs of gladness and of mirth,
And—once before—has swept its minor chords,
Which sent their wail of solemn, sacred pain
Through all the spaces of thy Cottage home.

But now, O friend, there thrills another strain.
What chords are struck when warrior homeward comes,
With laurel crowned, from battle-fields of strife?
What harvest songs exultant tell the earth
That full fruition crowns the workers' toil?
These, these the notes I fain would sound to-day,
The pæan of triumphant victory,

The Harvest Home of ripened, perfect grain—
A rounded life, to full completeness brought!
A drifting into harbor with the tide,
The Pilot's hand upon the steady helm!
A footstep but this moment by our side,
Then, echoing in the next—a blessed room
Of the great home wherein the Father dwells!
To "fall on sleep"—and, oh, to waken, then,
To the full glories of the Sabbath morn,
In that fair land where nightfall never comes!

O Death, grim Death, where is thy sting, to-day?
Where, Grave, thy victory, when such as she Sweep through thy portals, blood-washed, crowned with light,
And met by welcomes on the heavenward side?

Aye, palms of victory are the emblems meet,
"God keeps His heaven" for souls thus triumph-crowned.

But for hearts that ache with the pain and loss,
For the souls that faint 'neath the heavy cross,
There is rest and strength in the Love that gave His best-beloved our loved to save.

. . . . . .

Gird up thy robes! The Master still has need
Of toil where thou alone canst sow the seed;
But first He bids thee, in His matchless grace,
"Come thou apart and rest a little space."

So, bon voyage! "Good," truly, may it be,
Our hearts go with thee o'er the bounding sea,
Our prayers go with thee, and, on wave or strand,
He holds thee "in the hollow of His hand."

SOME PASSAGES IN THE PRACTICE OF DR. MARTHA SCARBOROUGH.

BY HELEN CAMPBELL.

CHAPTER III.

Dr. Martha looked with a little hesitation at her portion of the deep cherry pie and then toward her father to see what his course was likely to be. But Dr. Scarborough ate his contentedly, bursting into a laugh as he looked up and found the child's eyes fixed upon him.

"Then you don't think it would be wicked for me to eat it," she said with a look of relief. "Because, you know, I don't want my bones like peppermint stick."

"If you had pie three times a day, or even three times a week, little woman, I should have a word to say. But in this house we are sensible enough to take the bit of sweet one naturally craves, without adding lard and starch."

"One would think you had a positive spite against both of them," said Miss Malvina reprovingly. "I'm sure pigs must have been made for some purpose, else why are they in the world, and as for what you call starch, a slice of white bread looks considerable better than that grayish brown stuff you call 'whole wheat.' I thought father was fussy, but you are ten times worse, Nathan."

"When one has to 'fuss,' as you call it, for an entire township, it is less simple than if each house did a little on its own account," Dr. Scarborough answered, after a pause in which he seemed falling into another brown study, his eyes fixed on the child who was eating her cherries one by one with the daintiness that was her habit, testing the flavor of each with slow enjoyment.

"Curious how heredity shows itself," he said. "That child never saw her grandmother, but she is eating that pie precisely like her. I see mother's motions a hundred times a day, and every now and then a little streak of father. How much real self is there to any of us?"

"Thanks be to Praise!" ejaculated Miss Malvina; "I am not always studying out whether I crook my left hand like my great-grandfather, or sneeze like old Aunt Bassett. There may not be much of me, but what there is I claim is me, myself, and nobody else, and that's what I say for Martha, there. She's Martha Scarborough, and she's to account for Martha Scarborough, and not for any ancestor that ever was before her. I say there wouldn't be any morals left if you let everything get mixed up so, as it does when you tumble in every generation at once, and you no more than a single huckleberry in a pan of milk."

Miss Malvina's voice had risen, as was its custom, into the high-pitched wail excitement brings to the New England woman of the hills, and Martha, who from the beginning had been schooled by her father to speak in even tones, looked at her critically, wondering why there had never been anybody to tell her how much some of the sounds were like a gate on its rusty hinges.

"I would rather hear a flock of guinea-hens at their highest, than ten of these farmers' wives shut up in a room together," Dr. Scarborough had said one day after an unusually long parley between Miss Malvina and the Widow Barnes. "Martha, if I ever hear such sounds coming from your little throat I shall send you to boarding school the next day."

Dr. Martha looked up in affright. "They're talking about the fair," she said. "Widow Barnes is going to make seven kinds of cake and get the prize this year just as she did last, and Aunt Malvina is going to send some jelly, all kinds."

"There is sense in jellies, but very little in this unending cake-making," Dr. Scarborough said with a frown. "A good salad would be much more to the purpose, or even a savory stew or soup, but all the creatures can do with meat is to fry its life out and call it steak, or roast it to a crisp, and serve with a pasty, greasy glue for gravy. With the best food-supply the world knows, we are the worst fed of any civilized people. I might have been in the old traces yet if your grandfather had not been lucky enough to have part of his education in Paris, and learned the possibilities of a good many things New England has yet to take in. This fried leather they call beef; tea boiled in tin till it is almost pure tannin, warranted to tie every nerve in a bow-knot, and tan the coats of the stomach till they cannot act naturally, and digestion is done for; and then filling in with pie and cake because the poor, gnawing, unsatisfied, abused thing must have something that seems to fill comfortably. The cabbage soup and black bread of the poorest French peasant are more really nourishing than the messes that take prizes from men who don't know the meaning of good food, and never will till some convulsion of nature lands them suddenly in a land where pies are unknown, and a woman knows what a salad means and can toss you up one from any roadside, as we could too, if sense were distributed."

The office-bell rang as he ended, and Dr. Martha who had fixed her eyes on him, trying, as was her custom, to understand what it could all be about, followed, hoping he would not be called away at once.

"Johnny Templeton—another fit," she heard, and in a moment Dr. Scarborough was hurrying up the hill toward the square white house at the turn, and the Widow Barnes had run round to see where he was going, still continuing the recital of the latest rule for layer-cake.

"What is the fair for?" asked Dr. Martha, suddenly.

"That child's enough to make you jump," remarked the widow, as she turned. "Ain't you old enough to know that the men folks send hosses and calves and the biggest of the squashes and such like, to show what they've been about all the year, and the jedges give prizes for the best? They're always a-tryin' to see what kind's the best, and they're gettin' ahead every year. Hiram's cows get more care than ever we got when we was growin' up together, an' as for hosses, they're combed and groomed, till it's discouraging to think of the time it takes."

"A man isn't worth as much as a horse, is he?" Dr. Martha said, after a pause for consideration.

"Land sakes, child, I should think you was a heathen! A hoss hain't got any soul to be saved."

"But if a horse has to be combed and rubbed and fed just so every day, why doesn't a man, if he is really worth more?" persisted Dr. Martha. "My father says that lots of houses that have plenty of room and plenty of money haven't any bathroom but the kitchen sink. Why don't people think about it? Is it because they don't care to be clean?"

"Of all the saucy, impudent children," began the widow, with a scarlet face; but Miss Malvina had hustled Dr. Martha out of the room and toward the front steps, where she sat down, a little bewildered, till her father came back, calling for Dolly as he passed the barn and pausing at the steps for a moment to talk.

"What makes Johnny have fits?" she asked, after a moment, in which the pair smiled at each other, and she resolved to find out his view of horses and men.

"Because there isn't a sound inch in his forlorn little body," said her father. "The Templetons all the way back were high livers. The men overate and soaked themselves with toddy. The women lived in the kitchen, and grew more and more morbid and unwholesome with every generation. Patent medicine came to finish the work, and Johnny has not only his own weazened little body in his way, but the inheritance of bad blood on both sides. He can be cured if they will only obey orders. Whether they will or not I can't tell. I should like to turn him out to grass for a few years."

"Then it is better to be a horse than a man, sometimes anyway, isn't it?" Dr. Martha said with conviction, but at this moment Dolly was led around, and her father hurried away to a special case where it was impossible to take her, and she sat down again on the steps, till Miss Malvina appeared with a square of patchwork, detested, but admitted to be a necessity.

"If men try to make things better every year so as to get prizes, why don't women too?" Dr. Martha said, when she had taken the first stitches. "Would any judge give a prize for the best kind of a boy? Could a woman make the best kind of a boy? or would it have to be a man?"

Miss Malvina took off her glasses and rubbed her eyes, in order to better discern both speaker and the bearings of this latest question.

"For the land's sake!" she began, but at this moment the bell rang again, and before her return, Dr. Martha had finished the square and fled to the orchard, where, sitting on the low limb of an apple tree, she meditated on what her father had said, deciding again that when she got to be a judge, if ever that time should come, her prizes should be for boys first, and afterward for horses.

CROSS-TIES.

XIII.

BY JOHN G. WOOLLEY.

THE FARMER'S MISTAKE.

THE UNION SIGNAL will never be charged with any lack of cordiality to rural people or interests, and so we dare speak frankly.

The political movement knownas the farmers' move ment will disappoint its promoters. Not because it ought to fail, but because, in its present phase, it appears to be essentially selfish, and consequently barren of interest or promise to the general good.

The farmer seems to have gone into politics to get something, and that is ever a small business. These are the days of Jesus Christ and of men who go into politics to give not to get. Political reforms that are founded in self-interest are things of sudden and rapid growth—of the genus mushroom—momentary, or at least smallish triumphs of muck and darkness, so to speak, incapable of sustained development, organically morbid and fiberless, having no proper body, but being merely monstrous glands without other function than to drain and secrete, and they die young of gluttony, just as individual candidacy for office, animated by selfishness only, invariably brings up at the pot-house of its origin.

The farmer appears to be in politics in behalf of his own, that is bad—his own barn and cellar, that is worse. We tried to persuade him to include his parlor, his wife, his boys and girls, but he declined, that is worst.

The consequence is that his movement is already anæmic and unwieldy, while each of the other parties to the great contention of 1892 is "in condition" and enthusiastic.

The reason is near by: Democrat stands for larger markets and cheaper goods for everybody.

Republican stands for protected industries, higher wages and fair elections for everybody.

Prohibitionist stands for political sanitation for a humanity that has God in it.

Each a trunk line; take your choice according to where you want to go: but the farmers' movement as yet is a mere turn-table, a thing on casters that don't go anywhere, that is fatal, for a political movement that don't move is merely political rickets and simply pitiful.

All this means no disparagement of the farmer who is, in fact, the hope of the country politically, but he must leave his own barn-yard and take the King's highway. there never was, nor ever will be a worthy knighthood, wearing no colors but its own.

Every gallant man is somebody else's champion. Selfish or class parties do not last, even as active minorities: defeats are fatal to them for they are destitute of recuperative power. On the other hand, for instance, consider the woman's movement—it thrives on discouragement and gets momentum from defeat. And look at the Prohibition party; such vitality compels sympathy and is the product of the divine principle that underlies, namely: the sacred and inviolable kinship of humanity.

Farmers do well to stand for their just share of legislative attention and if they will only couple that demand to some great cause of everlasting righteousness, we want to be among the first to say "God speed!" and this plain word, offered in love, is simply admonitory, lest our wholesomest, best manhood seem to ignore the rights of man to contend for the rights of a few men.

THE UNEMPLOYED AND THE SALOONS.

BY FLORENCE KELLEY.

A woman started out in search of work the other day. The house that she left was neat as hands could make it, the five children were in school, their worn clothing patched to the utmost limit.

The grocer had said in the morning, "I'm sorry, Mrs. Blank, and I would give credit as long as you need it, if I were not so poor myself. But I have come to the end of all I can do at present." All that he had done was to furnish flour, yeast and molasses for seven months, for father, mother and five children had lived all the winter upon bread and molasses.

The moral of the tale is brief, but the problem it enfolds is the problem of our whole civilization. The father had been for five and twenty years a steady and expert workman. He was a carpenter by trade and lost his "job" on a public school building at the end of the summer. From September 6th to February 15th he tramped in search of whatever work might offer. Finding none, disgusted with life, he drank to the point of oblivion and recovering his senses, returned to his wife saying, that he meant to stay drunk till he died, for it did no good to work steadily twenty-five years and be no better off for it; he could not face life sober without work.

Then poverty reached its deepest depths. The wife made suspenders at fifteen cents a dozen, buying the sewing silk herself. The bread and molasses grew scarcer than ever, the children fell ill and one died. The father was well nigh mad whenever he emerged from his oblivion.

Yet all that winter the streets of the great city in which that workman lived were foully filthy, and he might well have been employed upon them every day. There were fifty-seven thousand children in the city without school accommodations, and this carpenter might well have been at work throughout the months of his despair, building school-houses. There were swarms of families dwelling in quarters unfit for human habitation, and an army of carpenters could have been well employed in housing them. There were thousands of children in the mills, doing labor unfit for any child, while an able-bodied man searched vainly day by day, month after month, for work, and at the end sought forgetfulness in rum.

Alas! There was no immediate profit for any capitalist in doing any or all of these beneficent things; for the common profit, we have not yet learned to work. Until we organize our activities so wisely that our streets shall be cleaned under civil service rules, our children sent to school and not to the shop and the factory and the sweater's den, we need not hope that the men unemployed can be kept from seeking oblivion in drink. We may deplore and reprehend their action as we will, men whose babies cry with hunger will drink to escape the haunting sight and sound.

When the great cities make provision for the employment of the unemployed, providing winter work and shortening the hours of work in order to spread what is done in the year over as much of the year as possible, there will be fewer men in the position of our friend, the carpenter, and fewer women in the sad plight of his wife.

The wife has worked with a will all these twenty years. She has reared and helped and started five well-cared-for children into school, and now her one complaint is not against the selfishness of the man who leaves her to face what he flees before, seeking refuge in artificial forgetfulness. No, her one lamentation is this: "He worked so steady so many years, and now it is not the work but the want of work that has broken his will and made him drink himself mad."

Surely every woman who faces the practical difficulties of temperance work soon meets the need of study of the economic conditions which produce an army of the unemployed to fall ready victims of the saloon. But do we study as faithfully as we might? Have we looked up the remedies which the wage-earners themselves suggest for their difficulties? They are the vast majority of our American republic, these men and women who live by the sweat of their brow, and until we gain their sympathy by effectively giving them ours, we can never win the day. Are we doing this?

WHAT SOME DISTINGUISHED MEN THINK OF "CORRECT DRESS," AS ILLUSTRATED BY WOMEN.

[The good brothers-in-law have this week "the freedom of the press" to say what they think of the present style of dress for women, and none shall make them afraid in this liberty. "Protection for all and favor to none" is our watch-word. But very soon the women will express themselves on the same subject, and may relieve their minds, "not in driblets," of their opinion of men's dress. Opinions invited, presto!—EDS.]

TOO MUCH MIND TO BE MADE UP ON A SMALL MATTER.

"What do men think of the present style of dress, as illustrated by women? What would they suggest as an improvement?" I am sorry to have to confess that I know so little about the dress of women that I feel myself to be entirely incompetent to answer the question in an intelligent manner. I am sorry that I cannot throw any light on this interesting question.

LINKS TO WOMAN'S GOOD SENSE.

I beg leave to say that I do not believe men think of the present style of dress as illustrated by women at all. They have simply general impressions received from such styles, which are fleeting, evanescent, and generally confined to the few moments that the women are present. I think they will be more than willing to indorse any improvement that the sensible, intelligent women of this country may adopt, if it will tend to greater health, strength and vitality.

UNADORNED ADORNED THE MOST.

I do not think myself competent to offer a valuable opinion on the subject. All I ask of a woman is, for her own sake, to wear a dress that is comfortable and healthy, and, for mine, one that will not diminish her charms; a fine woman can hardly add to them. If women make any mistake in the matter, it is in this, that they rely too much on ornament when nature would suffice. I am, however, disposed to defer to the judgment of the more esthetic sex in all questions of this sort, always reserving to myself the right most highly to approve those who indulge in the fewest fantasies.

NO USE TO TALK!

The present style of dress among ladies may be changed before this note can reach you, unless the correspondence with the ultraism of Paris should be blocked by some accident. When I see a female figure in a fashion-plate, I am reminded of a caricature of the Prince of Wales (George IV.) enormously fat. Two footmen were tugging at his corset strings, each with a foot solid against his back to give them a good foundation for a good pull. As for the lady duchess, not so much power is required, a chambermaid could pull sufficiently, the patient holding on firmly at the bedpost. I have nothing to recommend as a substitute for the present style, because no word of caution would have the smallest effect. We should be thankful that the fashion is no worse than we see it.

WOMEN, ELDERLY AND YOUNG, CAN AFFORD INDEPENDENCE OF FASHION.

Like all other men I admire women's present style of dress because I admire its wearers. I was equally charmed with hoop skirts and pullbacks in the days of their supremacy. Yet, being no longer so young as I once was, I will venture to express a wish that certain excrescences on the shoulders might be abated, that spider-waists might be enlarged and that skirts might be so far abbreviated as not to come in contact with doorsteps and pavements. Until we men are wise enough to give women municipal suffrage, and to elect, or appoint, them superintendents of streets, such contact will put long skirts at a painful disadvantage. Elderly women can afford to study comfort and convenience. Young and beautiful women can afford to differ a little from prevailing fashions in the direction of utility, without departing so widely as to incur ridicule. Let us hope that in the good time coming independence of fashion may itself become fashionable among women.

Boston, Mass. HENRY B. BLACKWELL.

CHIVALROUS FAITH IN WOMAN'S EVOLUTING PROPERLY.

Rather would I know what one loving, refined woman thinks "of the present style of dress as illustrated by women," than to know the opinions of all the men in America. And how can men make any valuable suggestion to improve what commends itself to all the women of the world to-day? From the time of the ancient peplos, chiton, and himation women have never been dressed, I think, more sensibly, more gracefully than now. And when I add that there seems little suggestion of immodesty in present styles, let me be understood to refer to home and street costumes, not to low-drawn opera and ball dresses, and to have in mind the sweet gowns of smaller cities of my native section, not any extreme fashions that may be found in largest cities. Here in Alabama I see daily illustrations of good sense, good taste, modesty, grace, refinement, and of a genuine instinct for art. I would pray that the present drapery, lovely enough to please a Grecian eye, and the present simplicity, freedom from cumbering under-rigging and absence of overloading flounces, of wheel-like farthingales, of tilting hoops, and of kite-tailed bustles may long continue. I trust to the cultured woman of the twentieth century to evolve this all important wrappage along the lines of good sense and beautiful, simple art.

Montgomery, Ala. CLIFFORD LANIER.

IGNORANCE THE PARENT OF CONFORMITY TO FASHION.

From a sanitary and hygienic point of view, the present style of dress for woman is a composite of the most ignorant conceptions of the object and purposes of dress. The attempt to combine art along lines entirely at variance with nature is always a sad failure. Disfigurement of form and proportion is never artistic, and never attracts any but those devoid of true conceptions of art in nature.

Binding the waists and attaching the clothes to bands round the body cannot be too strongly condemned. Reform in dress must be based on physiological principles, and these require that dress shall conform to the body and not the body to the dress. The weight of the dress should fall on the shoulders, and all parts should be amply covered and protected from cold and heat. A subservient following of fashions, determined by incompetents, from some personal business motive, is modern slavery. Colors and texture of garments are matters of personal taste, but close imitation of the leading styles and fashions of the day is pronounced ignorance. Each woman should have a peculiar style of her own, adapted to her form, complexion and stature. It does not require very high art or long study to find out the style most becoming, and adherence to this is the highest degree of fashion in its true sense. Reform in dress shows proper evolution. The present style is sadly degenerated from artistic principles. Make the dress aid in developing the body and not the body to show off the dress.

HEALTH, COMFORT, BEAUTY, INDIVIDUALITY—THE NEEDS.

So far as "the present dress of women" is concerned, I have long regarded it as a thing to be wondered at and admired from a distance, a thing whose architectural principles of construction I could never hope to comprehend, yet a thing, in spite of whose absurdities and limitations, in which many women contrive to look and to be very charming. The "present dress of women," of course, means the prevailing fashion. To any one of a reflective turn of mind, who has watched for a number of years the rise and fall of the various fashions in woman's dress, and has seen the inane slavery to "style" that has been exhibited by those concerned, the idea must have suggested itself more than once, that the greatest need which women had was some prophet of their kind and times who should show them wherein a part at least of the mission of women lay and how best they could fulfill that mission. It has always been acknowledged by social philosophers that a part of woman's mission was to supply personally, mentally and morally, the fact and the idea of beauty in our human life. To do that, each woman must bring out that which is best in herself, and develop for herself her own type of beauty. To do that personally, and at the same time to be bound by the arbitrary dictates of fashion is impossible. The slavery to "conventionality" to which women willingly submit means death to individuality, and therefore in many cases a loss of personal beauty which they might otherwise have. So much for the æsthetic side of the question. As far as the physical side of it is concerned, so much has been already done by the advocates of dress reform, that I am loath to believe (I really know nothing about it) that many women to-day torture their bodies and deform their vital organs at the dictates of "fashion." No words of condemnation can be too severe for those who do. Dress for man or woman should embody always the idea of comfort which is essential to beauty, and which necessarily forbids bodily deformation.

I do not know enough about the architectural principles upon which that wonderful structure, "the present dress of women" is built, to suggest any changes. If women would always bear in mind that dress should mean first, health and comfort, and then beauty, and also the two corollaries to those propositions, first: that comfort and health are synonymous, and second, that each woman can best subserve the end of personal beauty by individuality in dressing, rather than by a slavish adherence to the prevailing fashion, whether it becomes her or not, the best of which I know would be attained.

WOMAN'S FREEDOM DEMANDS STRIKING OFF THE FETTERS JUST BELOW THE KNEE.

As to woman's dress, I have never thought my ideas of sufficient authority to be offered to the public, but I would say that the long, flowing, trailing robe, however appropriate to angelic beings gliding through the air, unacquainted with mud, wind and rain, and under no necessity for muscular exertion or any sort of useful labor, seems entirely unfit for those who have to walk, to ride or to labor on this muddy earth, to climb stairways, to go through thickets and forests, over fences and ditches, in agricultural labors or among domestic animals. The only theory of woman's life and duties compatible with the trailing skirts is that of the Spanish hidalgo, who resented the offer of a pair of costly stockings for the queen, with the scornful reply, "Know you that the queen of Spain has no legs!"

The legless woman, floating on a zephyr, and living on the perfume of flowers alone may have a trail as long as a comet, with impunity, if she can protect it from the impolite and disorderly wind, but the average woman of a hundred and thirty pounds, though she has developed through many centuries remarkable skill and grace in managing her long robes, is fully aware of the painful tax they impose upon her in the great battle of life, the struggle for bread, in which her unincumbered brother keeps far in advance, while she is in the straggling, hopeless rear of the industrial army.

Society has decreed her inferiority, and her encumbering dress is one great element of the social code, which cramps her movements and subjects her to restraints unknown to man, that almost paralyze all ambition and aspiration, so that she learns to submit passively to many wrongs and to teach her daughters that submission and sacrifice are their destiny.

Discard this encumbering dress, the mark of helpless inferiority, and she will feel like a being of a higher destiny, as the country bumpkin when he has put on his showy military costume and mounted a horse in the cavalry, feels a proud and heroic impulse unknown in his shabby working clothes. That a more independent and aspiring feeling will develop in woman when she lays aside a dress the badge of weakness, I think no close observer will doubt, and therefore I think that dress reform should be warmly sustained, encouraged and admired by every friend of woman.

But the dear women demand to be loved and admired, and they fear that their loveliness will be sadly disguised by any radical change in the old style of dress, which has been associated with all that is lovely in life so long that it is considered an essential part of the charm of home and society, to which it contributes really nothing but embarrassment.

I would like to convince my fair friends that the long robe is a great mistake, not only in climbing stairways, but in all the relations of life, and that a graceful escape from its domination is very easy, although a timid and feeble attempt makes but a shabby failure and provokes ridicule. The beauty of the long robe lies in its proportions and inconvenient length. Shorten it a little as some dress reformers desire, and the beauty is gone in a bloomer length somewhere above the ankles, suggesting an overgrown school-girl, while the utility of the change is not fully realized, and every woman feels embarrassed in making this variation from what society approves. But act decisively, carry the skirts to the knee or its vicinity, and we have at once all the freedom, activity and grace that we desire.

I remember about half a century ago such a garment, an outside cloak or what not of beautiful silk, worn by a lovely and sprightly friend (I believe she called it a Taglioni) which every one admired who saw it, and I never heard a word of criticism against it, nor have I ever seen anything more graceful and appropriate. Of course the body and limbs should be encased in well-fitting pantaloons, for that is the garment which gives to man his freedom and superiority. The actual wearing of this masculine garment will confer no small amount of masculine strength and freedom, and will, of course, be strongly protested against by that considerable class of men who wish to be despotic rulers of their homes, and value woman mainly for her subserviency and freedom from that strength of mind which might demand and deserve equality in domestic councils. I have no sympathy with that class of men, for I believe the happiest home is that in which the woman has the most influence, and that man the happiest who is consciously or unconsciously ruled by the intuitive wisdom and love of his wife.

If the change which I advocate will have something like the same inspiring effect upon woman, as the military uniform and flag have upon the citizen soldier, it is not a trifling matter, nor one which the leaders of woman's progress can overlook.

But as the sense of beauty and grace is our guide in all matters relating to dress, until fashion has made its decree, I would submit the proposition that the change which I urge will bring with it not only a feeling of grace and beauty, but a spirit of freedom and ease which is essential to the perfection and progress of the women of this century. The long skirt has been like the curfew imposed of old by despotism, and I would like to hear the cry, "Curfew shall not ring to-night."

I have tried to embody my idea of the dress which women will wear in the next century, and ought to begin wearing in this, in a drawing with the aid of an artist of fine taste, interested in dress reform, who has sketched a summer and a winter costume. It is a dress which admits of great ornament on the bosom as well as the skirts, and if some of the handsome women of our great cities would wear to a ball a picturesque and rich costume of this pattern the compliments it would receive would make its introduction easy. If the ladies of New York or Chicago would get up an entertainment in which every lady should wear this costume, as rich and beautiful as she could make it, the tout ensemble would be so rare and charming as to make the dress immensely popular, and the largest hall in either city would be insufficient to hold the eager spectators, and the spectacle might be used to raise a revenue for the woman movement which would give it a great impulse onward. I hope, therefore that the financial merit of this suggestion may be sufficient to induce its adoption in this experimental way, which I would respectfully submit to the judgment of Miss Willard and Mrs. Stanton.

There is one detail concerning which opinions may differ. I think nothing equal to pantaloons in utility and ease, but some will say decidedly that a pair of high boots or buttoned leggins connecting with knickerbockers, or Turkish trousers would be more handsome and appropriate, to which I offer no objection, and my artist friend has made such a sketch. All I insist upon is the removal of the long skirt, the freedom of the limbs and that fullness of skirts which will prevent their ever being in the way. A lady friend who approved all my suggestions dissented a little, saying, "We don't want to show the pantaloons, they remind one of Dr Mary Walker." But as I don't feel the force of her argument I still believe that some such outline as the following would be upon the whole the most commendable, which I offer not as a drawing of the costume but as a rude diagram of my theory. She mentioned another practical difficulty—that in making a loose and comfortable dress, free from the corset, which I assume as a matter of course, she found it almost impossible to get it executed by the dressmakers and had to make it herself. It was very becoming.

These suggestions I would say to conservative thinkers are not alarmingly novel. The old Greek statue of Diana and the fawn embodies the same idea in a negligé style. I would give greater fullness to the dress and four inches more to its length, with more ornament to the bosom. A distinguished English lady whose name I cannot recall, excites no little admiration when spending her time in her Florida orange groves by wearing such a dress as I have described. She wears also a high pair of boots I think Madam Jenness-Miller has given the public a pattern coming near to my description. No one, I think, need apprehend any hostile criticism in adopting this style beyond the astonishment with which interesting deviations from fashion are received. A group of a hundred women of good society could very soon make this new style acceptable. To see how these suggestions would strike intelligent women, I submitted this essay to a lady wen known in literature and questions of social progress, whose opinions would carry as much weight as those of any lady in the city of her residence. The following is her reply:

I have read Dr. Buchanan's article and from the feminine standpoint fully indorse his ideas. There is nothing which hampers women physically and spiritually more than the long skirts, and to cut them off at the knees is to open a new path to progress. May we all enter it and find its delightful termination—freedom.

I next presented the essay to a literary lady of the ultra conservative type, who has no toleration for women suffragists, and she acknowledged that she would be pleased to see such a dress universally adopted, but did not believe women would ever don it.

Finally, allow me to ask why do women persist in that fantastic nonsense which is called a bonnet, which is generally neither ornamental nor useful, for it neither protects the head, shelters the eyes, nor in general adds anything picturesque to their beauty. We do sometimes see a bonnet that is somewhat rational and rather becoming, but any fantastic trifle on the top or the back of the head will pass for a bonnet, even if it is nothing but a huge beetle or horsefly. But the head needs some protection from the sun and from drafts of air, and the eyes from a glare of light—not less than three inches of brim. The broadbrimmed soft hats worn by men are very appropriate. Women should wear a hat of warm, soft material, projecting well over the eyes, secured by a ribbon under the chin, and ornamented tastefully, as by feathers or flowers. Such a hat gives opportunity for the veil which excludes the harsh wind and adds something to beauty or conceals its absence. I remember about seventy years ago my boyish admiration of the green silk calash which surrounded the rosy cheeks of a beautiful cousin (now in the better world). It combined beauty with the perfect protection of head, neck, face and eyes, and I doubt if any bonnet more useful and ornamental will ever be found. The staring eye of impertinent curiosity is a great social nuisance, and the calash with a veil is woman's best protection against it.

GOOD-BYE TO CALIFORNIA.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Six months sojourn in California has greatly endeared its W. C. T. U. to me, making me appreciate as never before, the devotion of its women and the difficulties under which they labor. Not the least of these is one unsuspected until I came here—the almost universal ill health of women. This is more noticeable in Southern than in Northern California, yet everywhere I have noted it—doubtless in part due to the fact that many came here for their health, yet I have sometimes found it among "native daughters." Their work is undoubtedly responsible for a large share of it; the difficulty of procuring domestic service, or its expensiveness, forces many a housewife to do her own work here, who never thought of doing it unaided in the east. Then, in Southern California the almost universal raising of fruit entails additional burdens upon womenfolk.

In this connection allow me to answer the many inquiries made concerning the success of the plan for introducing English housemaids. I am sorry to say it was a failure, largely owing to the differing conditions of life here and in England. There, domestic service is more differentiated than here; a maid of all work, one who can do, as the efficient housekeeper must, all kinds of housework, is what is needed here. But the maids brought over usually knew how to do only one thing, and many of them not even that. They came with the expectation of being "lady's maids," or companions, ready to do the ornamental part, but totally unprepared for actual service.

Most of them seemed well intentioned, but unable to cope with conditions so utterly unlike their expectations, or to what they were accustomed. It was a sad experience all round; most pitiful are the stories I hear; they were strangers in a strange land, without money or the ability to earn it. Some were sent back to England, the expense being borne by kind-hearted people here; some drifted into light business positions, a few married, and some found refuge in charitable institutions. I have been through the length and breadth of Southern California, working in every one of its counties, yet never once have I found one of these English maids in domestic service.

The revival meetings, conducted throughout the state by Rev. B. Fay Mills, have given a mighty impulse to all forms of Christian labor, including the W. C. T. U. It has not been my privilege to attend any of his gatherings but at Los Angeles, Santa Barbara and Oakland I came immediately at their close and found the atmosphere fully charged with spiritual ozone. Under such conditions it was not hard to have Christians realize that temperance is one of the "fruits of the Spirit," and to lead young converts into temperance work as one form of Christian activity ever ready at their hand.

An incident which occurred at Portland shows what sort of a temperance man Mr. Mills is. During his meetings there Wolfenbarger and Huckens visited the city. As there were no revival services Saturday night the Prohibitionists asked for the use of the great tabernacle for that evening. Mr. Mills called the committee of ministers having charge of his meetings together and laid the request before them, remarking, "I shall have no meeting in the tabernacle that evening; it is for you to say whether you will allow the Prohibitionists to use it."

Then up rose a leading D. D. and said: "I really do not think it fitting to mix up politics with these revival services." The rest of the ministers followed his lead, fearing that this introduction of politics would interfere with the work of saving souls. Mr. Mills listened quietly, making no sign till the last one had spoken, then electrified them by saying: "Gentlemen, I am a Third Party Prohibitionist, couldn't be a Christian if I wasn't." That settled it, and Wolfenbarger and Huckens had the tabernacle.

My last glimpse of Southern California was characteristic and prophetic. My last evening spent at Los Angeles was at a W. C. T. U. "Dollar Social," in the temple. Funny or pathetic were the various ways in which women had earned their dollars; many of their husbands were moved to duplicate these gifts. Altogether, the evening was a bright and happy one. We had started home when some "last words" recalled my hostess and I sat in the carriage awaiting her coming. Through the windows I looked into the brilliantly lighted rooms, beautiful with flowers; enframed by the open window, garlanded with roses, were the faces of Mother Ransom, Mrs. Crow and Mrs. Garbutt, aglow with love for the work in which they are such important factors. That picture will ever go with me—the beautiful temple bathed in moonlight, those earnest faces, those rose-wreaths in token of the victory with which God in His own good time will surely crown their labors. God bless the hard working women of California!

Pacific Grove, where is held the school of methods for Northern California, was my next objective point. This place is to San Francisco, a hundred miles distant, what Ocean Grove is to New York and Philadelphia, or Lake Bluff to Chicago. It is a prohibition summer resort, though connected by street cars with Old Monterey, where saloons abound, and where is Hotel Del Monte with its aristocratic club-house and bar. The Southern Pacific railway, by most generous treatment in the way of transportation, aids the W. C. T. U. materially in securing a large attendance at its school of methods. The commodious Methodist church is freely placed at its disposal, and everything done to made our stay pleasant and profitable.

For the first time in the history of this school a woman occupied the pulpit Sabbath morning; at the close of the service came admission to church membership, and it seemed an appropriate and pleasant thing to have among those thus received two prominent W. C. T. U. workers, Frau Skelton, and Emma Pow Smith. Each of these busy women has erected a tiny cottage at Pacific Grove, where she can come for the few weeks' rest during the year which is all the urgent demands of the work allow her.

Presiding over the school is the quiet, gracious woman who is "bringing to pass" so many good things in North ern California, its president, Mrs. B. Sturtevant-Peet, surrounded by her efficient aids, the state officers and superintendents. The very quietness with which Mrs. Peet works prevents recognition of her efficiency, but one going from point to point as I have done, is struck with the amount of work she has accomplished. She is on the go constantly, visiting the different counties in this state of magnificent distances, holding county conventions, and in other ways arousing such enthusiasm for our work that women sometimes come one hundred and fifty miles in their own conveyances to attend a W. C. T. U convention. Not the least among her good offices is that which wins for her the beatitude, "Blessed are the peace-makers." But like most of our women, she is overworked. The W. C. T. U. must take precious good care of her, or they will not have her long.

A deeply devotional spirit characterized this school. Many of its leaders came from Oakland where the Mills meetings were then in progress, and where those who stayed often met in special prayer for us at work in Pacific Grove. The devotional hour from eleven to twelve each day, in charge of the evangelistic superintendent, Mrs. Churchill, were occasions not to be forgotten. Particularly was this true of the one devoted to prayer for Placer county, then on the eve of its local option election. Emma Pow Smith had charge of it, but as one remarked, it soon passed beyond her, and God himself seemed leading it. Soon all were kneeling within and around the altar, and such prayers ascended as arise only from overburdened hearts. The answer did not come as we hoped, in a no license victory, yet who shall say those prayers were unheeded? The lessons taught by that campaign, the impression made by the large temperance vote, lacking scarce one hundred of victory, will not be lost when the liquor power of the state—linked with all the powers of evil—concentrated to oppose it. And who knows but this failure to banish the curse through local option may spur men on to more determined efforts for state and national prohibition?

The school of methods showed its faith by its works; its prayers were followed by a generous collection, sent to Dr. Mallory, president of Placer county W. C. T. U., to assist in defraying campaign expenses.

This school was a notably generous one, Miss Severance's appeal for legislative work to secure suffrage next winter being responded to by over two hundred dollars subscribed in a few moments. Subscriptions toward other state work, added to receipts from two entertainments, brought amount raised by the school up to nearly five hundred dollars more than its expenses, a thing unprecedented in the history of schools of methods.

I leave the record of our work to the reporter, but cannot pass without mentioning the concert by the Oakland Temperance Cadets, fifteen noble young men, trained from early boyhood in Band of Hope and L. T. L. work by the indefatigable superintendent of the state, Mrs. Borland. Each wore the white ribbon, and many of them the white rose as they stood on the platform, and from many mother hearts went up to God thanksgivings for what this typified and prayers that all over the land there might grow up thousands of such boys, ready to do valiant service for God and home and native land.

A HOPEOUL WORD FROM "MOTHER WALLACE."

MY DEAR MISS WILLARD:—Do not think that I am lacking in respect or love for you because I have failed to reply sooner to your letter. The truth is, I have been so undecided as to what I can do about going to Denver this fall. Dislike as much as I may, I am compelled to admit that the limitation of age is upon me. I am not sick, have not a pain nor ache, but am so weak and feeble that I doubt if I could stand the trip. I want to thank you for the kind expressions of regard and appreciation contained in your letter. I value them more than rubies. Think of me at home as looking on with unabated interest upon all the great movements of the day, reading with avidity all that comes under my eye relating to the great theme of human progress. The outlook is bright and hopeful. All things are crowding to a fulfillment of God's promise for dominion to humanity. The end may be delayed but victory is certain. By virtue of our high origin and destiny defeat is impossible. Are we not of God? In the accomplishment of His purposes He takes no thought of time as we measure it. Sixty years ago a little band of disciples, fifteen in number, of the Lord Jesus, organized amid ridicule and persecutions, a congregation of worshipers in Indianapolis, pledged to work for the union of Christians based upon the New Testament for the removal of creeds and all things which divide the body of Christ. On the 26th of July they laid the corner-stone of a new building dedicated to the same purpose. As I am the only surviving member of the original number, they invited me to deliver the address on the occasion. To-day the Christian world is full of the thought that if we ever take the world for Christ, creeds must be abolished and Christians must be united in the upbuilding of humanity and for the exaltation of the authority and personality of Jesus Christ. The world is rapidly learning that it is by the application of the golden rule all the problems of life are to be solved. Yours, Cataract, Ind. Z. S. WALLACE.

A CHOICE MESSAGE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Something Miss Willard's grand old mother spoke the last evening I called upon her, about "growing old," reminded me of Victor Hugo's "Autumn," or his "Future life." Maybe others would enjoy hearing somebody read it:

"I feel in myself the future life. I am like a forest more than once cut down. The new shoots live stronger and livelier than ever. I am rising I know toward the skies. The sunshine is over my head." . . . "You say, the soul is but a resultant of bodily powers, why then is my soul more luminous as bodily powers fail? Winter is upon my head and eternal spring within my heart when I breathe, as now, the fragrance of the lilies, the violets, and roses as at twenty years. The nearer I approach the end, the plainer I hear around me the immortal symphonies of the worlds which unite me. It is marvelous, yet simple, it is a fairy tale, yet it is history. For half a century I have been writing my thoughts in prose, verse, history, romance, satire, odes, songs; I have tried all, but have not said a thousandth part of what is in me. When I go, I can say, 'I have finished my day's work.' But I cannot say, 'I have finished my life, my day's work will begin again next morning.' The tomb is not a blind alley, it is a thoroughfare; it closes on the twilight to open on the same. I improve every hour because I love this world as my fatherland. My work is only a beginning; it is hardly above the foundation. I should be glad to see it mounting and mounting and mounting forever. The thirst for the infinite proves infinity." * * *

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

And he said unto them, Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith? Then he arose, and rebuked the winds and the sea; and there was a great calm.—Matt. 8:26.

Almost the last earthly link that binds our beloved leader by the natural ties of blood, in the death of her aged mother, has been severed. Rest Cottage has lost not only for the daughter, but for those of us who were privileged to frequent it, the one that made it seem so dear and homelike. Tears fill the eyes to think how empty that home will be without her. No more shall we see within its walls the tall, stately form that age could not bow. That face with all its strength, so genial and kindly, heaven has hid from our view. But we can keep her memory in our hearts, and ever before us the example of her beautiful, unselfish life—she who willingly gave to her country her only and best, at a time when the growing infirmities of age naturally demanded her constant and loving care. How often have I known her to stay weeks and months without even seeing the daughter for whom she longed; but no murmur fell from her lips, nor would she in writing say one word that would tend to hasten her home from the great public duties that demanded her attention, but the noble recluse bore all with the calmness and fortitude of a great soul. She knew that her deprivation was for the country's good, and for the breaking of the chains that bound the slaves of rum. Honestly has she earned the name of "Saint Courageous." And the daughter could never have been the character she is without the royal-hearted mother. Mrs. Mary T. Hill Willard ought to have, in recognition of all she was and has given us, a memorial in Willard Hall. I suggest that the center window of the thirteen in the Hall be selected as a memorial for Mrs. Willard, and in two or three weeks, if the subscriptions warrant it, I will write Mr. Walter Crane, of London, to at once commence a suitable design for it, and have it executed as soon as possible. I now start this subscription for the memorial by paying ten dollars toward it. The price of the window will be $500. Let those to whom it would be a privilege and pleasure to subscribe, do so at once.

Mrs. Jane A. Minor, Columbus, Ohio, writes: "It is with pleasure I enclose you $100 for the noble Temple, and also to have a memorial tablet in Willard Hall for my little daughter, Florence Amelia Minor, who was taken from me in early life. I give this in token of her short but beautiful life." "Enclosed find $5 for the Temple. I send it for our little boy, who went home June 6, 1892, aged seven years." So writes Mrs. Rachel F. Slatter Doylestown, Pa. Mrs. A. A. Howard, Fairport, N. Y., lost a son aged twenty the past year, while attending college. He was thoroughly temperate, never drank nor smoked. His last words were: "Tell mother I am ready and willing to go if it is the Lord's will." His mother sends $1.17 in memoriam. Miss C. S Burnett, Hartford, Ohio, sends $1 in memoriam for her mother, Mrs. Cassandra Burnett. One dollar comes from the Moberly, Mo., auxiliary, to be applied on the Lucy Webb Hayes memorial.

The following rather amusing letter arrives from an old gentleman, Mr. E. H. Williams, Waterville, Me.: "I see by the last SIGNAL you have started a memorial for Whittier, in the form of a clock. I had rather it had been a statue of him, holding in his uplifted hand a manuscript roll, inscribed: 'The voice of freedom;' but I won't kick; you shall have my dollar all the same, which I now enclose. The clock will be useful as well as ornamental." The following has been received from Mary B. Ingham, Cleveland, Ohio: "Enclosed is $1 for the Jane E. Weeden tablet, in loving memory of the work she so cheerfully performed in this city, particularly in the Pearl St. Friendly Inn. I could wish this offering were $100 instead $1." Mrs. M. E. Peel, Yankton, So. Dak., sends $1.35 toward a tablet for Susan B. Anthony. Brave, noble, self-sacrificing Susan, we are glad her heroic efforts for women stir others to start a fund, to have her name among the great and good of her sex in Willard Hall. Lyman H. Fitch, Stockville, Neb., sends $2.20 for the Jennie Casseday tablet. The Iowa W. C. T. U. are not going to forget the herculean work, so successfully performed by their beloved state president, Mrs. Marion H. Dunham. Her name is also to have a place on a tablet in Willard Hall. The Le Mars Iowa, W. C. T. U. sends $1 for this purpose.

"I am delighted," writes Mrs. L. E. Morley, Rochester, N. Y., "to be able to send you in addition to the $20 you have already received, $10.55, collected from the boys' union, in which I am so much interested. Our meetings are very nice and orderly, and they are thoroughly instructed in all 'Temple Items.'" How much self-sacrifice and boyish enthusiasm accompanies this gift, for be it remembered, this money comes from poor little fellows who are often forced to go hungry. Many of them are homeless waifs, but their wise and noble teacher, Mrs. Morley, knows if she allies them as builders of the beautiful Temperance Temple, and their names be engraved upon its walls, she has aroused in their souls a holy enthusiasm for purity and temperance which will be difficult to quench by the temptations of their hard lives.

A two-cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, the Temple, Chicago, will secure a mite-box, descriptive card and bulletin; remember, all who fill a mite box ($3.65) before next April will receive a photographic group consisting of Lady Henry Somerset, Miss Willard and the founder of the Temple. All drafts should be made out in the name of Miss Esther Pugh. All matters pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Carse.

WISHES.

BY AGNES E. VOLENTINE.

[The following letter will add interest to this sweet little poem:]

I am nine years old, and live among the pleasant country hills. I signed the temperance pledge when I was five and have kept it. We have taken THE UNION SIGNAL ten years.

I wish I were a busy bee—
Buzz! buzz! away;
Or else a bird in a leafy tree,
Singing a song each day.
But the hours are few that the bee can rest,
And the bird must find twigs to build a nest,
So neither of these would be the best;
It would not do.

I wish I were a beauteous rock,
Within a pebbly brook.
I'd like to be a gay peacock;
How pretty I should look!
But a rock or stone has no eyes or nose,
Unloved is the bird that proudly goes,
So I'd be a child as sweet as a rose,
If I were you!

A SOCIETY OF THREE.

BY HARRIET FRANCENE CROCKER.

"Now Pheny an' Phosy, you just sit right down here in this nice shady spot an' be real good children an' don't int'rupt, 'cause that isn't p'lite, you know, an I'll tell you just all about it an' everything.

"Mamma an' a whole lot of other ladies wears a little bit of ribbon,—white, you know—pinned right on their dresses in front,—just a little bow—"

"Yes'm, I seen 'em—" broke in Pheny, disregarding the injunction about "int'rupting"—"I seen 'em one time, I did."

"Me too," cried Phosy, "we was comin' from Rines's store, me'n Pheny was, an' we seen 'em."

"Pinned right a-top o' the lady's dress,—silk, too, it was," added Pheny; "oh, laudy! wasn't it shiny, Phosy?"

Phosy assented rapturously, rolling her big black eyes heavenward till not much more than the whites gleamed from the little black face.

Dorothy breathed a patient sigh. "Try-pheny an' Tryphosy Tuttle," said she, "you mustn't int'rupt when other folks is talking! Now please be good little girls an' keep still till I tell you all about it."

"Phosy, don't you int'rupt no mo'," said Pheny severely.

Phosy shook her small head emphatically, and the two stiff little braids of kinky hair, tied with red ribbons, stuck out in a most defiant manner. But she remained quiet, and Dorothy went on.

"That little white ribbon, you know, means temp'rance, an' temp'rance means—means—well, temp'rance means what your papa ain't got. It's when folks don't b'lieve in sellin' an' drinkin' naughty stuff that makes other folks 'toxicated—an' when they try to stop 'em, you know—that's temp'rance."

Dorothy paused, quite flushed with the success of her definition, and Phosy looked solemnly over at Pheny Then she ventured a remark.

"Daddy done gone got drunk last ebenin' an' smashed up de stove—he done it with an ax, he did. Mammy, she cried awful an' me'n Pheny cried too."

"Phosy, chile," said Pheny gravely, "you 'uns hadn't orter go'n tell fam'ly 'fairs, 'deed you hadn't. But Miss Dor'thy done know all 'bout daddy's goin's on so 'taint much matter. Daddy's be'n awful lately, shore 'nough."

Dorothy grasped a little black hand impulsively in each of hers. "Course I know it, childern," she said, and sympathy shone in her sweet blue eyes. "An' that's just 'xactly the reason I've got you out here under the tree, tellin' you all about that little ribbon. I'm goin' to wear it an' so are you, Pheny an' Phosy, an' I 'most believe we can make your papa stop gettin' 'toxicated. 'Cause it's awful—it just is. I heard your mamma tellin' my mamma last week when she came to wash an' she cried right into the wash-tub. Mamma looked awful sorry an' I know she felt bad. I felt bad too, and I'm goin' to start a little temp'rance s'ciety an' try to help your papa."

"Daddy's awful good when he ain't drunk," said Pheny. "We likes him then, awful. An' he's good to mammy, an' helps her lots."

"An' he brings us ho[illegible] things to eat," chimed in Phosy, clasping her small black hands, "'tatoes an' meat, an' honest butter. Sometimes we don't have no butter—lots o' times we don't."

Dorothy stood up. "Well, your papa's a good papa an' worth savin', an' we'll save him if we can. Mebby then your poor mamma won't have to go out washin' an' work so hard, an' mebby you can have nicer clothes an' go to Sunday-school. I've got some money all my own, an' I'm going to buy some white ribbon an' we'll wear some little bows an' be temp'rance, too. You come to morrow an' I'll give 'em to you. Now let's sing. Let's sing 'Hold the Fort.'"

And sing they did, Tryphena and Tryphosa adding their sweet young voices to Dorothy's in the familiar strain.

"How sweet dem chilluns do sing!" said Cinthy Tuttle to herself as the stood in the low doorway of her little tumble down house. "Ef deir pa wa'n't just gone plumb ter ruin dem two twins might 'mount ter somethin'. I useter sing like dem, too, when I were a little coon down South, 'thout a trouble in the hull round world. Dem was happy days, dem was."

And the tired woman went wearily about her work with a sad strain from some old plantation melody upon her lips.

"Fo' de land's sakes!" Cinthy cried next day when the twins, hand in hand, as usual, sauntered into the hot little kitchen,—"what am yo' chilluns done got pinned onto dem ole gingham aperns o' your'n?"

"Dem's our badges, mammy," Pheny answered, with dignity. "Me'n Phosy b'longs ter Miss Dor'thy's temp'rance s'ciety, and dese yere little ribbins is our badges. Badges is signs, mammy, o' what folks b'longs to."

"We don't want daddy to drink no mo'," wailed Phosy,—"'taint right to smash up de stove an' tear 'round de way he do. Daddy'll see our white ribbins an' mebby quit. Miss Dor'thy, she said so, didn't she, Pheny?"

"Land sakes, yo' po' chilluns! Nothin' gwine help yer po' pa. Nothin' gwine save 'im from dat drink! Didn't I done cry an' weep an' pray an' beg 'im time an' agin, hopin' an' hopin' an' hopin'? 'Tain't no use, 'tain't no use!" Cinthy threw her apron over her head and rocked herself back and forth in the rickety old chair into which she had fallen.

"'Tis use, mammy, don't cry, don't cry, mammy! Daddy's awful good when he ain't drunk, and we'll cure him, we will, Phosy'n me."

And they did. Three months after Dorothy's society of three was organized, Dorothy's papa, Doctor Leigh, said to his wife:

"It's wonderful, Helen, what an amount of good two diminutive, unbleached citizens of the United States can do! There's Jim Tuttle, now, a notable illustration of the power of influence and"—Dr. Leigh laughed—"the little white ribbon! He told me to-day that he had not touched a drop for over two months, that he had taken the pledge, had found steady work at good wages, and was putting in all his spare time fixing up that miserable little house they call home. And what's more, it's those two little Try's, scripturally named, I believe, Tryphena and Tryphosa, and our dear little Dot, that have worked the marvel. It seems Dot, bless her kind little heart, took it into her head to put on the white ribbon, and make those little darkies put it on, too. The power of influence, again, you see, my dear. If you were not so staunch a white-ribboner, Helen, surely Dot would not have started her temperance society and been the means of saving Tuttle, who is quite a man after all."

Dr. Leigh never would call his little daughter anything but Dot; but Mrs. Leigh smiled and said: "Yes, dear, I'm proud of Dorothy. Cinthy told me all about it this very morning when she came to wash. 'Deed dese am proud an' happy days, Mis' Leigh,' she said. 'De good Lawd bless Miss Dor'thy fer what she done! Jim, he's sober's anybody now, an' jest as 'spectable a co'panion as I could ever ask fer. He's workin' ebery day right along, an' he's fixin' up de old house, Jim is, an' bime by we'm gwine be real high-up cullud pussons, shore 'nough!'"

Dr. Leigh laughed. "Well, wife, that's a great little ribbon, I can tell you! I didn't use to take much stock in it, you know, but as Cinthy would say, 'I'm done gone b'en converted!" Wear it always, Helen, my dear, and have Dot wear it, too. I believe the smile of God rests upon it."

"And I believe so, too."

A LITTLE Massachusetts boy, who deserves election to the Law and Order League, recently printed a sign and fastened it on one of the posts of the front piazza. The sign read: "No smoke-ness, nor drunk-ness, nor swear-words, nor wickedness round this house." "Of course we don't do such things," said little Master Virtue, "but I thought it would be good to have the sign up there for the tin peddlers and the visitors to read."—Selected.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—Two weeks have passed since we gathered in our Cozy Corner. Last week we did not meet because THE UNION SIGNAL columns were devoted to the memory of Madam Willard, the aged mother of Miss Frances Willard, its editor-in-chief.

Those of you who are fortunate in having a tender, loving grandmother in your homes will have a very good idea of what Madam Willard was like in her home, Rest Cottage, and to the dear ones who loved her most. Everybody who knew her loved her too, because the eighty-seven years of her life—just think eighty-seven years!—had been so filled with good deeds and thoughts that you could see their marks in her beautiful face.

May you all so live that nothing but the lines of unselfishness, goodness and purity shall be stamped in your faces as the years go by. Affectionately,

Aunt Jane

COZY CORNER LETTERS.

I am a little boy ten years old. I signed the pledge two years ago and always mean to keep it. Our UNION SIGNAL goes into five families after we have read it, and then is put into the wall pocket in a depot.

O Golden Rod, thy brave array,
More fitting seems for kingly court,
Than flaunting here by dusty way!

This cloth of gold in which I'm drest,
Is garb indeed of royalty;
But who serves man doth serve God best.

DAVID DOUGLAS AND HIS WIFE.

BY MRS. O. W. SCOTT.

CHAPTER I.

PACKING.

The April sunshine filtered through branches of maples, filled with swelling buds and bird songs, and sent its enlivening beams straight through the upper windows of the Terracetown parsonage. It was very good of the sun to illuminate the attic that afternoon, for Mrs. Douglas was there at work, in the midst of great confusion. She wore an old wrapper, and a big gingham apron; and her head was covered by a small checked shawl.

"There!" said she with a sigh of relief, "one more box is ready." Rising from her cramped position on the floor she thrust out her arms wearily, looked from the window up into the blue sky for a moment; then knelt before a large, zinc-covered trunk and tried to raise the lid. With true feminine persistence she tugged and pulled and pounded, but with no avail.

"David! David!" she called at length, from the head of the stairs.

"What's wanted?" replied a masculine voice.

"Something ails the trunk. I can't raise the cover. Please come up, and bring the hammer, and chisel, and screw driver."

A moment later a gentleman slowly ascended the garret stairs, and appeared upon the scene of action. His costume was hardly ministerial, the faded dressing gown and slouch hat being mere hints of "better days;" and yet there was no mistaking his calling.

"Whew! seems to me we never had so much stuff to pack before!" he ejaculated, standing with hat pushed back and arms akimbo. "I've filled all my book boxes, and there's enough left over to endow a library of odds and ends. And here you are with surplus garments which would make an orphan asylum twice glad. How is it that we accumulate such heaps of riches, and yet never seem to have anything?"

"I don't know," said his wife, "but really, David, there aren't any valuables. So many things aren't good enough to give away, and are too good to throw away. How do people dispose of 'betweenities,' I wonder?"

But Mr. Douglas was giving his attention to the big trunk, which, after a shake and the pulling of a strap with gentle force, yielded, and the lid flew up.

"There you are! What's the trouble with that? It just shows how little a woman knows about mechanics. If anything gets the least bit out of order she must run and call a man!" and Mr. Douglas sat down complacently upon a pile of clothing, while hammer, chisel and screw driver fell to the floor with a resounding thump.

"I had probably worked over it until it was just ready to give way," said his wife, at which conclusion the minister laughed derisively.

An odor of camphor rose from the big trunk, which grew stronger as Mrs. Douglas took from it a faded army overcoat and held it up for inspection.

"Well! Well! How are you, old friend?" exclaimed her husband, reaching for it. "Now, Mary, here's a garment you have been packing and unpacking and putting away in camphor for twenty years. Don't you think—"

"Yes, and I will do it twenty years longer. I'll never, never part with this blessed old coat," and tears sprang to her eyes as she gave it an affectionate pat.

"Well, Mary, it does remind one powerfully of old times, doesn't it? Dear me! I wasn't much older than our Archie when I left Gilead with the 'Guards.' What would we think if he had to enlist?"

"Oh, don't speak of it! You were stronger and taller than he is. I remember how handsome you looked in your army blue. Really, had never noticed how you did look before, but the war made men of boys, and we girls had to admire our heroes, of course."

"I always knew I owed a good deal to my soldier clothes," said Mr. Douglas, meekly.

"Yes, to the army blue and the cause it represented and the goodness and trueness in the man himself," responded his wife, loyally, as she shook out the dress suit.

"Thank you! I'm glad it wasn't simply the clothes you admired. But what days those were! We fellows stood straight every time never a question of safety or policy, but just duty, duty It was worth while to live when every man was expected to stand flat footed and full weight on one side or the other."

"But if I remember rightly, there were those who did not The traditional 'fence,' hence, held a good many of the fearful and unbelieving," said Mrs. Douglas.

"Yes, but there was one advantage even then," persisted her husband, "they were very uncomfortable. Nowadays the fence is upholstered, and has become a fashionable resort. There is so much doubt and uncertainty in the air that one begins to waver before he knows it: and if it were not for the sufferings and the sacrifices I could almost wish to see a revival of '63 and '64 just for the sake of a general waking up once more. We are suffering from a sort of moral 'creeping-paralysis.' The money-making nerves and muscles are all right, and politics are humming, but there's nothing in all this to take hold of a man and develop the best there is in him." Pausing a moment in deep thought, his eyes fixed upon the old coat, his next words were of reminiscence: "How well I remember one day when we were expecting a battle, a lot of us got together to sing the war songs once more. There were some splendid singers in our company, and we made the welkin ring with: 'Just before the battle, mother,' and 'Who will care for mother now;' and 'Tenting on the old camp ground.' It was just sunset, and we sang and sang until the stars came out. Then Chaplain Put. said, 'Now sing the doxology, boys, and we'll close with a word of prayer.' Well, as we sang it, I really believe we said 'good-bye' to the earth—we were so uplifted and exalted. And then the prayer! Well, I never expect to see heaven much clearer till I go there! It was wonderful. And it was the last time some of the boys ever sang with us—it was in very truth their doxology."

The sun was sending slanting beams through the attic windows, and the packing was still undone; but for a few moments the past crowded out the present, as the minister sat with head bowed over the relics of a struggle which seemed so very long ago. Mrs. Douglas was the first to speak.

"David, I think there's another contest coming, equal to the Civil War. I pray God it may never bring battlefields and slaughter, but it does seem to me intemperance is as great a foe to the nation as slavery was, and calls for men every bit as brave as soldiers to rout it."

"Yes, I know it," said Mr. Douglas, half wearily, "and it was thinking of this question which inspired this talk—that and the old coat. The fact is, I just had a call from Billings, he brought over his boot and shoe bill, and it's eight dollars more than I thought it would be. How is it the children wear out so many boots? Well, he says the fire company had a hilarious time after they put out that little blaze in the Republican headquarters the other night. They had all the beer and whisky they wanted, and Fish and Follensbee paid the bills. Leading politicians and church members—I declare, it's too bad! I'm almost ashamed to train in such a party."

"This is a free country, David, and you needn't stay in any party one minute longer than you choose," said his wife, quietly.

Immediately a subtle change passed over the minister's face; a look such as great men assume when women surprise them by venturing too near the sacred political enclosures consecrated to manhood alone. He loved his wife as the "apple of his eye," but he had to remind her once in a while that she was a woman! So he met this side thrust by saying in a somewhat petulant tone:

"Now that's the way you women talk! It is very easy for you who have no political responsibility, to say: 'Oh, you can do thus and so,' but what if you were in my place? I tell you I just hurrahed myself hoarse for Lincoln and Grant; and the grand old party which had such leaders and did so much for the country is bound to come out right one of these days. We may make a good many 'crooked paths' as Father Dennett says, but you'll see the old Republican party forging up to the goal by and by."

Mary was examining the seams of the old suit very carefully at that moment, and only murmured: "I was afraid the moths had got into it."

"What, the party?" laughed the minister. "Oh, you meant the coat? Keep them out by all means, for my soldier clothes and sword are all the heir-looms I shall have to leave the children, I'm afraid."

Ding! Ding! Ding! the voice of the door-bell, that unquiet member in parsonage belongings, aroused them.

"Oh, David, please go to the door! you look better than I," cried Mrs. Douglas, smoothing her disheveled locks with a nervous motion peculiar to women.

"Thanks! even shades of difference should be taken into account when people are in their packing clothes. But I think a committee should be chosen to decide which —well, Marion, who is it?" for just at that moment a bright-faced girl of sixteen came up the stairs.

"A stranger is at the door, papa, who wishes to see you a moment."

"I'm glad you have come, Marion, but I'd no idea it was after four. Help me fold these things, dear, for papa and I have talked more than we have worked," and Mrs. Douglas began to pack with renewed energy.

"Why, mamma," laughed Marion, "I've been home half an hour and saved you from a caller. Mrs. Hooper came and brought a good bye present—a big, purple satin pincushion trimmed with white lace for our best bureau, she said. It is real nice, but purple! Just think of it! I thought to myself, if we belonged to the Peterkin family we would probably buy a carpet and chamber set to correspond with it."

"Yes, if 'the lady from Philadelphia' didn't tell us better," replied her mother smiling. The remarkable "Peterkins" with their absurd lack of common sense, were favorites with our itinerants whose lives were so intensely practical.

The door opened with a bang and a big bonny boy in his early teens scaled the stairs two steps at a time.

"Here you are, mamma! Why don't you put up a notice in the kitchen just where we can find you? I blundered into the parlor and found a stranger there with papa. Oh! if here isn't papa's army overcoat! Let's see how it fits me," and Hugh, next to Marion in years, but nearly as tall as the college boy, Archie, donned the coat and marched across the garret floor with martial tread.

An instant later the sound of small feet and hurried breathing was heard and Ted and Dorothy, the least and last of the family, appeared with rosy, smiling faces and a triumphant, "Hullo, mamma!" in unison. Ted was slight and fair with a delicate face and dreamy eyes, but Dorothy was dark, with black eyes and red cheeks, with broad, square shoulders and an independent air which made her seem old and wise beyond her years, and discouraged people who wished to call her "baby." Ted had a pretty lisp in his speech, but Dorothy spoke English from the first with an assured accent, sometimes dropping a syllable, but always sounding her "r's" and "th's" as conscientiously as a country schoolma'am.

The children looked around with great interest upon the various piles of old clothes, castoff boots, broken furniture, toys and newspapers. "I think it's nice to pack, don't you, mamma? Can I have this?" asked Dorothy, picking up an old pink sash and tying it over her blue-gingham apron.

"Oh, here's my lost cart," cried Ted; "I'll take it down to the kitchen—and—"

"Mamma," interrupted Dorothy, who was burrowing in one corner, "here's my doll Aunt Esther gave me. She's all good but her neck. Can't I take her down stairs?"

"What'll Aunt Esther say when she knows you broke it?" asked Ted trying to straighten the neck.

"She'll say, 'Did you let Ted have it?'" and then with a merry laugh Dorothy rushed at Ted throwing her arms around him and the doll.

That was the signal for a romp, and with an utter disregard for the piles of "betweenities" which covered the floor, they raced through the attic. Shadows were gathering under the eaves. The afternoon had seemed long, for there is nothing like half-worn clothing, full of memories of past years, to carry one back into the land of dreams and fancies. With a little sigh for the memories and also for the unaccomplished packing, Mrs. Douglas followed the children to the rooms below.

"Step this way a moment," said her husband, opening the parlor door. When they were alone he continued. "The stranger who called this afternoon came to invite me to Chesport, Connecticut, and I have consented to go there, provided there is no objection on the part of the bishop. The salary is two hundred dollars more than we have received here."

"I am so thankful! That will help pay Archie's college bills," ejaculated Mrs. Douglas.

THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR CONVENTION.

BY F. E. CLARK.

The echoes of the New York convention are still coming to our ears and all indicate what a strong impression this wonderful convention made upon the whole country. Every religious paper and thousands of secular papers throughout the country have devoted many columns to the convention and with a single exception, so far as we have seen, the comments have been not only kindly but most enthusiastic. They have realized that a tremendous though often latent moral force exists among the young people of the country. The convention has taught the secular world as well as the religious world that the church is not dying, that the religion of Christ is not losing its power, that the old gospel is still believed and that the old Bible is not a "back number." Especially has the influence of the convention upon certain political journals been marked. Though an effort has been made occasionally to utter a mild sneer or a pointless sarcasm, many journals have drawn the lesson that there was a moral force in American public life which must be reckoned with, that there is a deep earnestness which could not be trifled with, and that this moral force and this devotion and earnestness were likely to grow larger and stronger rather than less and weaker in the future. If the eleventh international convention of the societies of Christian Endeavor had accomplished no other object than this, the meeting with its gathering of 40,000 young people, its large expense, and the vast amount of time in aggregate spent upon the services, would not have been wasted. But who can tell of the other influences that have gone out from that meeting, the quiet resolutions, the unuttered vows of consecration and deep-seated purpose to serve Christ and man and humanity better than ever before? The Judgment Day alone will reveal these purposes and record the result of these vows. When these things are considered it will be understood how true it is that "the convention of 1892 will never adjourn."

THE SECRET OF HAPPINESS.

BY COUNT LEO TOLSTOI.

We say to ourselves, I can only secure happiness on condition that all other creatures love me more dearly than they love themselves. This, however, is an impossibility. Notwithstanding this, we all contrive to live, and our entire activity, our striving after riches, family glory, power, are but so many endeavors to compel others to love us more than they love themselves.

Riches, glory, power give us the simulacrum of the condition we desire, and we are almost satisfied; at times we even forget that we have grasped an illusion instead of reality.

All creatures love themselves better than they love us, and happiness is, therefore, impossible.

Some people—and their number is daily increasing—finding themselves face to face with this problem, and unable to discover a satisfactory solution, put an end to their lives, saying that life is a hollow, stupid joke.

And yet the solution is not only simple but self-evident. I can only be happy if things be so ordained that all creatures love others better than themselves, and the whole world would be happier if all beings loved not themselves, but their fellows.

I am a being, a man; and, reason teaching me the law of universal happiness, I am bound to observe that law, and to love others better than myself. The instant we look at the question from this point of view, life presents itself to us in colors very different from those in which we were wont to behold it.

On the one hand, human beings annihilate each other, and, on the other hand, they love and help each other. Life, however, is maintained not by the passion of destroying, but by the sentiment of reciprocity, which, in the language of our heart, we term love.

As far as it has been given me to trace the development of the life of the world, I have found there only the manifestation of this one principle of mutual help; and universal history is nothing more than the gradual growth and slow development of this unique principle of concord and good fellowship among all human beings.

OUR BILL OF FARE

is introduced with "A Victor-Song," written by Alice M. Guernsey, and addressed to Miss Frances E. Willard. Some additional experiences of "Dr. Martha" are spicily told by Helen Campbell. John G. Woolley treats "The Farmers' Mistake" in his own terse style. "The Unemployed and the Saloons," is graphically presented by Florence Kelley, an expert on labor questions. An amusing, as well as valuable symposium on "Correct Dress" is furnished by nine well-known men. The correspondence includes a farewell letter by Miss Mary Allen West, who sailed for Japan August 27; a "Word" from the great franchise leader, Mrs. Zerelda S. Wallace, and "A Choice Message," from Madam Willard's lips. The children are treated to an uncommonly good story, "A Society of Three," and to a cute, thoughtful poem, written by a little nine-year-old girl, aside from the always interesting Cozy Corner. The Household department furnishes the first chapter of Mrs. O. W. Scott's new story, "David Douglas and His Wife." The editorials are brief and comprehensive—two popular qualities this hot weather. Six states are reported in News from the Field.

OFFICIAL BLINDNESS.

Observing people must have noted evidences of the fact that a decay of conviction is in progress among some who have till lately called themselves Prohibitionists. We are not prepared to say that evidences of this fact may be found in the press of this country; it is a rather large contract to examine the press of the country. But in conversation with citizens we meet questions of this sort, viz.: "What right have you to suppress the traffic entirely? You will not question the right of a man to drink, and if so, his right to buy; now, if the traffic is suppressed, and no opportunity is afforded to buy, is not the citizen's personal liberty invaded?" This does not surprise us coming from enemies of prohibition, but from those who have regarded themselves, and who wish to be regarded as par excellence "temperance men," it indicates a retrograde movement.

The faliacy is obvious enough. It is the right of any American citizen, native or foreign-born, to have Chinese bird's-nests for dinner, but it does not therefore follow that the state or municipality shall put itself to trouble and expense in order to be the purveyor for the nest-eater.

It is said the silence of the great treeless plains is something appalling. Eight years ago we were dismayed by the silence of the pulpit and press on the prohibition question. Not that there was less speech than for twenty years previously, but our ears were open to catch the chorus we were sure was coming, and it did not come. Now we observe more of a disposition to speak, but we are appalled at the tone of the speech. Not to dwell upon such extraordinary utterances as those of Dr. Rainsford, note the tendency to soften and modify the declarations of religious bodies. The Prohibitionists in the late General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church at Omaha found a strong current setting away from the positions taken eight years ago, and if we mistake not, other denominations have noticed the same thing. It is not a violent reaction by any means; only a tendency which might easily be overlooked.

But how are we to account for this? If truth is to be victorious should there not be progress?

All who take God and His laws into account will remember the oft-repeated allusions of Jesus to some prophetic utterances threatening judicial blindness. It is only those who improve upon their opportunities who have added talents. Those who shut their eyes grow blind, and when they would see, cannot. When the call of God is unheeded we must look for denser darkness.

This country has met God's call to arise and unite to extirpate the liquor crime with the system of high license. The people have insisted that this is a wise treatment of a great problem. How men can be honest and make this profession we frankly avow we cannot understand. How they could regard high license as anything but a bold bribe to the tax-payers, and an outrageous robbery of women and children, passes our comprehension. The money which should purchase comforts for the home is taken to save property owners from taxation. This could not go on long without characteristic results.

If the penalty of sin is to become permanently sinful, and the penalty of meanness is more meaness, may we not say with equal truth that the penalty of perverseness is more pronounced perverseness? Never has it been true but that gifts blind the eyes. High license is enormous and systematic bribery. To maintain it requires violent self deception, and imprisonment of the conscience.

Another strange thing is the common practice among public men, even ministers sometimes, to speak of alcohol, its use and the traffic in it, as if it was subject to the same laws as those which govern coffee or lemonade. Men will solemnly, and with the greatest gravity, talk about regulating the traffic in alcoholic drinks, as they talk about the traffic in pork. Have not intelligent people learned that alcoholic drinks are a law unto themselves? In the presence of the furious appetite for drink all ordinary human feelings and motives become distorted and conclusions go awry.

THE EDUCATION OF OUR GIRLS.

During the present month the youth of the land will be flocking to our great educational institutions. It is a time of intense anxiety to parents when the first child "goes away to school." To the boy or girl it is a life epoch whose importance is rarely appreciated until years later. Upon the institution chosen, upon the associates with whom the young student is surrounded, upon the course of study selected, depend the issues of after life.

Over this young army, in which centers the hope of the Republic, especially over the gentler half, to whom within the memory of many of us the institutions of higher education were opened, over these upon whose shoulders rest peculiar responsibilities, our hearts yearn. We would rejoice if by any word of cheer or counsel we could help one of them to choose the truest, broadest culture.

The question of education is greatly complicated by the spirit of our modern civilization. From the standpoint of our complex human nature, from the standpoint of Christianity, education clearly means the harmonious development of the spiritual nature through which man holds communion with his Maker; of the intellectual, by which he comprehends the magnificent, intelligent universe planned to meet his intellectual needs; of the wondrous physical structure by means of which God has given the spiritual and intellectual man connection with the material world. Of necessity, the development of the physical includes the knowledge of some industrial art by which the individual may contribute to the physical needs of the race. But the strange disorder of our competitive system, by which life has become a fierce struggle of each against all for the necessities of physical existence, has given us a most abnormal view of education. That which in itself is, and should be, last, has been made first by the prince of this world. Practically, to the great mass of mankind the main business of life is to "earn a living." Christian catechisms may teach that "the chief end of man is to glorify God," the catechism of the world answers, "it is to get wealth and position," and to a fearful extent the second answer has superseded the first. Against this theory, alike blasphemous to God and destructive of our nature, Christianity and our higher nature revolt. The great philanthropic movements of the present time, which, utterly disregarding the selfish principles of the age, reach out to rescue the victims of a sin-cursed world, prove the divine power of Christianity and man's inborn likeness to his Creator. The intellectual, too, refuses abject submission to the physical. The love of knowledge for the sake of knowledge, above all the development of the spiritual and intellectual for the sake of character have still their examples and advocates. But to the world at large, we must recommend any system of education by proving that it "pays," by which is meant that it yields a money return. Does it enable one to "earn his living" better? is the world's test question. Small wonder then, that with this for its foundation principle, education has been subverted to base purposes, and that certain classes educated with this as the sole end, that they might be better able to gain a livelihood, are found to furnish more than their quota of criminals. The sharper the knife, the more deeply it will cut; if we develop the powers of our young people, and send them forth with the idea that the object of thus brightening their weapons is that they may the more surely overreach their fellows in the scramble for gain, the result must be disastrous. Against this treason to our intellectual life the great Chautauqua system is our most effective modern protest.

Though this "woman's century," as Victor Hugo calls it, has placed the question of the education of our girls on essentially the same plane as that of our boys, the prejudices of the past yet invest the subject with peculiar difficulty. A large portion of mankind still looks for the ideal woman in the household drudge, and the daily papers abound in coarse jokes concerning the "sweet girl graduate's" supposed knowledge along literary, scientific and political lines, and supposed ignorance of all household and culinary arts. Bishop Vincent, whose connection with the Chautauqua movement has made it impossible for the title of bishop to add glory to his name, says if a man is going to be nothing but a blacksmith he needs no education beyond a knowledge of his trade, but no man has any right to be "nothing but a blacksmith," he must first of all be a man. It is time we made an end forever of training our girls to be only housekeepers, cooks, or seamstresses, henceforth let them first of all be women. But even in these lower capacities, the woman of literary culture is her own best argument. She excels in household arts, and in the mere physical care of her children proves her superiority by rearing a much larger per cent of them than the much vaunted "domestic" woman of the "good old times." Pitiful beyond words was the conception that a fair acquaintance with the "three R's," and an exhaustive knowledge of the trades legion which compose modern housekeeping, were a liberal education for her who was to be nothing but a wife and mother. This view is a most significant commentary upon the real esteem in which the opposers of woman's advancement held the wife and mother. We need look no further for the cause of whatever of contempt has arisen for these sacred offices. With the exaltation of womanhood has come the exaltation of wifehood and motherhood. Christ's words to Martha contain the prophecy and promise of woman's future: "Mary hath chosen the better part." It is not the household drudge who receives His commendation. Household duties have their place—so also has sawing wood—but a woman's "life consisteth not in" them.

Henceforth the leaders of the great world movements are to come not alone from the ranks of our boys but as well from those of our girls. This era of woman's emancipation is a pivotal time. Upon the earnest girls, who within a month will throng the portals of our colleges and universities, depend the issues of the next few years. They will go forth to become centers of influence in larger or smaller circles. Most of them will be wives and mothers. Let them be fitted not to be cooks or housekeepers or seamstresses alone, but to be Christian women. Let hand, brain and heart be trained for the duties which await a Christian womanhood.

In Lady Henry Somerset's recent address before the convention of the British Women's Temperance Association, were made the following statements which will be of profound interest to all our readers and which apply with full force in lesser and in larger circles of co-operative work. She said:

"I deeply feel, my comrades, that we must come into closer touch as toilers for humanity, we must look with level lids into each other's eyes; we must have for one another, not the uplifted or down-sliding, but the gliding, horizontal palm of faith and fealty. No accident of birth or material circumstance must make the smallest separation between us, as enlisted soldiers in a holy war. I cannot tell you the sense of unity I felt in the new world, where no thought of lineage or inheritance hedged me away from my white-ribbon peers, but all flocked around me in that sacred equality of service which alone confers on any Christian heart the patent of nobility. Can we not, as Christian sisters, rise to the same high level of an equal hand clasp, and an outlook from the heights where we all stand together under the white banner of the newer and holier crusade?

"In accepting the presidency of our association, I did so because I believed I could, by God's grace, be a leader. To act simply as a figure-head seemed to me then, as now, to be holding a position unworthy of me, and certainly unworthy of you. You will bear me witness that I have tried to be a worker side by side with you, sharing your hardships as well as your successes. It has often seemed to me in some respects a disadvantage that fortuitous conditions should be considered by any to have a separating influence, but if there is anything really vital in our Christianity, it will enable us to overcome all difficulty, and to pass out beyond the temporary and artificial barriers that men have built, into the natural and enduring largeness of a 'liberty' with which 'Christ hath made us free,' and the equal fellowship of those who are called to be 'co-workers with God.' The sweetness of reciprocal affection and confidence is one of the richest rewards that come to us like a perfume of flowers along the dusty highway, and to my mind the most holy characteristics of our movement are the mutual encouragement, good cheer and love we feel toward one another. Let us help each other to the utmost to call forth these qualities; speaking our honest words of praise and faith, while yet the listening ear and lonely heart can be by them uplifted and enriched. I write this, not for myself alone, but for my comrades' sake.

"We should make untold advance during this oncoming year, if in our hearts we enthrone the great dual principles of truth and kindness. Let us henceforth show more patience with weakness, more tolerance toward those who differ from us, more loving kindness toward those who slight us. 'Love—serve' should be our life's motto from this hour. Let us with affectionate candor tell each other when we think work can be improved, errors amended, or mistakes avoided.

"I have resolved in all discussions on the conduct or character of others to 'let something good be said,' nor count any conversation closed till the advantages, as well as the defects, of an individual have been set forth. Our hands need to be tender, to have a touch of blessing in them, as well as the power of healing. Our voices must be attuned to the concert pitch of that love that 'never faileth.' Our feet must be swift to walk on errands of mercy, and strong to be burden-bearers for one another. The story of 'God's tender mercy' is read here by thousands, not in the pages of the Bible, but in the record of human lives. We are sometimes hyper-sensitive about allowing the good we are permitted to do, to be known to the world. We are misers too often of our soul's best treasures. Life is a trust, and if, by our heavenly Father's love, we have been given some good gift and permitted to use it for Him, some power that we have consecrated, some bright experience which has lightened our way, 'pass it along like bread at sacrament.' Let self be so surrendered that all we have is invested in this one absorbing enterprise of our life, the profit of humanity. 'We see that we can only do a deed to God by doing that deed for Him; only by offering ours as the hands with which it shall be done.' 'I expect to pass through this world but once. If, then, there is any kind word I can speak, any helpful action that I can perform, let me not be neglectful or forgetful, for I shall not pass this way again.'

"A few months ago I read an account of a ship coming across the ocean. Within a few leagues of our own shores it was driven before a terrible storm; the wind tore awey its masts, and it drifted rapidly shoreward until at last its bow ran against a rocky reef, upon which, as a pivot, the vessel swung. Lifeboat after lifeboat was loaded and after a desperate struggle reached the shore. But when it came to the last load there was one man more than they could carry, and the question came up, 'Whom shall we leave?' There was one man there who had been sick for two or three weeks and they said, 'If we attempt to take him he would not survive the struggle till we reached the shore and might endanger the lives of others,' and they left him. After a desperate struggle they reached the beach, and an old sailor asked, 'Did you save everybody on board?' to which they replied, 'All but one.' A great stalwart young fellow about twenty-five years of age, reared as a fisherman along the seashore, said, 'If enough men will volunteer to man a lifeboat I will be one of the number to make an effort to save that man.' His mother spoke up and said, 'Tom, don't you do it. You are all I have; remember that your father went to sea twelve years ago and lost his life, and your brother Will sailed seven years ago, and we have never heard from him since.' 'But, mother, remember father lost his life trying to save the lives of others, and if I should refuse to follow his example, I would be unworthy to bear his name.' That touched the mother's pride, and she kissed him and said, 'Go, my boy, and do your duty, though it cost you your life.' Very soon men had volunteered to man a lifeboat, boarded it and started for the ship. Out over the terrible waves they battled until at last they reached the ship's bow, when two men climbed on board, and the precious soul was lowered into the lifeboat and it headed for the shore. The boat went out of sight, while the crowd on the shore watched and waited breathlessly, and had almost given up in despair of ever seeing it again, when just then they saw it trembling in the white caps on the crest of the wave. They stood breathlessly watching and waiting, and again it went down, and as it came in sight again a tremendous shout of encouragement went up from the shore. Again it went out of sight, but every time it came up it was a little nearer the shore, and when it came within hailing distance some one on the shore cried out, 'Tom, did you get your man?' and Tom answered back, 'Yes, we have got him, and tell mother it is brother Will.'"

INFECTED CLOTHING AGAIN.

The congressional committee sent to examine into the "sweating system" in the great cities has come and gone and left no trace.

The Illinois Bureau of Labor Statistics has made a searching examination of the condition of the clothing trades in Chicago and found the danger of infection quite as great as any previous writer or speaker had proclaimed it. But the official report cannot be published before next winter, and legislation based upon it will not take effect before next summer.

The sporadic, spasmodic attempt of the city council to deal with the evil in Chicago had closed a certain number of basement shops, and led to temporary improvements in certain others. But no municipal government can deal adequately with fifteen hundred to two thousand small shops, concealed in basements, lofts, bedrooms and stables.

In New York and Massachusetts tentative measures have been enacted for the sanitary regulation of this far-reaching branch of manufacture. Whether they will prove effective remains to be seen. Illinois has, so far, done nothing, though the infected clothing is shipped by the great manufacturers of Chicago throughout the west, northwest and southwest. A single Italian woman of our acquaintance has finished during the present season, in the filthiest room imaginable, one hundred gross of knee-pants. And the manufacture is carried on upon the same scale wherever there are women poor enough to under take the work throughout the city.

Time and the persistent investigation of the subject will doubtless render the millionaire vender of infected clothing infamous from all points of view. The purchaser whose pure, sweet country home is rendered desolate by disease sent into it concealed in a child's garment, will join in the protest of young girls robbed of youth and health, chained to the heavy cloth machine through out July and August because, in the words of a famous but false philanthropist, "so far, we have found foot-power cheaper than steam."

Foot-power spent upon the machine is sapping the life of thousands of children between twelve and seventeen years of age in a single city to-day, because "it is cheaper than steam power."

The clothing trade is wholly within the power of women. Women purchase clothing, far more of it than men do, for they buy for their children. The purchaser in these days can dictate terms. If all the conscientious women who now abet the millionaire exploiters would abstain from the purchase of unlabeled clothing as they abstain from the purchase of intoxicants, and protest against the exploitation of their sister women as they protest against the temptation of their brother men, they would abolish the whole sweating system in one year.

The wage earners are doing what they can. They have brought about investigation by the nation, the state and the municipality. They demand legislation. They strike. They refrain from purchasing unlabeled goods. They now appeal to the great purchasing public to join them in their crusade against the whole infamous sweating system, and to protest with them, and abstain with them from the purchase of unlabeled clothing. Surely such an appeal should meet with a prompt response, and every seller of clothing should be required by his patrons to inform himself and them, where, and under what conditions the garments which he offers are made.

THE following letter written by Miss Willard just before her departure to England will be read with interest:

To My Beloved Friends and Comrades, the General Officers of the W. C. T. U.:

You seem like friends of my own household—we have been so long and pleasantly associated and have borne together the burden and heat of the day. You were especially near and dear to that one who, during all my life, has been dearest and nearest to me. I feel that it would be most ungrateful in me to complain now that she has gone after a life so very long, beautiful and blessed, during which she had, from life's first hour to its last, full possession of her mental powers and all her senses, and which was a life without accident or calamity in a world so uncertain and full of pain and sorrow! Her last days were the greatest of her great career, but her going has changed Rest Cottage to a rifted nest through which the wind blows at its will.

When a cablegram came from Lady Henry Somerset, offering to Miss Gordon and me a trip to England, I had not force enough to decide what should be done in view of her beautiful and benignant thoughtfulness, so I sent Miss Gordon to the city with the message, asking her to show it to each of the eight leading women in our W. C. T U. Temple, consulting each one separately and expressing no opinion. She came home, saying that they all declared it as their conviction that this invitation was a good gift to us from God and should be at once accepted, for we are worn and weary, both in body and mind, so we are going on the steamship, Etruria, August 27th, to return in time for the National Convention in Denver, October 28th. I shall prepare my annual address on the other side of the water, and am hoping for recuperation and inspiration that shall reward the long, laborious journey No meetings nor receptions will be held, for we seek at once the shelter of Lady Henry's presence and home and do not purpose to go elsewhere.

I know that you will carry forward the work, preparing for the convention, and that all will be well with our loyal host, each one of whom is more than ever endeared to me now that I stand more alone, and know I have, as never hitherto, their prayers and sympathies, which have always enveloped me and mine in an atmosphere of affection and faith. With a blessing upon you each and all, I am, as ever,

Your sorrowful comrade, yet always rejoicing in the hope of the gospel and the heavenly home,

FRANCES E WILLARD.

The liquor papers in England refer to Lady Henry Somerset as the modern Joan of Arc. They are more polite than those of America who have referred to our leader as the "worst witch of them all."

I have seen nothing more thoroughly American in its flavor than the squib of a rural editor, who, when the news came that Gladstone had been hit by a piece of gingerbread thrown at him during the recent bloodthirsty campaign, scratched the following in his paper: "We know that of all men Gladstone takes the cake."

Chaplain Lozier, of Mt. Vernon, Iowa, has a monologue entitled "My Mother's Apron Strings," which is said by a white-ribboner to be in a style decidedly new and original, affording an uplift to young people in their aspirations for the best life. The chaplain speaks with no uncertain sound regarding prohibition and the ballot for women. In the midst of his lecture he breaks forth into songs of his own composition; one of them has this stanza:

"Oh, these apron strings are the costliest things
That the loom of our life ever wove;
For their fabric is tear-jeweled tender heart-strings
Embroidered with prayer and with love.
There are titles of honor and titles of birth,
Of presidents, queens, and of kings,
But the richest inheritance known to this earth
Is your mother's apron strings."

That was a wonderful saying of Gladstone's when Queen Victoria, declining to put her name to a document brought her by him as Prime Minister, said: "But I am the queen of England, and I cannot sign this paper;" whereupon the grand old man made reply: "But I am the people of England, and your Majesty must sign." Whereupon she signed.

Mrs. Ada H. Kepley, long known to white-ribboners as a leader in temperance and purity work, was ordained to preach the gospel and administer the sacraments at the First Congregational church, Shelbyville, Ill., July 24th.

The following rules of the sweet, consecrated Quaker, Elizabeth Fry, seem to me most desirable for one who would live as simple and useful a life as she: 1. Never lose any time. Time spent in recreation is not lost. 2. Never err the least from the truth. 3. Never say an ill thing of a person when thou canst say a good thing. Not only speak charitably but feel so. 4. Never be irritable or unkind to any one. 5. Never indulge thyself in luxuries that are not necessary. 6. Do all things with consideration.

The admission of women as members of the National Provident Union, which for a long time was frowned upon by the organization, is now considered one of its most prominent features.

No utterance of Henry Ward Beecher is more worthy of our faithful consideration than the following recently published: "It has been the rule of my life to work with any man of good morals, on all lines on which we agree, though in a hundred others we disagree. Thus I work with Roman Catholics on charities, temperance, etc., with Swedenborgians, High Calvinists (whose theology I admire for logic, and abhor as a slander on God); with politicians, with any one 'whose face is as if he would go to Jerusalem!' Christianity draws men together; that which separates men on any other ground than that of personal immorality is anti-Christ. So think I—so do I—and I suffer cheerfully others to think as they please."

A white-ribboner on the streets of Chicago heard a young man using the name of God in most outrageous curses. She went to him, laid her hand kindly on his arm and said, "My brother, I heard your terrible oaths just as I was singing to myself with unutterable joy:

"'My God is reconciled,
His pardoning voice I hear.'

"Will you not breathe out those words until through repentance and faith they become true of your own life?" and with a tender smile she left him. Her motherly countenance, white hair and gentle voice impressed him deeply. A year after she was in one of the principal stores of the city speaking to a clerk whom she knew, when a young man asked the clerk who she was and followed her, recounting the incident we have here given and saying, as he grasped her hand while his eyes filled with tears, "I want you to know that for months past I, too, have been singing with a sincere heart: 'My God is reconciled.'"

ON DUTY.

MISSOURI.

A MODEL SCHOOL OF METHODS.

Missouri's second school of methods held in Pertle Springs, in connection with the state Chautauqua Assembly from July 8-16, brought together a good assemblage of women from various parts of the state. We met in congenial groups each day at the hotel piazza, on the bridge, at the spring, or on the grounds opposite the "Minnewawa" and talked about our work. At the ringing of the bell we assembled in the hall of philosophy ("hall in the grove") to join in the morning devotions. Then after the reading of the minutes, an hour was profitably spent in discussing the topics on the program, and in learning the best methods of doing "our Master's business;" we became so deeply interested that we were always sorry when the bell rung out, "the hour's up."

Mrs. A. S. Benjamin, of Portland, Michigan, conducted our school each morning from 9 to 10 a. m., in the hall of philosophy, and at 4 p. m. each day gave a parliamentary drill in the auditorium. Her excellent instruction and impressive illustrations will live in the memories of Missouri women for years hence. Miss Carrie L. Carter and Mrs. Sue de Havan efficiently acted as secretaries.

The equal suffrage department was presented on Suffrage Day in a forcible and convincing manner by the state superintendent of this department, Mrs. V. Hedges, by Miss E. Harrison, Mrs. E. M. Wince, of Kansas City, Mrs. L S Rounds, and others.

An interesting talk on organization was given by Mrs. C. H. Clark. We regretted that our state secretary, Miss Morris, could not be with us the first few days. She was called to the bedside of her sister, who passed away the day our school began. Mrs. Emma A. Murray had been an invalid for years, bearing her suffering without murmuring. The love and sympathy of many white-ribboners are extended to her bereaved ones.

Sunday, the 10th, was W. C. T. U. day at the assembly. Mrs. Louise S. Rounds, state president of the Illinois W. C. T. U., preached the morning sermon, taking for her subject, "Christian Character." At 2 p. m. she again spoke on the "White Cross and White Shield." These eloquent addresses appealed alike to the hearts and heads of her hearers. In the evening, Mrs. Mattie McClellan Brown, of Cincinnati, lectured in a pleasing manner on "Woman's Relation to Moral Reforms." This closed her series of engagements here and a red-letter day for the Missouri W. C. T. U.

Social purity was presented and discussed at length and able methods presented by our state superintendent of this department, Mrs. D. H. McNary and others Mrs. Rounds conducted a model mothers' meeting and brought out many helpful thoughts. Mrs. J Newly and Mrs. M. Ludlum interested their audiences while they spoke in turn on "Healthful Dress and Physical Culture." Mrs. Rounds was greeted at her last address by a larger audience than ever. Her subject, "Three Reasons" was presented in a forcible, dignified and impressive manner. The work done at this assembly by such workers will surely not be in vain.

Miss Lillian Wood spoke emphatically on the need of more thorough scientific temperance instruction and congratulated us that the new series contained two of our text-books, hoping that the higher physiology would either be revised or some other placed in its stead. Papers of rare merit by Mrs. Belle R. Robert and Miss Emma Mekeel, of St. Louis, were read and discussed. "Temperance in the Sunday-schools," in the absence of state superintendent, Mrs. J. Wardan, was well treated by Rev. Mr. Carpenter. Press work and best methods to secure and retain columns in local newspapers was an important subject, largely discussed by those present.

Mrs. Benjamin urged that all our unions take up the department of mercy. She told very touchingly the story of how the poor mother bird is caught, her eyes put out and she is left suspended in air, crying in agonizing tones. While scores of birds flock around her in sympathy, a suspended net is lowered and many birds are captured. They are then cut to pieces by inches, that the plumage may be kept bright to gratify the tastes of women who think they must have feathers to decorate their hats and bonnets.

An enjoyable platform meeting was also conducted by Mrs. Benjamin. There was a Scripture lesson and prayer. Mrs. Boller, of Sedalia, sang a solo which delighted her hearers. Mrs. Hedges and Miss Harrison spoke five minutes each on "Woman Suffrage." Dr. Ellis, Rev. Boller and platform conductor, Rev. F. Lenig, spoke encouraging words. While we had such able women from other states to lecture for us, we were glad that we have a speaker in our own ranks who is becoming a national favorite, Mrs. Alice Williams. Her lecture on "Popular Temperance Delusions" was full of convincing argument, and was presented in such an emphatic and yet ladylike manner that Missouri women are proud to call her "one of us."

We were much disappointed at the inability of our esteemed state president, Mrs. Clara Hoffman, to be with us. Pressing engagements prevented. The summer school furnishes ample time and opportunity for our workers to become acquainted with each other and to counsel together as we cannot at our state conventions. It also brings us into contact with our best educators who enjoy the rest and welcome awaiting them at Pertle Springs. Mr. Christopher gave us very liberal rates at his hotel and the Chautauqua management were courteous, giving us many hours on the program. In their turn the white-ribboners helped largely to swell the audiences. The assembly management can congratulate themselves on having had a good program, and the thanks of the Missouri W. C. T. U. are due Miss Morris for her untiring energy and faithfulness.

NOTES.

The Grant City union have just celebrated their anniversary in a fitting manner. The church was beautifully decorated with flowers and hemlock. The various departments were represented by their superintendents, with good reports. The president who had ably served for some time declined reëlection, and Mrs. N. J. Campbell was elected in her place. At night a large audience gathered to listen to Rev. E. H. Brumlaugh, of St. Joseph, on "Grappling with a Giant."

The energetic president of the twelfth district, Miss Harrison, has assisted in holding county conventions in Jasper, Barton, Bates and Cass counties, and leaves them well equipped for work.

Many unions are planning to send one hundred dollars to the Temple, while others are working to secure shares in The Home Guard, which is growing better with each issue.

Two new unions have been lately organized at Alba and Nevada.

Smithfield honored the 4th of July with a temperance celebration, in which both ladies and gentlemen took part.

Carthage union have their own headquarters, and work in this district is progressing.

Mrs. J. H. Clark spent a month in the fourteenth district, during which time she visited twenty towns, lecturing, organizing, and attending county conventions. Five new unions, two L. T. L's and sixteen new members added to old unions are the fruit of her labor. She made many personal calls, visited Sabbath-schools, secured subscribers for our papers, and weary workers everywhere were inspired by her coming.

Misses Carter and Danforth attended Stoddard, Butler, and Ripley county conventions, and found them well organized for work.

The St. Louis Y held an entertainment at which they cleared $200; have pledged $100 to the Temple, twenty-five of which is paid. They have paid to state work twenty-five dollars, sent to the Temperance Hospital, twenty-two dollars, and paid to The Home Guard and to the Prohibition party, five dollars each.

Miss E. P. Babb is energetically working in the local option campaign in Boone county She has organized a union and an L. T. L., of fifty members at Ashland.

Ludlow held her first medal contest recently and expects to have more in the future.

Jamesport has just held her fourteenth medal contest, the last medal being won by Miss Effa Buyard, who recited "The World on Fire."

The W. C. T. U. of Sedalia gave a fifteen cent tea at the home of Mrs. Flanders, which was enjoyed by all present and was a financial success. The Prohibitionists of Pettis county have nominated a full ticket, headed by Van B. Wisker for representative.

Webster Groves held their annual meeting and an interesting program was carried out They began the year with twenty-seven members and closed with forty-eight, five being added that day. Their L T L held a medal contest, and cleared twenty dollars which was sent to the Temple, fifty of these boys having signed the triple pledge. This union is most successful in carrying on L. T. L. work and mothers' meetings. Mrs. Alice Williams gave them an able address on social purity.

The unions in Montgomery county, in the seventh district, pledged fifty dollars for district work, with four more unions to hear from.

Our workers will regret to learn that the well-furnished headquarters of the W. C. T. U., at Bethany, were totally consumed by fire on the night of July 8. Their rooms were carpeted, had pictures, banners, a good organ and a library of choice books of several hundred volumes.

Our dates for state convention are again changed. The dates as last arranged are from September 30 to October 3.

NEW MEXICO.

GRADUAL GROWTH.

The difficulties of territorial work are well known, but western women seem equal to the task of long journeys and physical endurance. The towns are scattered and often hidden in mountain valleys, requiring time and expense to reach them, yet our New Mexico white ribbon president travels, irrespective of discomfort, and carries the cause to waiting women in mining camp or valley hamlet, thereby reaching the entire population! Since the last National convention she has visited nearly every union, and organized new ones, and finds the work holding its own if not growing as rapidly as she could wish. The unions carry on as many as six departments of work. The Loyal Temperance Legion gives promise of the best fruit for the labor put forth, and takes precedence of other lines. To educate the children is the only sure way to save humanity, ultimately, work as we may to reform the grown individual.

In the extreme north the new union of Blossburg has had a necktie social and cleared ninety dollars, which ought to encourage and stimulate others to go and do likewise. Gallup is busy and especially given to juvenile work The children sing the prohibition songs from Anna Gordon's book to the delight of miners and citizens.

Albuquerque is numerically the strongest union and is doing good work. They have recently had the good fortune to enlist the good services of Mrs. J. N. Sterry, who has lived many years in Kansas. It is an omen of good that she has been in the suffrage work of that state and may bring to the notice of the conservative woman, her helplessness in all reform work until she has the only weapon by which permanent good can be accomplished along those lines. We are growing gradually to see the absolute necessity of the ballot to protect our homes from the invasion of foes made powerful by the ballot in the hands of men, while we have no adequate armor to withstand the deathblows to peace, purity and prosperity in the sacred precincts of the family hearth.

Kingston is giving her energies to a reading room, that is typical of the town, in being kept open day and night, whereas so many reading rooms are opened only at stated hours. They are going forward and deeply interested in many departments, especially the juvenile work.

Eddy has a good union, but the Eddy Bros.' wisdom in having prohibition inserted in the title deeds of that growing community is an excellent education in itself, and their worthy example has been followed by Mitchell Bros.—Michigan gentlemen, who have established a new town out on the A. and P R. R. So New Mexico can proudly boast of two clean towns, where children can come to maturity, believing in the outlawry of the saloon.

Mrs Borden, our president, has recently been licensed to preach in the Congregational church. Her examination was before a large body of people, and a board of fourteen ministers; two gentlemen were candidates with her. She is the first woman minister in our territory.

Following this event a citizen of Las Vegas, Mrs. H. H. Pettijohn, was admitted to the bar of New Mexico at the spring term of court and was victorious after a rigid examination of many hours from a committee hardly expected to be in sympathy with this advancement of women. These two significant events point to the future of our women, and although a territory we have placed ourselves in line with the rest of the enlightened world.

Mrs. Borden's travels have been extensive, this year having traveled 3,800 miles in her own work of temperance missions, and made thirty addresses, traveling and speaking frequently the same day. She has been devoting her time to the cause, and people generally must perceive the beneficent results of her labors of love and education. She goes into the mountain towns by stage and rides to far removed communities, bringing the glad tidings of "good will to men."

Our annual meeting will be held probably in Socorro, August 31, September 1, 2. Miss Willard's suggestion to invite auxiliary delegates from other societies has been acted upon by Mrs. Borden, and we trust to have a fuller meeting than heretofore. We recognize that our organization has a most earnest, efficient and conscientious leader, and one that will be kept in place to marshal sentiment to the greatest moral question of this century awaiting settlement at the bar of public opinion.

COLORADO.

CONVENTIONS AND REPORTS.

At the convention of the southern district recently held at Salida, new thoughts and lines of work were introduced by resolution and papers.

The following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That we discourage social distinctions made between working girls and their sisters, and do all in our power to ameliorate the evil conditions of their service in stores, by securing early closing and better wages in domestic service, by securing for them the privilege of certain uninterrupted hours, and providing opportunity for harmless social diversion, and evening classes for instruction in various lines of industrial work.

Resolved, That we consider housekeeping an accomplishment desirable in the education of every young lady, and henceforth we will endeavor to make our practice accord with this sentiment by encouraging the working girls in every possible way.

While the above line of work has been carried on in many places by the "Working Girls' Clubs," it is a work specially adapted to the Y's and by them can be carried to practical results.

A paper by Isabel Inman, of Canon City, might well have been discussed at the "Conference of Corrections and Charities." It was on the following question: "Do the punishment and torture now inflicted on some of our criminals make them better men and women, and is it to the advantage of the state to make them better?" Among the other papers was one by Mrs. Ella B. Gittings, on "The Exhibition and Forcing of Children," that provoked a lengthy discussion.

The subject of "Social Purity" called out a lively discussion that was participated in by Rev. Mr. Brooks, of Salida, who is an ardent friend of all lines of temperance work.

The evening being in charge of the Y's was presided over by Miss Winifred Spaulding, state superintendent of that department, who also spoke on self-support. Ella Brooks, of Salida, told of "Woman in Philanthropies." A "Physical Culture Drill" was given to music, by the Y girls of Salida. The final services were given in the Opera House when Rev. Henrietta Moore addressed a crowded house and was listened to with enthusiasm. Miss Moore is doing excellent work throughout the state, and her lectures have received the highest commendation.

Boulder county convention was held at Boulder on June 7. Seven unions were represented and visitors were present from other places. The reports of the county work in general were heard and the flower mission was given special attention, being introduced by a paper given by Mrs. Webb, of Longmont. Larimer county held its second convention on June 17. Social purity, scientific temperance instruction, mothers' work and a parliamentary drill were the subjects considered. A blackboard exercise was given for the children by Mrs. Jones, of Loveland.

The Y's of Longmont gave an elegant reception to the three hundred and eighteen registered delegates of the state Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor and visitors, in all three hundred and fifty guests, at the home of Mrs. C. D. H. Thompson. The decorations for the table were smilax and wild violets from the mountains, and the souvenirs were pansies tied with white ribbon.

A Demorest contest was held by the West Denver Y's, Miss Rosa Burroughs winning the prize. Berthoud held its third contest, Mabel C. Blinn being the successful contestant. The North Pueblo union has under its care a woman's exchange, mission Sunday-school and girls' sewing school. The Mesa union has held several successful parlor meetings, and has one hundred and fifty dollars in bank as the beginning of a building fund.

Bessemer union holds its gospel meetings and mothers' meetings, and its Loyal Temperance Legions are doing excellent work. The Colorado Springs Y's have had the benefit of readings and talks on hygiene and drill in physical culture.

The Colorado City Y's gave a very successful entertainment in the W. C. T. U. Hall recently. The entertainments of the Y's are among the most popular in the city.

While the W's have their hands and time well occupied in working for the payments on their building they are providing for the Loyal Temperance Legion, and aiding all lines of temperance work, and having frequent lectures and public meetings for the cause.

The Denver Central union in its report for May gives an excellent showing. The receipts were $407.85 and expenditures $343.25. The day nursery cared for 904 children during the month. The annual report of the woman's exchange shows that $17,950 have been disbursed to worthy women. The patrons of the lunch room were 166,869 during the year.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

ODDS AND ENDS.

First of all, let me tell briefly about our trip into Ventura county, the early part of June. Mrs. Kiler, the county president, arranged for an afternoon and evening meeting at all the places where there were unions and at points where she hoped unions might be organized, and to drive with me herself, for many of the places were off of the railroad. Judged from my ten days' experience during these daily drives Ventura county is indeed

"A land of sunny days,
Of winds whose soft caress
Doth lull to sweet forgetfulness."

To the five unions in this county we added two more: one in a farming district, called "Pleasant Valley Union;" another up among the hills close neighbor to Los Angeles county, at Simi. These unions are made up of a handful of women each, but they are especially thoughtful and earnest and cared enough about having a union to make all the arrangements for the afternoon and evening meetings before our arrival. We thus have faith to believe they will hold together and do good work. I would especially mention the Sunday evening union meeting of the Christian Endeavor societies and the Epworth League of Ventura. The earnestness of the dear young people made it a delightful meeting. Looking into their bright, young faces, hearing their clear cut prayers for temperance, made me realize as never before what a mighty host for righteousness we might hope for by and by.

The San Bernardino county convention held at Colton, June 14 and 15, with Mrs. Abbie Lee Button, county president, in the chair, was good all the way through. I never was in a convention before where the wheels seemed to go round of themselves. The president's sweet spirit of calm brooded over all the proceedings, and there was no hurry and no flurry, but that serenity and repose that betokens reserve power. Mrs. Sudduth, of Colton, in her happy address of welcome, said, among other good things, "Our strong and gentle host of women, with the best loved woman in the world as leader, no longer kneels in the snow and the mud before the saloon, but with its forty departments of work, seeks the annihilation of the liquor traffic." Mrs. Potter, of Riverside, gave an apt and witty response.

The reports of the unions were full of items of interest. Little Beaumont has no saloon, but its ten members have been fighting a "blind tiger" in the cellar of a grocery. The Christian women of the churches put on the white ribbon, and all worked together to have the grocer arrested and tried. Twenty-four women attended the trial, which ended in a conviction and a fine. Ontario union reported no severe battles fought, but good work in Loyal Temperance Legion and mothers' meetings. Colton, with its twenty-two active and six honorary members, reported always good meetings and eight departments well looked after. Riverside has one hundred and thirty-eight active and eighty-six honorary members enrolled, but not all paid up members. It has twenty-two lines of work, evangelistic the most important. Nine mothers' meetings have been held in the different churches.

A year ago last Thanksgiving day this union voted a thankoffering of four dollars a year for ten years to Ramabai, because the saloons of Riverside have been closed. The Y of Ontario, the only Y in the county, reported a reading circle, one social, three Demorest contests, a parliamentary drill at each meeting and flowers with Scripture text sent to newsboys at the home and to the sick. Miss Downs, the president, who gave the report, told of giving a Scripture card to a tramp who came to the door. He looked at it, read it, and his eyes filled with tears as he said, "Thank you!" "Some of us," she said, "feel as if we could not do much, but we will stand by and say amen." Both Redlands and San Bernardino unions have started successfully a reading room and coffee house in addition to many other lines of work. Messina has done good work, especially in the departments of narcotics, scientific temperance instruction and Sabbath observance. But I must not say another word about San Bernardino county convention except to speak in terms of praise of the music. It was genuine temperance music, rendered by the Simmons family—father, mother and daughter—from Riverside and "brought down the house" every time. If we could only have such music at all our gatherings, we would soon sing prohibition and woman suffrage into the hearts of the people.

Miss West returned to us from northern California and helped in our work in every way possible. She spoke before a crowded house in the First Methodist church of Los Angeles, on "The Tomb and the Temple," in a way to give the public a just appreciation of the white ribbon work. She re-organized the union at Carpenteria, assisted with a school of methods in the county conventions of Santa Barbara and San Luis Obispo counties, held a meeting at Santa Ynez, and on her return from San Luis Obispo to Santa Barbara met the union in conference and talked to the young people of the city.

On July 16-18, and 19, with Sunday sandwiched in for a morning service, a children's afternoon, and an after meeting at night, our women held their second school of methods at Carlsbad, San Diego county. The county presidents of the three southern counties, Mrs. Whitmore, of San Diego county, Mrs. Button, of San Bernardino county, and Mrs. Mills, of Orange county, arranged the program and conducted the meetings, each one being responsible for a day and evening. The papers were exceptionally good, and the discussions entered into with much earnestness. The department of mothers' meetings brought out that strongly corroborated what Mrs. Henry says in "Unanswered Prayer," about parents praying for and with their children. In the discussion of the evangelistic work, the point of personal work and its good results was brought out through several incidents. Mrs. Roberts, of Bonsall, told of a religious meeting where the leader exacted a promise from all who would be willing the next day to ask some one to come to Christ. Mrs. Roberts hesitated to promise, owing to the dread she had always had of saying anything on religious subjects of a personal nature to any one, but she thought of Paul's exultant words, "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me," and held up her hand. All the next day she hoped she wouldn't see anybody, and be obliged to keep her promise. In the afternoon late she had to pass through a field to a neighbor's home on an errand. "Oh, if I should meet any one while crossing this lot, what would I do?" she said to herself. "But then I never have met any one here, and I have crossed it many times, so I guess there's no danger now." She had hardly thought these words when looking up she saw coming towards her the young daughter of the friend she was going to see. "Somehow, I don't know how, God helped me," she said. "I threw my arms around her neck and said, 'Oh, don't you want to love Jesus?' And the young friend burst into tears and replied, 'Oh, I have been for days wanting some one to ask me that question.'" Every incident told brought out the good done by a word fitly spoken, and also the hunger in the hearts of people to be talked with about Christ.

Grandma Holton, seventy years of age, and an old Crusader, gave some reminiscences of those days in her quaint way that were delightful to listen to. She said, "We were always in the way everywhere we went in the saloon or on the outside of it. It's a good thing sometimes to be in the way. 'I can't face them women,' said many a man as he turned away from the saloon he was about to enter for a drink, when he saw those women preempting the doorway or the sidewalk in front."

Mr. Hatch, of Escondido, a white ribbon man, and for four years superintendent of the Loyal Temperance Legion there, brought over eighteen young lady members who gave a fine drill upon the lawn of the big hotel and helped with members of the L. T. L. from Carlsbad, Ramona and other places in the last evening's entertainment. Mr. Hatch read a very practical and helpful paper on L. T. L. work in which he said that love, love for the young people and love for the work was the most important requisite for success. "Govern with your eyes more than with your tongue. The drill brings out the idea, not of war, but that the children and young people are ready for marching orders against intemperance and the saloon, not with bullets but with good words and deeds."

Rev. Mr. Pittinger, of Oceanside, uttered some very plain, blunt truths. Speaking of the Republican and Democratic parties, he said: "Both have a beer barrel for a throne and a toddy stick for a scepter. Men won't leave their parties. Why, I believe men would vote for the Old Scratch himself rather than break their party lines."

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

INTERESTING REPORT.

It is announced that Rev. M. V. B. Knox, of Manchester, has resigned the pastorate of his church and accepted a position as professor of a college in North Dakota. The announcement would seem to affect only his parish and circle of friends, but the truth is it takes from New Hampshire its much loved and valued president of the W. C. T. U. in the removal of Mrs. Knox. With joint interest they have worked for temperance, and a braver, more courageous woman never put her hand to the plow than our state president. North Dakota will surely gain a valued helper. Her interest in the temperance cause will never wane.

Dr. Zalae Straw, of Manchester, has been appointed physician at the Mercy Home, in connection with Dr. Wallace. The ladies' societies of the Baptist and Congregational churches of Manchester have each given a day's sewing to help on the good work and clothe the inmates of the Mercy Home. Money for the payment of the recently-purchased land comes in slowly, and it is hoped that each union will do its part toward this state home for homeless girls. There have been fourteen inmates the past few months, and the laundry receipts are increasing. At the last business meeting a vote of thanks was passed to all who had given toward the support of the home and either clothing or food.

There has recently been an L. T. L. formed in Littleton, with seventy members, Mrs. S. C. Sawyer, leader. The meeting was in the midst of a pouring rain, but the young people were enthusiastic and promised to increase the number. Our state superintendent has been doing a good work among the young, as the following items show: At Lancaster the L. T. L. was formed, with fifty members; at West Stewartstown the new organization numbered twenty.

There is a thriving L. T. L. at both Colebrook and Jefferson—both of which our enthusiastic superintendent addressed with words of courage and advice, leaving each place with a feeling of renewed strength, drawn from the little folks and their zealous leaders. I hope in my next letter to announce a new L. T. L. in Whitefield, Bath and the three Haverhills.

The fourth semi-annual convention of Coos county met at Whitefield and held a very interesting meeting. There were short speeches from gentlemen present, also the following addresses: "Temperance Literature," by Mrs. Julia Lane; "Temperance work in the Sabbath-school," by Mrs. Demond, of Gorham; a paper upon "Demorest medal contests," by the state superintendent, Mrs. Austin; "What we advocate," by Miss Susie P. Babcock, of Lancaster.

In Mrs. W. A. Loyne's report of the work done among lumbermen, there were given many touching incidents showing how thankfully all reading matter was received. She also spoke of the ready response from all unions in the state and from Massachusetts to the call for literature. [illegible] to pay [illegible] one of the camps. Closely following this report came two excellent addresses, the first of which was repeated in the evening by request, "Woman's Rest," by Mrs. Emily Emerson, of Gorham; "What shall we do to make the work more efficient?" Dr. Rosie Rowell, of Whitefield. The evening meeting was very attractive, singing by the choir, devotional exercises, and an address by Rev. Edwin C. Langford, of Haverhill. Sunapee has an L. T. L. of forty-five members. Fifteen dollars' worth of literature has been purchased from this income. Bouquets and tracts were given to the veterans on decoration day at Newport.

The Grafton county W. C. T. U. convention was held at Franconia. Miss Ella Pearson gave a chalk talk the first evening, which proved to be of great interest. The second day there were fewer addresses than at Whitefield, but the reports from the various unions were interesting and full of news for the outside world, some prosperous, some struggling and all hopeful. Franconia has a membership of thirty six and ten honorary members. Scientific temperance instruction is being taught in the schools. Ten UNION SIGNALS, sixty children's temperance papers and many leaflets have been distributed the past year and the county farm visited.

Woodsville has accomplished the desired end of raising one dollar per member to buy land around the Mercy Home. Haverhill has not held meetings regularly on account of illness, but "by their deeds ye shall know them," for they have sent literature and bandages to the lumbermen. Bristol had no delegate at the convention, but Mrs. Hatch announced that they were alive, she knew, having received a large box of clothing at the Mercy Home from them. An invitation was received from Bath to hold the annual convention with them September 7. Littleton has put an end to the sale of cigarettes; a drinking fountain has been set up; they sent forty books and other papers to lumbermen's camp; scientific temperance instruction has been introduced into their schools in spite of opposition.

Bethlehem has given five Demorest contests and is preparing for the sixth. Mrs. Hatch read a paper upon the Mercy Home. A medal contest occupied the evening, the prize being won by Minnie Edson; Master Charlie Bostwick gave two cornet solos. The Y. W. C. T. U., of Dover, have raised over fifty dollars from two entertainments. Our editor has an earnest plea in a late number of the Outlook for every member of the W. C. T. U. throughout New Hampshire to subscribe for the coming year. It is a just request.

Reports from conventions may prove a little dull to outsiders, but to a true blue sister they are of great interest. They act as an inspiration, giving new life to the community where they are held, and through the reports, binding the entire state as one union in the great work. The day convention of Rockingham county, at Hampton, the last of June, was very interesting. Reports were read from the various unions present, an impressive memorial service was held in honor of Mrs. Annie S. Littlefield, who died in South New Market, May 6. Resolutions were prepared and sent to the bereaved family by the members of the South New Market W. C. T. U. at the meeting following her death.

The afternoon session was filled with remarks from gentlemen present and reports from the L. T. L. of Seabrook, Hampton Falls, and Exeter. Scientific temperance instruction was presented by Miss C. R. Wendall; Ethel Towne, an L. T. L. member from Exeter, sang a song. The president of the county, Miss A. E. McIntire, conducted the meeting. The white-ribboners of Merrimack county are following with interest their dear president, Mrs. Mary A. Pratt, of Concord, in her trip across the waters. Letters will reach her addressed in care of Cheney Party, Baring Bros. & Co., Bankers, London, England.

A pleasant meeting of the W. C. T. U. was held at the M. E. church in Sunapee on the 15th instant, the occasion being the semi annual convention of Sullivan county. The morning or devotional service was conducted by Mrs. C. W. Taylor, of Sunapee, and was a season of special uplifting to those present. Dinner was served in the vestry at the close of this service. Words of greeting were spoken by Mrs. S. W. Abbott, of Sunapee, and were responded to by Mrs. Albee, of Claremont. A business meeting occupied the afternoon.

The evening was devoted to the discussion of the question, "Resolved—That our country is more endangered by the liquor traffic through the indifference of good men, than by the aggressive action of bad men." Miss Kidder, of Newport, read a most interesting paper in favor of the resolution, while Mrs. Grant, also of Newport, presented her views in opposition, which were none the less interesting.

Rev. C. W. Taylor followed with remarks on the negative, also a gentleman from Chelsea, whose name your writer has not learned, gave a most interesting talk of his experience in dealing with the liquor traffic in Chelsea and elsewhere.

Mrs. Taylor also stated her views briefly, but to the point, in favor of the resolution, as did Mrs. Albee, of Claremont. It is to be regretted that so few of the representatives of the county unions were in attendance, as the questions arising were of the utmost importance to the cause of temperance and morality, and the members of our local societies need these "helps by the way."

KENTUCKY NEWS."

The state W. C. T. U. school of methods met this summer on the Chautauqua assembly grounds in their own headquarters. The tent was twenty by thirty feet, tastefully decorated with flags and mottoes on the outside, and within all was cheery and homelike. Miss Willard's picture was hung up and it seemed to give a greeting to her sister workers. It is a much cherished wish that sometime they will have Miss Willard herself in council with them. Many loving thoughts have been sent to her and to the dear mother, "Saint Courageous," who so sweetly and serenely passed into rest.

Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge was there and assisted in many ways, winning the most conservative by her able and convincing arguments. Large crowds were in attendance and each day seemed to be the best day. The interest manifested was very encouraging to the managers who have undertaken this work and carried it on so successfully. Mrs. Woodbridge fairly outshone herself and it is to be regretted that more of the W. C. T. U. women throughout the state were not there to see and hear; for with information must come increased activity and desire to do more work "while it is called to-day." Mrs. Helen Gougar was present one day and made an address in which she advocated full suffrage. She made a fine impression and many regretted that she could not remain longer. Mrs. Woodbridge has promised to meet with them again next year, and this promise, the ladies think, insures another successful school of methods.

Mrs. Beauchamp was reëlected president, and Mrs. Geo. W. Bain, was appointed secretary and treasurer in the place of Mrs. Sallie Webster Lapsley, who resigned after two years of faithful work, on account of failing health. The earnest prayers of her co-workers go out to her that she may be completely restored, and that with lengthened days she may be given increased usefulness in this field she so much loves.

Special mention and thanks are due the women of the unions in the seventh district for the very liberal contributions to the state headquarters on the ground. The officers feel much gratified that the work has grown to such proportions in the past year and take heart for a brighter future for the Kentucky school of methods.

Mrs. Pope, president of the seventh district, arranged for a meeting at North Middletown, and Mrs. Frances Beauchamp organized a union there with twenty-six members, a fine body of women, interested and enthusiastic. An L. T. L. was also organized at Millersburgh. The Fayette county unions have been greatly benefited by the school of methods and a list of names was kept of the places which ask that some one be sent to them to organize unions. This will be done as soon as possible. So you see "Here stands old Kentucky." Nellie Sloy,

State Reporter, Lebanon.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

Mrl. C. H. Johnson, of Flint, Michigan, has been the recording secretary of that state for years, and almost never has a correction been made in her minutes. To her efficiency is due no small part of the on-moving success of the society.

Mrs. Nannie Munnell, Kentucky's beloved W. C. T. U. president, received from one of the convicts in the state penitentiary, a few days after her visit there with the flower-missioners, a beautiful gavel to be used by her at the next state convention.

The inter-state convention of the W. C. T. U., which assembled at Mountain Lake Park, Md., July 13-17, was a notable gathering. It is said that the ladies "sang, prayed, preached, talked, cheered and even whistled temperance." Joseph Cook's address on "Rumsellers as Robbers and Rulers," drew a large crowd and was productive of great good.

The following-named officers were elected at the state convention held at Pendleton, Ore.: President, Mrs. Anna R. Riggs, Portland; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Susie E. Foster, University Park, Portland; recording secretary, Mrs. Helen B. Harford, Newberg; treasurer, Mrs. Margaret I. Bilyeau, Eugene; state organizer and lecturer, Mrs. Helen B. Harford, Newberg; secretary young woman's branch, Miss Rose Trumbull, La Grande.

Mrs. Elizabeth J. Smith, of Providence, Rhode Island, began in 1886 a temperance paper entitled The Home Guard. She copyrighted the name and has secured a trade-mark on the words "Home Guard." At different times other papers have adopted the title but when informed of the foregoing facts have relinquished it. This announcement is made because a W C. T. U. paper has recently taken the name "Home Guard," and we are sure it would not do this were these facts understood. Mrs. Smith is doing good work with her paper, whereof we are glad.

At the business session of the National Council of Women of the United States held in Chicago in May, the resignation of the vice-president, Mrs. Ella Dietz Clymer, was presented and accepted with expressions of regret. Mrs. Clymer's condition of health made it imperative that she should accede to the advice of her physician and resign all official position in the various organizations with which she was connected. Miss Clara Conway, of Memphis, Tenn., was unanimously elected to the vacant office. Miss Conway has accepted the position and looks forward to active participation in the work of the Council in which she is deeply interested.

Mrs. M. A. Conwell, one of the veterans of the white ribbon work, has recently convened in her home at North Evanston, Ill., about sixty ladies of the W. C. T. U., who passed in review the local work and paid their respects to this brave and good woman, who, after rearing two noble sons who are leaders in the ministerial ranks of this country, found that "a life work remains for a life time" and devoted her energies to taking a complete course of study at Chautauqua, and helping the W. C. T. U. in Evanston and elsewhere. One of the happy peculiarities of the W. C. T. U. workers is, that they are slow to cease from the activities of life, and verify the declaration of Oliver Wendell Holmes: Nobody is old until he thinks he is.

The president of Fulton county, Ohio, has been doing a unique work, and one worthy the adoption of co-workers. She has distributed literature among the farmer and workingmen's societies, visiting them, and presenting such topics as scientific temperance instruction, Sabbath observance, Sunday-school work and school suffrage. The literature sent them has been on the moral and economic side of the temperance question. Through her influence the plan of work committees recommended that the farmer and workingmen's societies of the county and district be invited to send fraternal delegates (lady members of their organizations) to consult with the plan of work committees on the best methods of carrying on lines of work in which their societies and the W. C. T. U. can co-operate.

SCHOOL OF METHODS.

My unexpected appointment as World's superintendent of school of methods, with orders from our chieftain to visit Japan in the interests of this work, call me for a time away from my post as National superintendent. But I am happy to state that there has been associated with me in this department Miss Lodie Reed, of Indianapolis, whose experience and efficiency fit her most admirably to carry on the work. No state excels Indiana in excellency of its schools of methods; in securing this result Miss Reed has been a very important factor.

Judging from the number of letters which I have received asking for plans and suggestions concerning the work, I feel sure that more schools have been systematically planned and doubtless successfully carried on this year than ever before. That this work may be known and thus become the incentive to even greater success next year, it must be fully reported at the next National convention. To enable Miss Reed thus to report it, each school must be reported to her. I therefore urge every white-ribboner who has conducted a school of methods to report the same immediately after it closes, to Miss Lodie Reed, Room 7, 66½ North Pennsylvania street, Indianapolis, Indiana. State whether it is a county, district or state school, location, name of conductor, and regular teachers, number in attendance, departments studied, lecturers employed, character of entertainments, if any, in connection with it, expenses and how met, whether arrangements were made for a school next year, and any other items of interest which will help in understanding the workings of the school. Send the report as soon as the school closes, for if you put it off the rush of work which always comes in the fall, will prevent its being done at all.

It would greatly aid in securing a comprehensive view of the year's work, if each state president would send Miss Reed the number of schools held in her state during the year, this not to take the place of the conductor's reports, but to supplement them.

The training school idea grows apace. I have plans which I hope may materialize next May when the white-ribboners of the world gather at Chicago. Pray for the success of this department which, in a sense, underlies all others and is auxiliary to them.

Mary Allen West,
Nat. Sup't School of Methods.

THE WORLD'S SUNDAY-SCHOOL PLEDGE CARD.

It is issued in just the right time. The securing of the quarterly temperance lesson not on review Sunday has proved, as we always believed it would, a great means of awakening a deep and serious interest as to "What next?" A revival of pledge signing on a large scale is now the effort along Sunday-school lines, and the World's Sunday-school pledge card, ordered by the National W. C. T. U. at its last convention, and now issued by the W. T. P. A., is the very thing needed.

From many testimonials to its beauty and value I give a few: Mrs. F. D. B. Chase, Pennsylvania's superintendent of Sunday-school work, writes: "The recent issue of the World's Sunday-school temperance society pledge is the most beautiful and attractive ever published. It is in every way appropriate, and well adapted to the Sunday-schools, and must meet with universal favor." Mrs. Julia A. Bidwell, former superintendent Sunday-school department for New York, under whose leadership that state far excelled any other in thoroughness of work along this line, writes: "The new World's Sunday school pledge card is the finest we have ever had and is just what we have long needed." Mrs. Sarah A. Kenney, the present New York superintendent, says concerning it: "The design is very pretty and it is better adapted to Sunday-school use than the pledge heretofore issued."

A sample was sent to Rev. Dr. Clark, president of the Society of Christian Endeavor, just before he started on his round-the-world tour, asking for his opinion regarding it. The answer came, expressing his approval and also his belief that it would be useful in keeping many children "from ever tasting the destroyer of homes."

Nearly one hundred thousand of the autograph pledge cards for the Columbian Exposition have already been ordered by the Sunday-school people, and many more will be ordered, I am assured, from correspondence. These will be sent away, and it would be a most excellent thing to give every one who has signed the autograph pledge cards one of the World's Sunday-school pledge cards to keep.

Sample will be sent by enclosing a two-cent stamp to the W. T. P. A., The Temple, Chicago. Price per hundred, $1. In order to avoid delay send directly, both for sample and cards, in quantity, to the W. T. P. A.

Yours for the united and pledged Sunday school army of the world,

Lucia E. F. Kimball,
Nat. Supt. Sunday School Work.

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Dear Superintendents of Work for Soldiers and Sailors:

I am hoping that your reports of state work in this department will reach me early enough to cause no delay in the compilation of all items of interest in the annual paper to be presented at Denver and afterward incorporated in the National minutes.

A summary of ten years history of effort and achievement on behalf of our patriots and defenders by sea and land is in course of preparation and will, I trust, be ready for the National convention. It will be issued in a pretty and attractive form, readable as well as useful to our white-ribboners.

Send your reports to me, addressed to the care of Mrs. F. C. Johnston, 469 Cumberland St., Portland, Maine, and oblige yours faithfully. Sarah A. McClees, Nat. Supt. Dept. Soldiers and Sailors.

Our Library Table.

A Gift of Love and Loving Greetings. This is a beautiful gift-book arranged by Rose Porter, for daily readings. It is unique, in that it has but one topic throughout, the word "love" appearing in each one of the three hundred sixty-five Scripture texts, of which the sweet lesson of love is ever the central thought. The prose and poetry selections are in harmony with the texts, making the whole a lovely and lovable little volume.

Fleming H. Revell Company, Chicago and New York.

Marjorie's Canadian Winter, by Agnes Maule Machar. Illustrated from photographs and drawings by Hy Sandham. D. Lothrop Company, Boston. $1.50.

This is a bright, healthful story that must win for itself warm praise from every boy and girl who reads it. Probably no people get more intense satisfaction and pure enjoyment out of the winter season than do the Canadians. They meet the storm king and the biting cold with armor of fur and blanket, and the wilder the winds and higher the snowdrifts the deeper is their delight. The average American would shrink and shiver before the long tramps and sleighrides in which native Canadians revel. Miss Machar's heroine, true hearted, sweet-natured Marjorie, is a little American girl who, because of the absence of an invalid father, is compelled to spend a winter with Canadian friends in the historic old city of Montreal. She is introduced into the mysterious delights of tobogganing and snow-shoeing, rejoices over the splendors of the Carnival and its ice palace, visits ancient churches and storied convents, wonders over the queer ways of habitans, and listens to thrilling tales of the days when the white man and Indian struggled for possession of that beautiful country. The book is of historical interest, aside from being a charming holiday tale.

Oscar Fay Adams, the author of a series of articles appearing in the North American Review, has reprinted these articles in book form under the title, The Presumption of Sex. The author shows a keen observance of traits peculiar to men and women, and has in a series of chapters upon the "mannerless," "vulgar," "ruthless" and "brutal" sex administered some sharp and often wholly deserved rebukes. The closing chapter upon "Our Dreadful American Manners" is an "ower true tale" and one that ought to be "writ large" for the close consideration of a large number of our citizens.

Lee & Shepard, Boston. Price $1.

Bound in white and gold and tied with the significant white ribbon, comes to the Library Table a booklet carrying its own commendation in its title "Selections from Mary A. Livermore." Those who have heard Mrs. Livermore or have learned to know and love her through her work, will be glad to have in this form some of her many quotable paragraphs. The selections are made by Mrs. Ellen M. Everett for the Massachusetts Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the book being issued by that body.

171 Tremont St., Boston, Mass.

Inquirendo Island, by Hudor Genone. This book is intended for a sharp satire on the extremes of formalism in religion. The inhabitants of Inquirendo Island deify mathematics and use mathematical rules as Christians use Bible truths, making the arithmetic the book of their god and the rule of their lives. It can only be said that the author would accomplish more on the side of religion had he written a strong, straightforward story on gospel lines, whose trend could not be mistaken, since in the book above named, even if one wade through its narrative from a motive other than curiosity in seeing where its strange course will "come out," it causes the reader to doubt many times whether or not it is a veiled attack upon religious faith.

Charles H. Kerr & Company, 175 Dearborn St., Chicago.

Thomas Carlyle's Moral and Religious Development. The above named book is a translation by Jessica Gilbert Tyler from the German of Ewald Flügel, and is a critical study of Carlyle, in his belief, his relation to Christianity, his position in regard to science and philosophy, poetry, art, and history. The book is composed in large part of carefully made selections from the great thinker's works, and one can doubtless study him with greater ease through a medium such as the book in question, than to attack him single-handed and alone.

TORONTO AND RETURN $12.45.

On account of the Toronto Industrial Fair and Agricultural Exposition, the Wabash Railroad will sell tickets September 5, 6 and 7, Chicago to Toronto and return, at half rates; tickets good for return passage to September 15, inclusive. Through car service and fast time. Ticket Office, 201 Clark Street.

LOW RATE HARVEST EXCURSIONS.

The announcement that the North-Western Line, comprising over 8,000 miles of thoroughly equipped railway, has arranged to run two low rate Harvest Excursions during the months of August and September, will be gladly received by those who are interested in the development of the great West and Northwest, as well as by those who desire to visit this wonderfully productive region at a season of the year when exact demonstration can be made of the merits and advantages it offers to homeseekers and those in search of safe and profitable investments.

These excursions will leave Chicago on August 30th and September 27th, and tickets can be purchased at the very low rate of one fare for the round trip to points in Iowa, Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, Idaho and Montana. They will be strictly first-class in every particular and will be good for return passage at any time within twenty days from date of purchase. Full information concerning rates and arrangements for these excursions can be obtained upon application to any coupon ticket agent, or to W. A. Thrall, G. P. T. A., Chicago & North-Western R'y, Chicago.

THREE HARVEST EXCURSIONS.

Half Rates via the Illinois Central.

Aug. 30th, Sept. 27th and Oct. 25, 1892.

The Central Route will sell Excursion tickets to the Agricultural Regions of the West, Southwest and South, at one fare for the Round Trip, from stations on its lines north of Cairo, on August 30th, and September 27th. A third excursion will be run to the South and Southwest on October 25th. Your Local Ticket Agent will give you full particulars in regard to these Harvest Excursions; arrangements can also be made in this connection to visit the desirable Railroad Lands for sale by the Illinois Central in Southern Illinois on obtaining special permission to do so by addressing the Company's Land Commissioner at Chicago, Mr. E. P. Skene. In addition, a few weeks before the first Excursion date, your Local Ticket Agent will be able to furnish you with a special Folder, issued by the Illinois Central, which will give you particulars of these Harvest Excursions in such form as will enable you to plan your journey at home. Should you not be within call of a railroad ticket agent, address A. H. Hanson, G. P. A., Illinois Central R. R., Chicago, Ill.

It is noticeable how many so-called manufacturing towns tell what is going to be done, but few of them tell what is already done. Harvey is a remarkable exception to this rule. From its inception it has had continuous prosperity, and we commend Walter Thomas Mills & Co. for the care they have taken in making reliable statements. We have just been shown a book published by Walter Thomas Mills & Co., entitled "Harvey Illustrated," which they send free to any address, containing over twenty photographic views of Harvey and its surroundings, showing most wonderful results, and proving that a great town can be built on temperance principles. It is surprising to see so many immense factories gathered in one plaee in so short a period of time, and all of such good substantial character. The educational part has been well taken care of by Walter Thomas Mills & Co., who have erected a large, commodious academy which was open for school last January. Its June term closed with ninety three pupils. Harvey's greatest enterprise is the World's Fair Temperance Hotel now being built for the accommodation of 2,000 guests during the World's Fair on Block R, Academy Addition. Walter Thomas Mills & Co. also have exclusive sale of the stock for this gigantic enterprise They say the completion of the hotel will double the value of every lot in that locality. They have a few lots which yet remain at original prices, but this will not be the case very long. What the citizens of Harvey desire every one to understand is that the improvements in their wonderful town are already on the ground and a fixed fact. They do not think it fair to their town to make comparisons with so-called manufacturing towns whose promises of something yet to be done are put against the solid enterprises already established at Harvey. Harvey has averaged more than a new house every day for two years.—From August Number World's Fair News, Chicago.

YOU SHOULD HELP.

WHO? Why, every member of the W. C. T. U., and friends of our cause.

IN WHAT? In introducing into every Sunday-school the Temperance Lesson for September 25.

WHEN? Without delay. See the superintendent and tell him what a beautiful, illustrated Lesson he can secure, and how it will help in forming character to instill its teachings into the minds of the children.

BUT IF—Yes, if there is any obstacle, then vote money from the local treasury so that the truth in telling force can be carried to minds and hearts not yet reached.

Mrs. Helen G. Rice and Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson have done excellent work in the preparation of this Lesson and hundreds of thousands should be distributed.

Price, for 100, 65 cents; 500, $2.75; 1,000, $5. The Young Crusader and the Lesson will be sent on the following terms: For 100, $1; 500, $4.75; 1,000, $9; 2,000, $15; 5,000, $35; 8,000, $48. All orders between numbers named at the rate immediately preceding.

Order from the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, The Temple, La Salle and Monroe streets, Chicago, Ill., and in time for distribution in the Sunday-schools September 18, the Sunday preceding the Temperance Sunday, September 25.

The Union Signal was never so valuable as now on the practical side. Articles from specialists ever drift new ideas into every day life. Among these the most useful and brightest is a story by Helen Campbell, noted as a short story writer, but destined to become as famed for "Some Passages in the Practice of Dr. Martha Scarborough," now running in The Union Signal, as for her late book, "Daylight and Darkness." It brilliantly presents the study of hereditary alcoholism from the scientific standpoint.

With this issue a new story from Mrs. O. W. Scott, too well known as a delightful writer of books to need introduction here, begins in The Union Signal. If Helen Campbell's clear head opens a royal highway for a beautiful, strong body through material means, Mrs. Scott's new story, "David Douglas and his Wife" is after the same end by clearing the soul of such cob webs as "expediency" weaves across it—"for of the spirit body form doth take." It is an "alive all over" story that everybody needs these election days, and will run till November 4.

The World's number of The Union Signal—September 15—will overflow with song and story, with power and persuasion, with "preach and practice," gathered up from the wide world;—a poem for those who love soul-heroism; a guide book for those whose busy feet never rest in running W. C. T. U. ways, and satisfaction for hungry spirits who are trying to find out "how." It will contain a program for local unions to be used on Thursday, September 22, Mrs. Leavitt's birthday, and one for Sunday for public services.

Send orders promptly so that programs for meetings will be on hand.

NOW IS THE TIME.

Of course you will want Willard souvenir cards to use on the occasion of the Harvest Home Festival. They are not only useful but beautiful. The autograph of Miss Willard is on each one, and in fac simile of her own handwriting is the wise advice, "Tell mother everything." On the reverse side are suitable Scripture texts. Let every child you can reach have one. Price per package of 10, 15c.

IT IS NOT TOO LATE.

You can still order copies of the Fair number of The Union Signal for use at your fair. We do not need to tell of its merits; you have seen and read it. Do you not think it is exceedingly cheap? Where else could you get a paper equal to it for $1.75 per 100 or 1¾c per copy in 100 lots? How much good might 2c do when used for this purpose? We are holding the plates and can put them on the press and print what you need on short notice.

TO SAVE DRUNKARDS

This is the mission of the National Bichloride of Gold Institute, cor. Monroe St. and Hoyne Ave., Chicago. The effectiveness of the Dr. Thompson system as practiced here has never been questioned either by those who have tried it or by those who have investigated it. Whatever may be said about injury resulting from other systems, there has never been the least symptom of injury to patients from the Dr. Thompson treatment. Hundreds have been cured, and are witnesses that drunkenness and narcotism in its worst forms can be speedily cured at this great institution.

The National Bichloride of Gold Co., Incorporated, control the Dr. Thompson Treatment for the World. Branch Institutes are now being established in different states and in foreign countries. Friends of the cause who wish to make a splendid paying investment, and be identified with the grand work, should apply at once for stock. The first quarterly dividend, a liberal one, was paid July 1st. The next will be paid Oct. 1st. The amount of stock remaining unsold is limited. Shares are only $25 each, and may be paid for in $5 monthly installments, if desired.

For full information regarding stock or treatment at Institute, as well as the names of prominent clergymen and temperance workers who indorse the work, apply to or address

Harvey's History.

A Handsome Brochure Just Issued.

Few towns two years old have any history to write.

But Harvey, Ill., is the exception.

In all respects it is an exceptional town, exceptional in the twin principles of Industry and Temperance, on which it is founded; in the interest it has created; in the men who stand behind it; in the people who believe in and take stock in it; in its wonderful growth; in its glowing prospects; in its opportunities offered to home-seekers and investors.

So Harvey's History has been written and illustrated with both verbal and photographic accuracy, showing the town exactly as it is—its great factories, its boulevards and parks, its stores, its public buildings, its happy homes.

It is too handsome and expensive a brochure to scatter promiscuously, but to any one thinking of making a home near Chicago, or of investing money there in real estate, it will be sent free by addressing The Harvey Land Association, 825 The Rookery, Chicago, Ill., mentioning this paper.

SOMETHING FOR BABIES.

What is the most precious something for babies?

Health!

This comprises everything joyful in the baby's life.

But how can this one thing needful be gained?

Not by medicine,—simply and solely by using the proper food. The physician often prescribes lactated food instead of medicine; the nurse recommends it for her babies; while experienced mothers urge their friends to use this pure and simple food.

There is nothing secret about lactated food. It is prepared from wheat and barley, combined with sugar of milk and the necessary bone-forming elements. As a result, lactated food saves babies' lives, and gives them health and happiness.

Druggists everywhere sell lactated food, or it will be sent by mail on receipt of price. It is the most economical food known, a 25 cent can making ten pints of prepared food.

Publisher's Notes.

REMEMBER

That on September 15, THE UNION SIGNAL will be devoted to the interests of the World's W C T U.

The special number of THE UNION SIGNAL now being prepared for this memorial day, will excel all previous "special numbers."

Order early!

Order it to show outsiders what the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is doing in all nations!

Order it because strength at home will be increased by the knowledge of respect and admiration abroad!

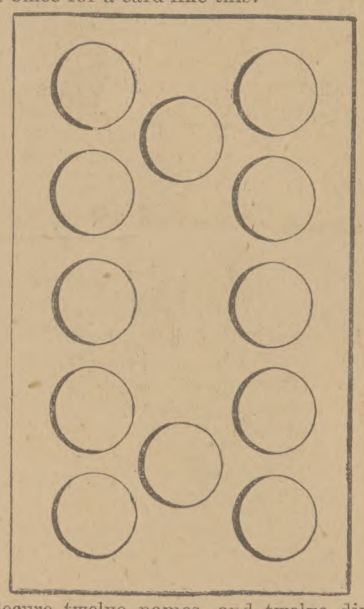
A MEMENTO.

Readers of THE UNION SIGNAL who were interested in the memorial number commemorating the life and services of Madam Willard will be pleased to know that we have a very fine photograph of that venerable lady, copies of which can be secured for 25 cents each.

We will add this to our list of photographs which can be secured through service rendered in securing subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL. See notice elsewhere.

THIS IS THE WAY

To secure a photograph of Madam Willard or any of our National leaders: send to this office for a card like this:



Secure twelve names and twelve dimes from among your friends or the people whom you know—we will send these cards to all who desire them—and forward the same to this office with the request that THE UNION SIGNAL be sent to the persons whose names are given for one month, then select one of the cabinet photographs of our leaders (see catalogue) and it will be sent without charge. This offer is to apply to any person, young or old. Address,

THE JUNIOR PARTNERS.

FACT is admitted by all that the people want books, and the supply is constantly increasing. But good books should be carefully selected.

We have something new to offer—something good. It is new in design, new in its method and a new production.

It is a decidedly interesting book, and everybody should read it. As soon as presented the demand for it will be very great. It is not only interesting, but helpful. It will arouse thought which must result in the formation of temperance sentiment.

Here is a chance for you to make money. If you want to know how, address

WOMAN'S TEMP. PUB. ASS'N,
THE TEMPLE,
Chicago, Ill.

FOR THE FAIRS.

This is the time to plan for work for the fairs.

We have the usual large supply of suitable literature for the seed-sowing which can then be done, and of which you should secure a liberal supply.

We have the fair number of THE UNION SIGNAL, with its World's Fair supplement, which should be scattered generally.

And then we have the Automatic Fountain, from which a cool and tasteful drink may be obtained by the thirsty crowds, and from which you can secure the pennies or nickels with which to meet your expenses.

You should send for one or more without delay.

Have you received our terms circular? If not, write and ask for it.

Two penny-a-drink fountains furnished more than 2,900 drinks in one day, in the Chicago post-office. That means more than $29, from which the Chicago Central Union is reaping a benefit.

The Des Moines union will have three fountains on its fair grounds.

There is money in it for your work. Investigate, and prove the truth of this assertion.

ANOTHER OPPORTUNITY.

To superintendents of the Sunday-school department, superintendents of literature, and local officers of the W. C. T. U.

GREETING:

As you well know, the demand for the May 22 Sunday-school temperance lesson was increased over that of January preceding, about 180,000 copies being used. This, however, is only a foundation for the work that is to be, and it should now be our first thought to extend to others not yet reached the benefits to be derived from these lessons.

The lesson for Sunday, September 25, is now ready. It is on "The Lord's Supper Profaned." Excellent opportunity is here offered to emphasize the principle of the use of unfermented wine at the sacrament, and this question has been raised so as to awaken thought. The lesson is beautifully illustrated and will do great good. Now is the time to send in orders. The following liberal terms are offered:

For 100, 65 cents; 500, $2.75; 1,000, $5. This includes postage, which has been added so as to avoid mistakes. The Young Crusader and the lesson will be sent on the following terms: For 100, $1; 500, $4.75; 1,000, $9; 2,000, $15; 5,000, $35; 8,000, $48. All orders between numbers named at the rate immediately preceding.

Signal Notes.

Public opinion in Canada grows stronger each year in favor of prohibition.

There are fourteen thousand grog-shops and fourteen thousand police in London.

The Montreal Daily News is said to refuse all advertisements of liquors and tobacco.

Last year five million dollars was netted by the proprietors of the Monte Carlo gambling tables.

At a recent dog show a sign was placed over the door, "No smoking allowed here. It will hurt the dogs."

In London there is an increasingly large number of inquests over young women whose death is clearly due to alcoholic excess.

Eighty thousand chests of opium are annually shipped from India to China. Every four grains will send the strongest man unaccustomed to its use to his death.

The Silent Mission of Lynn, Mass., accomplishes a good work among unfortunate women by giving them a temporary home and carrying on several branches of work among them.

If it is true that a mammoth syndicate of brewers is to be organized in Chicago which will embrace the interests of twenty-eight breweries, there will surely be no danger of a beer famine.

Less than thirty years ago the first college for women was founded. Now over forty thousand young women are studying in different colleges, and several thousand have graduated with honor.

According to Max O'Rell, the two most flourishing businesses in London are those of beer and old clothes. The publicans and pawnbrokers are the princes of trade, one being the consequence of the other.

Queen Christina is bringing her influence to bear against the national pastime of bull-fighting, but with little effect as yet, as over sixteen thousand people are spectators in the arena at Madrid every Sunday.

The Brewers' Journal for July published a list of sales during the years from 1885 to 1892 in the different states. Maine was not in the list, and still prohibition does not prohibit, according to some people and papers.

The French are waging war on the sale of indecent books and pictures. The court recently condemned an offender to fifteen months' imprisonment and a fine. Eight hundred thousand photographs had been circulated by him and his assistant.

Kansas with prohibition and one hundred thousand more people than Texas has one penitentiary and nine hundred and ninety-six prisoners. Texas with saloons and one hundred thousand less people than Kansas, has two penitentiaries and three thousand convicts.

If figures are correct then less than one-fifth of the population of Chicago are of native American birth. With over four hundred thousand Germans, and almost as many Irish, it is no wonder that beer flows freely, and that a Christian observance of the Sabbath is not general.

The Boys' Brigade, organized in Glasgow in 1884, to promote reverence, self-respect and a Christian manliness among boys, has seventy five companies in this country. Military organization and drill are the means used to secure an interest in the Bible classes and missionary societies organized among them.

Good Cooking

Is one of the chief blessings of every home. To always insure good custards, puddings, sauces, etc., use Gail Borden "Eagle" Brand Condensed Milk. Directions on the label. Sold by your grocer and druggist.

Examine the new oil cloth on the kitchen floor; its color and gloss are being destroyed and you may see where a cake of common soap fresh from the hot water in the scrubbing bucket has been laid on it for a moment, the free alkali having eaten an impression of the cake into the bright colors.

A more careful examination will show small "pin holes" here and there where the alkali has cut through the surface to soak into and gradually weaken the whole floor covering.

This is what cheap soaps and washing powders do.

Professor Cornwall, of Princeton, says of the Ivory Soap, "It will not injure the most delicate fabrics."

WHAT A LOT MEANS IN HARVEY

A building lot in Harvey means something more than so many square feet of the earth's surface

It means a home in a moral, industrious temperance community, with schools and churches already established and well supported

It means water from artesian wells, streets paved and macadamized, sidewalks planked, trees planted, perfect drainage, and a share in public parks and boulevards.

It means citizenship in the most progressive, fastest growing, and best known manufacturing town of two years growth in America.

It means nearness to thirteen great hives of industry every one of which is bound to give preference, in employing help, to residents of Harvey.

It is these conditions which have given to lots in Harvey an intrinsic value, and prospective advance enjoyed by no other suburban property around Chicago.

BUT—

These conditions apply only to lots deeded by the Harvey Land Association. Lots in so-called "additions," no matter by whom or by what advertised, are outside of Harvey, and outside of the peculiar privileges which have made Harvey famous in every State of the Union.

It is easy to make a serious mistake in this particular; but you can just as easily avoid it by opening correspondence direct with the Harvey town builders themselves:

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

More than 10,000 men are now working on the World's Fair buildings.

Two vessels were lost in Lake Michigan last week and over thirty persons drowned.

President Harrison has written a formal letter accepting the presidential nomination.

German authorities have announced that Russian emigrants will no longer be permitted to pass through Germany.

The retaliation canal bill of twenty cents a ton against Canadian steamers passing through United States locks, went into effect September 3.

A Danish expedition has returned to Iceland, after passing the summer in Greenland. Satisfactory scientific results have already been achieved.

George William Curtis, the eminent editor and author, died August 31, at his country home in Livingston, L. I., and his body was given a quiet interment on September 2.

The cholera epidemic increases in foreign cities. No genuine case has been reported in the United States, but a vessel from Hamburg landed in New York, August 31, after burying at sea twenty-two passengers whose death resulted from a sickness similar to cholera. The strictest quarantine has been ordered by President Harrison. All vessels coming from cholera-infected ports will be quarantined for twenty days, and all others from foreign ports, whether infected or not, will be subject to the closest scrutiny and most thorough disinfection. This will effectively stop all immigration.

MRS. ROUNDS, state president of Illinois, has just issued her annual letter to the sixteen thousand white-ribboners composing the membership of the W. C. T U. in the prairie state. We believe it would be most helpful if every state president would thus send out a letter to her constituency.

MISS MARY ALLEN WEST was not able to sail for Japan, August 27, as announced in our previous issue, because the steamer Empress of Japan, in which she had engaged passage, was laid up in Vancouver, B. C., for repairs, necessitated by a serious fire experienced at sea, August 10-12. Fifty tons of cargo were destroyed by the fire, but so perfect was the discipline and so relentless the fighting of the flames that there was no panic on board and the ship was saved from serious damage. It was expected that the vessel would sail August 31.

IN respect to the practicability of having some brief speeches from distinguished men and women given by phonograph at the Denver convention, Mrs. Higgins, president of the W. C. T. U. of Colorado, writes. "Mrs. Buchtel, wife of the former pastor of Trinity church, talked to her Sunday-school class (the infant class) in the main auditorium by phonograph. All heard and when the superintendent asked if they could tell who was speaking to them they said, 'Oh, yes, that was Mrs. Buchtel,' so that there will be no trouble in reproducing, but the speech ought to be made originally in quite a loud voice."

WE are asked whether we think it is wrong to hold other meetings than church services in a church edifice. We certainly believe that in this day of a wider hearthstone for the human race, and a greater devotion to the cause of human brotherhood, very many services may be held in the church that were not even thought of in other days. We find that college exercises are held in churches that will not admit a temperance meeting, and the pipe of peace is smoked in the pulpit itself, which is going farther than we should advocate. If we were ministers we should welcome every good cause and good person to our pulpit, and we should give a large and liberal interpretation to the word "good" in this connection.

ON the ferry boats running between Philadelphia and Camden, smoking is prohibited, not only in the ladies' cabin, but everywhere on the boat, and this prohibition is strictly enforced. That this is no small matter will be appreciated when it is remembered that these boats, besides their local traffic, carry hundreds of thousands of passengers on their way to the seaside, New York and other points. The ferry company deserves the thanks and support of all who believe that tobacco users do not hold by inherent right sole possession of the world, but that those to whom tobacco is offensive also have some rights on this mundane sphere.

THE roll of the National Temperance Hospital nurses now has two names of decidedly Oriental flavor. They are Natsu Sakaki and Hisa Nagano, the former from Tokio and the latter from Kyogo, Japan. They left Yokohama August 7, reached San Francisco August 21 and started immediately for Chicago, the latter part of the journey being taken alone. They are both graduates of a Japanese college, speak good English and are very ambitious to perfect themselves in the profession of nursing and a knowledge of non-alcoholic remedies, so as to help spread temperance practice as well as principles in the land of the rising sun. They came through the influence of Miss Mary F. Denton, a Congregational missionary in Kioto and the W. C. T. U. of Japan, and will be under the special charge of the temperance women of Chicago while in this city, which will probably be two or three years.

IT is reported that a "criminal expert" scouts the idea that to destroy drunkenness would tend to lessen crime. We have profound respect for the knowledge and opinions of "experts" in whatever line, but in this particular instance we are forced to the position of Galileo, who, when the astronomers of his day refused to look through his telescope and attempted to prove by metaphysical reasoning that only the five previously observed planets could exist, replied that "while these arguments might have force beforehand in inducing us to think that no more planets existed, they were hardly sufficient to annihilate those which were actually seen to exist." So no amount of "scouting" on the part of however many "experts" is able to annihilate the evidence afforded by the comparatively empty jails of prohibition Maine, Kansas, Iowa, South Dakota, and numerous prohibition counties and cities, nor can it destroy the police records of the world with their black lists of crimes committed by drunken madmen.

THE general convention of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America, composed of about four hundred delegates, and representing a membership of sixty thousand men and about six thousand women, met in Indianapolis last month. Miss Lodie E. Reed, Mrs. R. Loftin, Miss Mary G. Hay, and Mrs. E. F. Ritter, all of Indianapolis, were cordially recognized as fraternal delegates from the National W. C. T. U., and given seats on the platform—the convention standing while they were introduced. Miss Reed read a letter of greeting from Miss Willard, and supplemented the reading with a few well-chosen remarks, to all of which the assembly responded with enthusiastic applause. Letters from many high Catholic officials were read, notably that of Archbishop Ireland, all full of sympathy and blessing for the holy cause of temperance. Archbishop Elder of Cincinnati said, "You are doing God's work, go right forward—you can't fail." Woman's help was given broader recognition two years ago, by the election of Miss Sallie Moore, of Philadelphia, third vice-president. Miss Moore is a Prohibitionist. Miss Mary I Cramsee, of St. Paul, was elected this year. Miss Cramsee read an admirable paper on "Temperance in the Home and School," and with Mrs. D. O. Wilbur did good work on the committee on resolutions. A large increase in the number of woman's societies was reported.

A ROYAL Commission appointed by the Dominion Parliament, Canada, to obtain data concerning the effects of the liquor traffic upon all interests, the measures which have been adopted in all countries concerning the traffic, the results of these measures, and the effect that a prohibitory liquor law would have in Canada, began its investigations last June. The Commission has thus far had sittings in several different cities, and witnesses have been subpœnaed from the surrounding territory. As was to be expected, the testimony concerning the enforcement of the present law is conflicting, the "antis," as usual, trying to make it appear that more liquor is sold under prohibitory laws than under any other system. But these definite results have already been reached: First, the testimony is entirely harmonious concerning the effect of the drinking habit upon working men; employers without exception engage total abstainers whenever it is possible. Second, prohibition will not prohibit unless the law is enforced. Third, "Local option is too local and too optional"; only national prohibition can be more than a very limited success. As well expect to successfully protect human life by leaving murder to a system of local option as to expect satisfactory results from a similar policy towards the liquor traffic.

GENERAL JOHN BIDWELL, prohibition standard-bearer in the coming elections, in his recent letter of acceptance, appeals to the strongest and finest sentiments of the American people. Its best effect should be to unite all classes of temperance men to vote solidly in November against all parties that directly or indirectly protect the liquor traffic. He reviews the prohibition platform as follows: "There are well-founded apprehensions that this nation which we love—this mighty empire of sovereign states—cannot survive unless redeemed from the dangers that jeopardize its existence, prominent among which is that immeasurable evil, the monstrous liquor traffic. It is an unmitigated and measureless evil, without a redeeming feature. The old parties, controlled as they are by the liquor power and by vast monopolistic and other influences, dare not even propose, much less seriously purpose to overthrow the saloon. . . . The family is the unit of government, and Christian America should no longer degrade woman by withholding from her the right of suffrage. Our women know what the ballot is and its power; they are, as a class, intelligent, virtuous, self-reliant, womanly. If we delay, England will take the lead in the emancipation of woman. The nation that first gives woman equal rights with man will earn a crown of imperishable glory. . . . An income tax can do no injustice, work no opposition, for where there is no income there will be nothing to pay; the rich will pay most, and the poor least or nothing. . . . Whatever powers own and control the railways of the United States, associated as they are with other great monopolistic interests, will have it within their sway virtually to own and control the government. For such considerations transportation must be controlled—owned, if necessary—by the government of the United States. . . . A knowledge of the national language, so far as to read and write the same fairly well, should, in addition to good moral character, be made a condition of naturalization and the inestimable right of suffrage. The demand is therefore imperative that means of education be provided at the public expense and placed within the reach of every child in the nation. . . . In order to relieve the labor of the country of its abnormal and often congested condition, there should be the earliest possible revision and restriction of the immigration and naturalization laws of the United States. In a wide sense, all who pursue useful occupations, professions or callings are laborers. Labor creates the wealth of the country. Without labor there can be no development of resources, no national prosperity. The liquor traffic robs, impoverishes and demoralizes labor, thereby sapping the very foundations of the national fabric. The discord between capital and labor cannot safely be allowed to continue."

TRUE HEROISM.

BY EMMA PLAYTER SEABURY.

There are some things I long for so each day—
Mayhap of joy, or sympathy, or pure and high Ideals to live by; heights to climb alway,
And helping hands to reach them, by and by.
Some one to see in art, or song, or play,
Or books the precious thoughts that I espy—
A soul, whose loving instinct cannot stray,
Or judge me harshly, wheresoe'er I fly.
It takes more strength of patience and more grace
To keep from growing bitter hearts that ache
When rude feet crowd us in a thorny place,
Or rough hands jostle, than it does to make
One grand, heroic effort, and to face
The martyr's briefer torture at the stake.

SOME PASSAGES IN THE PRACTICE OF DR. MARTHA SCARBOROUGH.

BY HELEN CAMPBELL.

CHAPTER IV.

The old Squire sat on the porch of the square, white house which had been the Templeton homestead for four generations. His pipe was out, his paper had fallen to the floor, and under the shadow of the woodbine which ran over the porch, he sat nodding yet still erect, for that was the Templeton way. A mane of white hair covered the handsome head, and softened the deep pink of the old face which flushed to deep red on sudden exertion, or in moments of excitement. At such times, it was currently reported, the dark eyes gave out sparks of fire, and the voice was as the roar of many waters.

"You'd think to hear him," remarked Simeon Bassett, the hired man, one evening in the village store, "that there wasn't two minutes between you and going straight to execution. But it don't take you long to find out he's mild as milk inside."

"'Tain't always so," replied a voice from the rear. "There's more stories than you could shake a stick at, of the things them Templetons has done. I tell you, Templeton temper ain't any joke when once it's up in earnest. Why, the Squire's father drove him out with a pitchfork, they say, when he was sent home from college for a year, suspended for some rinkum or other, you know; and there's worse things than that told about 'em all the way back."

"Likely enough," Bassett returned indifferently. "I wouldn't say the Templeton temper was just what you'd call lamb-like, but they're good-hearted, every soul of 'em, and there ain't nothin' they won't do for folks in trouble. There's a kind of spell on 'em; that's what's the matter, and they're pretty much run out. Johnny, that poor little spindly thing, he's the last of the name, an' every time he has a fit, the Squire comes pretty near havin' one too, he feels so bad. They've given him gallons of bitters first an' last, but there ain't nothin' seems to do any good."

"What's the use of Dr. Scarborough havin' the name he has the whole country through, if he can't cure a child like that?" the storekeeper said, and Bassett pointed up to the row of shelves at the end, where dozens of bottles of patent medicine were ranged in order, but as the old Squire at this moment appeared, made no further comment till he had asked for another bottle and left the store.

"I tell you them bitters is out an' out poison," he said with a slow shake of the head. "The doctor has analyzed 'em many a time; bad whisky, the worst kind, molasses, and some herb oil or other for flavor, an' that's the kind of stuff the women take for an appetite, an' that they pour into that young one till he might float in what he's swallered. I don't wonder it riles the doctor."

"You'd better set up in his place," the storekeeper said with scorn, such talk being clearly against the interests of his trade; and Bassett went his way to report to Miss Malvina in passing that Johnny had begun on another bottle.

It was meditation on this as well as on what her father had said, that had determined Dr. Martha upon immediate action; and now as the old Squire looked up, he saw the small figure coming steadily up the steep pitch between the house and main road, and smiled as he watched her intent and resolute little face.

"Something new in her head," he thought. "She's old as her father, this minute. Well, Dr. Martha, what's up now?"

He drew her between his knees as he spoke, with a sigh for the child hardly older, who lay with others in the row of small graves shadowed by the Templeton monument. He loved children. Why could not his own have lived?

"It's about Johnny," Dr. Martha replied, resolutely. "And it's about horses, too. What I want to know is what you think about them both. Wait a minute and I'll tell you," she went on, for the old Squire's eyes had opened in amazement. "You see I found out a good while ago that people have to do things for horses if they want to sell them, or even have them good for anything to plow and such things, you know. It's like the old Greeks that were the most beautiful people in all the world, and everything they left was so beautiful, that now everybody keeps studying it to find out their ways. I know, because my father told me, you know, and showed me pictures. They were rubbed and bathed and oiled, and lots of other things to make them strong and beautiful, and it did. I suppose the trouble is nobody here knows about the Greeks, but only about horses. Now, why can't you do some of those things to Johnny? My father said the Greeks had sublime common sense, and he said Johnny could be cured with common sense."

If Dr. Martha had looked up at that moment she would have seen a flush overspread the face above her, but no word came, and she went on.

"Bitters and things aren't any use. Did you know that? It's baths and to be rubbed and oiled and have to run and do all kinds of things in the warm sun and eat just the right things. And Aunt Malvina said Johnny wouldn't eat anything but mustard pickle and preserved ginger one day, and had hot crullers in bed and so much bitters he was half boozy, but she didn't tell me what that was. But I want Johnny to be cured, for he knows more than all the other little boys, and there won't be any more Templetons if he dies, Simeon says. You see it's partly because all his grandfathers drank a great deal of toddy, my father says—"

"Great Jehosaphat!" returned the Squire, but under his breath, for Dr. Martha's serious eyes were fixed on his face with no thought of consequences, and he felt a curious compulsion that, in spite of himself, held him silent till all was said.

"I don't know exactly now because I'm not old enough," Dr. Martha went on, "but my father says I shall understand when I begin to be a doctor. He understands everything, you know, and he says toddy is worse for your grandchildren than for you, because every fresh set, you know, have had some of their nerves stolen from them, and cannot get strong unless somebody understands and gives them things to eat that will make all the nerves over again. Did you know they could be made over again? There is hardly anything that can't be made over again—partly, anyway, if only you begin in time, and so I want you to lend us Johnny for a good while and let us see if we can't cure him."

"Did your father send you up here to say all this?"

The old Squire's voice was so hoarse that Dr. Martha looked up in surprise, growing deeper as she looked at the swollen veins in his forehead and saw the flush on his face.

"Oh, no," she said, with such simplicity that he could not doubt her. "But he talks about it because I like to play with Johnny, and he isn't well enough very often, you know; and then he always talks to me about things and if I don't understand he says it's no matter, for some day it will all come up. When I am bigger, you know, and study things, then all at once I shall remember that, a good while ago, he said just that very thing. Did you know that every word was a little picture in your head, I mean on the brain? I saw a picture of one once. It is very strange to think how full it must be of things, and the worst of it is, you can't quite alter any of them when once they are made, and so you have to be very particular to make very nice ones, you know."

"Great Jehosaphat!" the Squire said again, and then sat silent. Suppose the stuff were true? Suppose they were killing Johnny? Suppose Templeton blood could have a chance still? The doctor was full of notions, but some of them worked well. At least he would talk it over after he had thought awhile, and he put his finger under Dr. Martha's chin and lifted it till he had looked once more into her clear eyes, and decided it was not a "put up job."

"Run home, little one," he said gently, "and I will think it over," and he kissed the soft cheek before he let her go.

"I talked to the old Squire about Johnny," Dr. Martha said the next morning as she sat by her father's side in the buggy. "I told him about too much toddy, and that if he would let us have Johnny awhile, I was sure you could cure him, and he is thinking about it."

The doctor shook for a moment in silence, then turned upon her a serious face. "So you have taken the case in hand?" he said. "What did the old Squire think about it?"

"He looked queer some of the time, but he said he would think about it, after he had asked me if you sent me, and I said, 'no.'"

Once more Dr. Scarborough turned away his face and his broad shoulders shook, but Dr. Martha, intent on the reins, saw nothing else, and both fell into silence. But as they drove homeward, the old Squire came out, and with a curious look on his face, said slowly:

"Come up after dinner, Doctor, and we will talk over this transfer your partner wants to have made."

So it happened, that for Dr. Martha, an experience that shaped much of her after life began almost unwittingly, as has many a time been the case for older folk than she. The old Squire went for a long promised visit to some California cousins who lived on a fruit farm he had himself taken for a bad debt years before, and always meant to see. The maiden aunt, who had never been outside Linborough, prepared for the change as if it were a transfer to another sphere, and Johnny Templeton turned a new page in his life, the first one on which the word health had ever had even its first letter written, and found himself in a stranger country than even his elders were to know.

FINANCE.

BY GRACE M. KIMBALL.

The time has been when finance and all it implies was supposed to belong exclusively to the realm of the masculine mind, and sometimes the wife and mother was not expected to understand enough of these weightier matters to buy her own clothes or those of her children, and there have been cases in which a wife and mother has passed years without ever holding five dollars of her own in her hand. Yet in this state of affairs and with these ideas carried so far that women were supposed to need but little education, the Scriptures have been plain in teaching lessons that are not in accord with such ideas or practices.

The man of wisdom, Solomon, places before us in his Proverbs the picture of a model woman. He begins by asking "who can find a virtuous woman, for her price is far above rubies?" then he goes on to enumerate the different virtues that go to make up this grand, model woman—one of these is a good understanding of financial matters. "She considereth a field and buyeth it, and with the fruit of her hands she planteth a vineyard." This model woman, on her own judgment, after careful consideration, buys a field, and, further, after having bought it, does not turn it over to her husband and say, "You must look after this field, I know not if corn, hay or fruit be most profitable; that is for you to decide." No! "With the fruit of her hands," with her own earnings, "she planteth a vineyard"; she considered before the purchase of the field to what use it should be put; further still, not only was she capable of buying real estate and improving it, but she also understood the manufacturing business. "She maketh fine linen and selleth it, and delivereth girdles to the merchants"; she transacted her own business and employed no agent.

"And did not this life of business and knowledge of finance unsex her?" asks with bated breath Mr. Conservative of the present day. Solomon thought not, for he said, "Many daughters have done virtuously, but thou excellest them all." "She openeth her mouth with wisdom and in her tongue is the law of kindness."

The ability of this woman added honor to her husband "he is known in the gates when he sitteth among the elders of the land." A knowledge of business and finance made this woman more complete, more independent, better known, more able to assist the poor, and those in want; "yea, she reacheth forth her hands to the needy"; more respected by husband and children; "her children arise up and call her blessed, her husband also, and he praiseth her."

Women in the present day should study this last chapter of Proverbs, for it is going to be ours; we are going to have more to do with the finances of nation, state, city and home during the years of the coming century. In a certain way, we have been working along financial lines in the past, such as getting up lunches and dinners, and making crazy quilts, and pin-cushions for fairs, to pay off church debts contracted by the brethren. But we are coming up to higher financial ground. Young women are taking the place of men at the cashier's desk, even in establishments where the trade is solely to men.

Why is this? Because women are more honest, more reliable, more trustworthy in the handling of money. And why are they so? Because they do not smoke and drink, and lower their moral natures by vices, until they see no wrong in falsifying and dishonesty. Many women are now engaged in trade, and are successfully carrying on various lines of business, and are proving themselves as well qualified to have the care of a dollar, after having earned it, as their brother, husband, or son.

One thing has for many years stood in the way of woman proving to the world her capabilities on financial lines. Solomon in the last verse of the last chapter of Proverbs, orders this thing taken out of the way; he says "Give her of the fruit of her hands, and let her own works praise her in the gates."

Woman has been denied the fruit of her hands, she has labored patiently for years with not a penny to show for it; therefore she has had no means, nor chance to show what she could do, and then has heard the remark: "Women have no financial ability."

If the husband of this model woman had persisted in taking the proceeds of her linen and girdles, how could she have shown her good judgment in buying a field?

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is a progressive organization, and we ought to educate ourselves into the judicious way of expending our money. "She considereth a field"; consideration then is one of the first things to be observed. We should not conduct our financial matters without thought; in a multitude of counsel there is safety; we should counsel together that we may act wisely and command the respect of the business world; we should counsel together that we may do the most efficient work with the outlay of the least money, for the amount of work for us to do is almost endless, but the dollars are few and hard to get.

Oakland, Cal.

"EXACTLY!"

Ex-Governor St. John, in the great tariff discussion on July 29, at Lake Monona, Wis., with Gov. McKinley of Ohio, and Henry Watterson of Louisville, made a memorable speech. It is a great electric search-light for every voter's consideration. Blind party idolatry should shrivel to ashes in the testing heat of such utterances as the following:

The Democrat and Republican parties have had control of this nation for at least a generation past, meantime have had the power to make and unmake constitutions and laws—in other words, to do whatsoever they pleased,—and it is but fair play now to say that these two old parties are entitled to the credit for all that is good in civil government to-day.

On the other hand, giving them credit for all that is good, it is equally fair and just to charge these two old parties with all that is bad in civil government to-day, and upon this basis I propose to try them before this jury.

In 1863, when under Democratic and Republican rule, our government went into partnership with the liquor traffic, the amount of intoxicating liquors consumed equalled but 2 59-100 gallons per capita of the population. From that time until 1891, under the fostering care of these two old parties, the consumption continued to grow until it equals 15 57-100 gallons for each man, woman and child in the United States. The question I propound to you, Democrats and Republicans is this, how long will it take to get rid of this home and soul-destroying evil at this rate?

At the close of 1889 we found in this nation 171,369 retail liquor houses. At the close of 1890 the number had grown to 196,710. At the close of 1891 it reached 240,797. In other words we find that the liquor traffic has grown more rapidly than during any other three years of the nation's history. Did you ever think, fathers and mothers, what 240,797 saloons mean? Stand them up side by side, allowing twenty feet front to each, and it gives us a row of Democratic and Republican liquor houses 920 miles long. What a legacy for these old parties to leave to the generations that shall come after them! ["Shame."] You say Democratic and Republican saloons? Yes. Why? Because behind every saloon counter in this nation to-day stands a Democrat or Republican.

I belong to a political party in whose ranks there cannot be found a single distiller, brewer or saloon-keeper. It is a pretty decent party for a father to belong to. A party that a man will never have any reason to be ashamed of. [Applause.]

I want to call your attention to the fact that according to the statistics gathered from the various health departments of the several states and territories in 1891, one hundred and fifty thousand lives was the penalty paid for the perpetuation of this Democratic and Republican policy.

I now want to ask you Democrats and Republicans a question. It is this: In view of the fact that this awful evil is legalized and perpetuated under Democratic and Republican rule, and in view of the further fact that the Democratic and Republican parties are perpetuated by Democratic and Republican votes, I want you to tell me of one single blessing from the foundation of the world down to the present time that ever came from the saloon system. I propound the question for the purpose of getting at the truth, and if the Prohibition party cannot stand upon the truth, let it go down, as every party deserves to go down, that dares not face God Almighty's eternal truth. [Applause.]

Citizens, Democrats and Republicans, if I was a member of a party that had for a generation perpetuated a business that sends misery, poverty, crime and heartache broadcast among the people, and destroyed one hundred and fifty thousand lives annually, and I could not tell of a single blessing that ever came from that business, and the party would not at once raise the black flag on the infamous traffic, and put forth every effort in its power to suppress it, God helping me I would get out of a party of that kind and join a party that would do it. [Applause.]

May God hasten the time when you may realize the fact that we are one people, under one flag, and should stand together for the welfare of all the homes of this nation. [Applause.]

What would I do? I would blot out the liquor traffic; elect United States Senators and President by a direct vote of the people; place all railway and telegraph lines under the absolute control of the general government, to be operated at cost, as our postal system is, in the interest of all the people; all money to be issued directly by the government, and a national interest law, limiting the rate to the net annual profits of agriculture and labor, and as one of the surest and greatest aids in bringing about these and many other important reforms, I would enfranchise women.

DRESS REFORM FROM WOMAN'S STANDPOINT.

"And he cut her petticoat round about—
. . . . . .
Lauk-a-mercy on my soul! this is none of I!
If this be I, as I hope I be,
I have a little dog at home and he will know me.
If it be I he will wag his little tail—
If it be not I he'll loudly bark and wail."

SLAVERY.

I would have dress a servant of the wearer, not a ruler.

"WHO WOULD BE FREE THEMSELVES MUST STRIKE THE BLOW."

There is no one thing that would do so much to emancipate women as the adoption of short, simple skirts.

New York City. JENNIE JUNE.

DISEASE? TOO TOUGH TO DIE.

Six new diseases, we are told, have come into existence with the styles of dress which require the wearing of multitudinous and heavy skirts. Indeed, I wonder that there are not sixty. No doctrine but the doctrine of the "survival of the fittest" will touch the problem. We are of tougher stuff than our brothers, or we should have sunk in our shackles long ago.

CULMINATING FOLLY.

Bad as stays and high heels and low dresses and all the other follies of dress are, I am of the opinion that the culminating folly of fashion, which has most widespread and durable consequences, is the mode in which for ages back women have contrived that their skirts should act as swaddling clothes, weighing down their hips and obstructing the natural motion of the legs.

ORGANIZATIONS ACT.

The Business Committee of the National Council of Women in its annual meeting at the Palmer House, Chicago, May 9 and 10, 1892, unanimously adopted the following:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Executive Committee of the National Council of Women of the United States that the health boards of Hungary and Austria have set a true key-note for dress reform by urging that legislation be had to prevent the wearing of long skirts upon the street, in view of the fact that such skirts gather up poisonous material from the filth of the streets and thus endanger the public health.

This Council also decided to send the symposium on dress, which had been prepared by its special committee, to the Arena, and the September number of this most redemption-tending magazine publishes it.

The National W. C. T. U. at Boston, 1891, passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That we deprecate and protest against any fashion in dress which interferes with the highest physical development; also that we favor the enactment of state laws requiring physical and industrial training to become a part of the public school system.

"EMANCIPATION DAY" FOR WOMEN TO BE APPOINTED.

It now seems probable that within a few years every woman will feel at liberty, socially as well as physically, to wear comfortable and convenient garments, whenever and wherever she chooses.

The new dress-reform movement has no one "leader." Every woman who has expressed dissatisfaction with those features of woman's dress which injure her health or dehumanize her appearance or interfere with her free activity, has helped to lead up to the present possibility.

The movement, as now undertaken, has a few distinguishing points: First. Though aiming at a radical reform, it asks no one to start out alone, or to make herself conspicuous on account of singularity of dress. Second, Though seeking to make so common as to attract no attention and excite no remark, a dress that will give freedom to both upper and lower limbs, it makes no effort to banish long skirts entirely. Let women secure the freedom to wear a reasonable working and walking costume whenever and wherever they like, and long skirts will confine themselves mainly to tidy rooms, carriages and hours of ease.

To avoid unpleasant personal notoriety or individual social martyrdom, it is proposed to appoint, when enough women seem ready, a day of general emancipation. If great numbers of women appear in unusual costume simultaneously, they can easily capture the situation, and break the force of the strongest objection to a reasonable dress for women—its oddity and the discomfort of being conspicuous. It is another demand for exercise of the golden rule, to do something, for which perhaps no personal need is felt "for others' sake," for the sake of working girls, of hard working women. Unborn children demand that this heavy burden of woman's useless toggery should be lifted from off the human race, that all coming generations may have a better chance to be well born, a better opportunity for "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness." Why delay?

This movement is religious and patriotic. Though really a great revolution, with far-reaching results, it can be speedily accomplished when once the idea of concerted action takes possession of the majority of women. Remember no one is called upon to step out alone and "set an example," by striking oddity in her own apparel. It is a work of self-emancipation for every woman, but one in which "all are needed by each one."

St. Paul, Minn. FRANCES E. RUSSELL.

THE SECRET OF THE LILIES.

Mrs. Hannah Whitall Smith, in a Bible Reading on "The Secret of the Lilies," deals with our inward clothing, the dress of the soul. All women should read and appropriate that leaflet, which will bring our minds into proper condition to take up the study as it relates to the clothing of the outward body. To "consider the lilies, is certainly to note how perfect is their attire, pure, simple, beautiful no family among the flowers is more wonderfully clothed. They grow according to God's plan, and, as if they were sure no plan of their own could be as good or beautiful, they drink the dew of heaven and bow to the storms that come.

Some one has said, "If the head and throat are becomingly attired, it makes little difference about the rest of the dress"; but the return to long dresses on the street is most discouraging to those who rejoiced in the convenient short costume that prevailed long enough to make the world believe all women had become sensible.

A case of malignant scarlet fever, and beyond hope, recently came to my notice. The mother was in despair; she had been an overfond and devoted mother to this only boy. Anxiously she questioned the doctor as to how the disease could have come to him. She had given up her mission and sewing class lest she might bring home contagion, had not mingled in crowds or allowed her little one to play with other children, the sewerage of the house was perfect, and to her the coming of the disease seemed unaccountable. The doctor said, "Madam, I do not know how your child took the fever, but I trust you love him better than the prevailing fashion of wearing a dress on the street capable of bringing home bacteria of the most virulent character." Does it not seem a strange inconsistency for women who are fighting the foe of intemperance, to follow a fashion which may breed disease and death? Long ago Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes said in "The Professor at the Breakfast Table": "Why there isn't a beast or a bird that would drag its tail through the dirt in the way these creatures do their dresses. Because a queen or a duchess wears long robes on great occasions, a maid-of all-work or a factory girl thinks she must make herself a nuisance by trailing through the street, picking up and carrying about with her—pah! That's what I call getting vulgarity into your bones and marrow. . . . . If any man can walk behind one of these women and see what she rakes up as she goes, and not feel squeamish, he has a tough stomach. I would not let one of 'em into my room without serving 'em as David served Saul at the cave in the wilderness—cut off his skirts, sir! cut off his skirts! . . . . Don't tell me that a true lady ever sacrifices the duty of keeping all about her sweet and clean to the wish to make a vulgar show. . . . There are some things that no fashion has any right to touch, and cleanliness is one of those things."

In dress as in everything else relating to the moral and physical, we ought to commence with the children. I am thankful for the improved clothing of infants. So much real happiness comes from freedom of limb to enter into all sports as well as gymnastic exercises, that if we can teach children they are never to outgrow this freedom, and be put into tight, cumbersome clothing, a reform in dress will, of necessity, be brought about. I have great hope for the future from the healthful dressing of the children of to-day. Babyhood is a valuable magazine for the use of mothers. FRANCES J. BARNES.

"VENGEANCE IS MINE"—FOR AN OUTRAGED LAW OF PERSON.

The modern aspect of dress reform is quite interesting to a student of sociology. Reforms of the past have been largely led by three great classes. Men have, as a rule, called attention to the follies, frivolities, absurdities and expense of dress. Ridicule has been heaped upon what is termed the weaker sex because of their adherence to the particular fashion of the day, with little or no attempt to address them as reasonable human beings, whom argument could reach. The second great class have appealed to women solely on the score of health. These appeals have been made both by men and women. It has been demonstrated by these reformers past all question, that the different styles of dress deform the body and prevent a proper use of its organs and functions, thereby interfering with the circulation, hindering freedom in action, and bringing about serious organic difficulties.

The third class, principally priests and clergymen, have struck at the vanity of the weaker portion of humanity. They have alleged that the fashions in vogue aim to enhance personal attractions in order to charm and seduce the stronger portion of humanity to the great detriment of their souls.

These appeals to the vanity, the fear, or the weakness of women have had comparatively little effect. The appeal from the health side can be said to have made the deepest impression. The improved undergarments which we are to-day enjoying is largely the outgrowth of a movement which began fifteen or twenty years ago, having for its sole object the improved health of women.

The present reform or improvement (as those most deeply interested in the movement insist upon calling it), is from within, is led by women themselves and demonstrates the wisdom of a higher education for women. With Emerson, they claim that "Beauty is its own excuse for being." With Browning, "If you get beauty and aught else, you get about the best thing God has given." With Cousin, "That the true, the beautiful and the good are synonymous." With Ruskin, "That color, proportion, and use must be considered in the design of everything that would be perfect in the making." With the Bible, "That the law of the Lord is good and perfect altogether." Whatever touches the soul, or whatever emanates from the soul is perforce by means of the body, and that, therefore, the body should not be considered, as it has too often been in the past, perishable, unimportant and wholly degraded, but it should be skillfully trained and developed that it may serve its high use,—the manifestation of a soul.

The dress of men and women was nearly identical in the twelfth century, but as classes became less distinct and men of the so-called upper classes began to take a more active part in the affairs of the world, a radical change took place in dress. The general dropping of the absurd, ugly and useless petticoat during the past three or four years has not received half the abuse that the adoption of the umbrella did in London comparatively few years ago, and who, to-day, would do without an umbrella?

The corset line, as Miss Willard says, is indeed the death line, and in this direction the so-called heathen could teach us a valuable lesson. A gentleman from Constantinople told me that their physicians bitterly opposed the intercourse of their native women with our missionaries for this very reason, and said with justice that they questioned a Christianity which taught as its first lesson a deformity of the body. "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul." Let us study His laws reverently and earnestly and obey them in the least as well as in the greatest. There can be sins committed against the physical as well as sins against the ethical, for "God is seen, God in the star, in the stone, in the flesh, in the soul and the clod."

The only thing that I have to do as an earnest Christian woman is to discover these laws and obey them to the uttermost. If I transgress in the least, "vengeance is mine," saith the Lord, and not only do I pay the penalty of outraged law in my own person, but "the sins of the fathers" and the mothers "shall be visited upon the children of the third and fourth generations." The result of my disobedience with knowledge or without knowledge ends not in me alone, but reaches out and out and influences all with whom I come in contact—is a seed cast into time, which inevitably bears its fruits for the weal or for the woe of mankind.

A MATTER FOR LEGISLATION.

To one who reads his newspaper with a comprehensive eye the inferiority of the female is not a feature of the time. I never go to the circus, but I scan the columns of reports and find that women are among the most ethereal acrobats. I never see a balloon shoot into space from the grounds of a great fair, but I know that among daring balloonists women take high rank. I never go to a race-course, and do not approve it, but by some subtle affinity my eye seeks out the headlines where Nancy Hanks and Maud S. are set forth as the swiftest coursers of the turf. In exploration women have won laurels: Mrs. Lieut. Perry, the wife of Dr. Livingston, of Sir Samuel Baker, Lady Brassey, Florence Marryatt, Lady Duff-Hardy—all these are among the bravest of the brave.

All these illustrate that the earth being the Lord's and the fullness thereof, it is also woman's, whom the Lord loves, and to whom He intends to give her fullest heritage; but the pipe-stem-waisted women will never enter in. They kill God's life, and no one has ever yet done this with impunity, no matter how ignorantly the result was wrought. The deathline in the waist is the deathline of the intellect. They are apostles of the Most High, the dress reformers—Mrs. Annie Jenness-Miller, Mrs. Frank Stuart Parker, and others whom I would gladly mention, who have given their best thought to the betterment of woman in the physical basis of her life, on which the whole superstructure of mind and character must be built up. High heels, narrow shoes, tight collars and tight gloves, and all kinds of corsets are a sin even more than they are a shame in this day of popular education. . . .

We have already legislation concerning the sort of garments that men and women respectively must wear if they would keep outside the rigors of the law. Surely, if men proposed to walk the streets with coat skirts trailing six or eight inches or a foot, the law would deal with them as a monstrosity, and nothing in the world but the newness of the idea would prevent its being recognized as reasonable, to tell women that they shall wear skirts in the street that do not thereby become part and parcel of all its parasitic and expectorant deposits. The law already declares how we must dress to be presentable in public places; let it go a step further and forbid women to mop the streets with trailing dress skirts, or to deform their figures by compression of the floating ribs. If ever there was a legitimate subject of legislation in the interest of public prosperity, public health and public humanity, this is one. . . . . .

It is the belief of dress reformers that nothing would so surely lead to health and happy maternity as clothing that would permit complete freedom of movement. The tragedy of birth will become a comparatively painless sacrament, when women learn to live wisely, insulated in an armor of wool from a thousand dangers of environment, clad in healthful, modest garments, that give full play to heart and lungs and offer no impediment to motion, but invite to exercise and a free life in the sun's vitalizing rays and the beauty of God's great "out doors." . . . "Open air" minds are what we want, not hot-house thinkers. Woman set free in God's great garden of a world will enrich art and poetry and endear religion and bless the children of the future in body and soul far beyond our power to prophesy. . . . . .

After my long day's task with the pen I often say to myself, "If I could put on a hat, button a coat around me and step off freely, how delightful a walk would be." But no; there are intricate preliminaries before a woman can do anything so simple as take a constitutional. . . . A man would have two things to do—put on his coat and crowd a hat over his eyes. A woman has three articles to take off, dress to draw on, collar and cuffs to adjust and pin, shoes to button, wrap to fasten, bonnet to tie, and then—all their burdens and constrictions to endure.

I look at the dress reformers and their new costumes with a prayerful heart, saying, "How long, O Lord, how long." Instead of the walk I would like to take, had I the modest, simple, short dress, loose jacket, and broad-brimmed hat, I pen this jeremiad, and bid Godspeed to the earnest-hearted women who plan for other women a costume that hints of better days. . . . . .

Let us have self-respect. Let us be clothed with a raiment of purity that ought to guard the maid, the mother and the wife. It is the first step that costs. We are all cowards. We know what is right but dare not interfere. In the forests of New England our fathers blazed the trees and hewed out the roads that produced a new civilization. And we are called to do the same in these thick, growing forests of ignorance and prejudice, folly and habitude. "First that which is natural, then that which is spiritual."

Evanston, Ill. FRANCES E. WILLARD.

OUT OF BONDAGE—AT THE COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION??

Come, let us reason together, we nineteenth century women, who pride ourselves upon our advanced civilization, our intellectual growth, our common sense.

In one short year there will come to our shores thousands and tens of thousands of women from foreign lands. They will see at the World's Fair such marvelous things wrought by woman's hands as will cause them to pause in awe and reverence at the mighty strides American women have made within the last decade.

We have reason to be jubilant; we are justly proud of American women; mentally, morally and intellectually they are a noble success: but physically the American woman is not a success. Day after day all through a season of rain, slush and mud, I have witnessed scores of women of wealth and position—followed always by the laboring class—shop girls, clerks, milliners, dressmakers, stenographers, canvassers, trailing their skirts in the filth and mire of the streets. Oh, the pity of it!

Recently I was instrumental in securing a lecture from Mrs. Jenness-Miller before the young women of the Iowa State University. The girls were much aroused, and so earnestly went to work, that in less than forty-eight hours a "Physical Club," based on correct dress, was organized, and twenty-six young women pledged themselves to adopt the rainy day suit.

I was waited upon to appear in a street costume of my own devising, of which one gentleman exclaimed on seeing: "Well, now, that is pretty. Why in the world will women stultify themselves by wearing long, twisting, uncomfortable skirts on the street when they can dress in a style so comfortable and becoming?"

Mrs. Miller expressed much admiration of the frock, which was simply a gray cloth, princess cut, jacket front, full vest, cuffs and collar of silk to match, and high gaiters of the same material as the dress, the skirt about two inches higher than the ordinary boot tops. Oh, the freedom of it! Think of having the use of one's legs as well as one's arms! Is such bliss in store for us?

WHY NOT?

Some of the young women shortened their skirts immediately, for the rain continued daily, and not a man among all the students was heard to disapprove, on the contrary they gave constant encouragement.

One young woman said, after wearing her short dress several days, the rain ceasing, she again went back to the "street sweeper" (the scavenger gown), and a certain bright young fellow thus accosted her:

"Hello! where's your high-water gown?"

"Gone with the rain," she answered, "but I confess I feel less respect for myself than I did in my short skirt."

"And to be candid," replied the student, "I have less respect for you."

Why shall not American women wear the short street suit when they attend the Columbian Exposition? They are going there by the thousands to see, and wish to do their seeing in the greatest comfort and enjoy it to the full. Why should they not seize this most auspicious hour to set the example to the world of a healthful, commonsense, twentieth century street suit? I for one shall free my conscience and my legs by adopting it. Let the opening of the Exposition be the day of revolution. It is the moment of all others for a simultaneous movement of women out of bondage. Let this suit be called the Columbia and it will be more than "a name to conjure by"; it will typify the growing power and perpetuity of a free government, for a true republic can only exist when the mothers of the people are as free in all respects as the fathers.

American women at the Exposition will have no fear of "nervous exhaustion," of "spoiling best clothes," of "sudden showers," of that "dead tiredness" that comes of woman's false manner of dress. This contemplated suit demands a broad toed shoe with a low heel,—any other would spoil the tout ensemble; a corsetless waist and a utility hat, not a bit of extravagant, nonsensical vanity, which costs many a working-woman a week's wages, and many a hard-working man a silent groan as he foots the bill. The skirt of this street suit must be short enough to walk in with no consciousness of resisting drapery and will thereby escape the heels; there is no beauty in a dress which hangs just low enough to be caught in by the heel at every step and which makes the feet look large and clumsy.

The proper thing with this walking suit is a boot-top matching the gown, and meeting it. When the demand for such shoes comes, it will be met; for those who have very slender ankles (which, by the way, a shoe dealer says should be considered a mark of good blood; what man who selects a fine horse but will look for the slender limbs in his steed), there will be the monsquetaire shoe, worn as we wear the glove—wrinkled above the buttons.

Most women will look very attractive in the grays, browns, rich wines, and dark blues composing the coming suit—coat, skirt and gaiters all in harmony.

Wimodaughsis, will you not put on your thinking caps and study this question from its various points of health, economy, justice to the yet unborn, peace of mind to the wearer and join the O. O. B. League?

GOOD-BY TO CALIFORNIA.

(Concluded.)

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—One of the most unique entertainments I ever enjoyed was given at Pacific Grove during the school of methods session. It was not gotten up to entertain, but to teach a lesson—reform needed in our police courts. It taught this lesson so forcibly that no one present can ever forget it, and at the same time proved a most interesting entertainment. It was entitled "Trial by Jury," and admirably illustrated the travesty of justice witnessed in the trial of saloon-keepers for selling liquor to minors. And it was strictly true to life, materials for it having been gathered through months of attendance on police courts by Mrs. French, superintendent of law enforcement (who planned the entertainment) and other San Francisco ladies.

The boy to whom the liquor was sold was the only member of the male persuasion appearing on the scene, judge, jury, defendants, attorneys, policemen, all being women, though each was addressed as "Mr." Mrs. Woodman of Chico, made an admirable judge—for the purpose intended—while Mrs. Spencer, state secretary, as prosecuting attorney, and Mrs. French as attorney for defendant, did equally well. But the hit of the evening was made by Mrs. Carey, National superintendent of Chinese work, as the typical juryman "who don't know nothin.'" How a bright woman could so absolutely withdraw all intelligence from her face, and sit through that trial the personification of stupidity, is a mystery, but she did it.

Impaneling the jury was an impressive object lesson, every respectable, intelligent man being challenged by the defendant's lawyer and the objection, "he has a prejudice against my client's business" being sustained by the judge, so that when secured, the jury consisted of fools and saloon-keepers mostly.

The evidence was overwhelming that the defendant did sell liquor to the boy, and there was no rebutting testimony, except that of the prisoner himself, who was put upon the witness stand and flatly denied every charge. In face of all this, the judge's charge to the jury pointed unmistakably to acquittal, and the jury promptly brought in the verdict, "Not guilty." If I am not much mistaken, the men in that audience learned a lesson that night not laid down in the program—the advisability of letting women have a hand in trials by jury.

Among the many receptions tendered me in California one will ever stand out prominently in memory, not only because it was the last, but because of its unique character. It was by the Woman's Board of Presbyterian Missions, of which Mrs. P. D. Brown, former state W. C. T. U. president, is now the head. It was at their headquarters, their Chinese Home in San Francisco. Here are gathered thirty-five or forty Chinese girls and women, rescued from the worst of slavery. To rescue one of them, a girl of fifteen, Miss Culbertson, their house-mother, had been to the courts seventeen times. This gives a hint of the work of this heroic woman, than whom a nobler does not live.

The girls sang for us both in English and Chinese, and repeated Scripture with a readiness which would have put most American schoolgirls to the blush. Being told that I was going across the water to Japan and China, they repeated in concert the Traveler's Psalm, and then individually gave appropriate texts of their own choosing to me and to other ladies introduced to them. So apposite were these texts, and so promptly given, that a lady inquired if they had been selected for the girls and learned "on purpose."

"No, indeed," responded Mrs. Brown; "just test their Bible knowledge by asking them to give you texts on any subject you please."

This was done repeatedly, the words, "faith," "love," "charity," "grace," "peace," and so on being given, and immediately responded to by some girl's giving a text containing the word. They seemed to have the whole Bible at their tongue's end, and what is better still, to know how to apply it.

The latest arrival was a little girl of seven or eight, bought in China when an infant, and brought here to grow up in a brothel. By some means she had heard of dear Miss Culbertson and her kindness to Chinese girls, and determined to go to her. Being so young, she was not closely guarded, and escaped. She was found in a neighboring street wandering up and down crying to be taken to Miss Culbertson. She was brought to the Home and by due process of law has been set free. She had not yet received an English name as all the girls do; at Mrs. Brown's suggestion she was then and there named, "Mary Allen West." I am proud of the honor thus done me, sure that under the Christian influences now surrounding her, a child that showed so much enterprise as she did in escaping from slavery will grow into a grand Christian woman. Pray for her that she may be one of our daughters who are "as corner stones, polished after the similitude of a palace."

The fact that very little work can be done on the other side of the water during the summer, while it is just the season for schools of methods on this coast, decided me to change my plan of sailing from San Francisco in July, to sailing from Vancouver late in August, meanwhile taking in the state schools of methods of Northern California and Oregon. I write now at Gearhart Park, the beautiful grounds of the Oregon state Chautauqua assembly, in connection with which I am holding a school of methods.

Never was there a more beautiful spot than this. A magnificent forest of Oregon pines, sloping down to a beach perfect in all requirements both for driving and surf bathing. The roar of the Pacific is in my ears as I write, with the soft accompaniment of the whispering pines. Here Mr. Marshall Kinney, known the world over as a successful business man, known best to white-ribboners as the husband of Narcissa White Kinney, has given a three thousand dollar auditorium to the Chautauqua Association, incorporating in the deed the condition that it shall always be open to the temperance cause. A summer city is rapidly growing up around the auditorium and the deed of every lot sold contains a prohibitory clause. Mr. Kinney also offers a lot to the state W. C. T. U. for headquarters.

This is the second session of the Chautauqua; its program presents a fine array of talent; among its lecturers are Rev. R. B. Dillworth, whose seaside studies have been one of the most delightful features of the assembly, Rev. R. D. Grant, late of Boston, now of Portland, Oregon, and Mrs. E. W. Allen, Lady Commissioner of the Columbian Exposition. All the speakers have acquitted themselves well, but not one has aroused the enthusiasm evoked by the lecture of Mrs. Narcissa Kinney, on "Rome as I saw it." An evidence of the appreciation with which it was received is the fact that before she left the platform two invitations came to her to deliver it before colleges. These she accepted, for as she said, one great object in preparing the lecture was that it might be the means of opening college doors to her, through which she might introduce the Y work. Among those in attendance are Mrs. A. R. Riggs, state president, and Mrs. Foster, state secretary of W. C. T. U.

Should nothing else arise to prevent, I shall have sailed for Japan before this reaches the eye of our readers. God bless you every one and make the months of my absence blessed months to THE UNION SIGNAL and to all the world-wide interests it represents. MARY ALLEN WEST.

DEPARTMENT OF MERCY.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Here is an item which those interested in the work of this department may be willing to read. In Harper's Weekly of May 14 appeared an account of the manner in which the government issue of beef was made to the Indians at the Kiowa Agency. It was described as brutal in the extreme. The cattle, far below weight from starvation, being literally skin and bone, and stumbling with weakness, were delivered alive to the Indians, who had the sport of chasing them about and butchering them in a lingering way with pistols and knives, their dogs taking part. The account added that the squaws skinned them before they were dead, and that the government alone was to blame for this sickening cruelty.

Your superintendent felt that something must be done, and accordingly sent a copy of the account in Harper, with a letter to President Harrison, to Secretary Noble and to Commissioner Morgan. The letter pointed out that beside the shocking cruelty to the poor brutes, it was the worst injustice to the Indian to help him in the perpetuation of his savage instincts, cruelty being the chief sin of barbarism; and an earnest plea was made that for the honor of the nation, something might be done to remedy the evil. The following reply was received from Secretary Noble:

WASHINGTON, July 15, 1892.

Mrs. Mary F. Lovell, Sup't Dep't of Mercy, N. W. C. T. U., Bryn Mawr, Pa.

DEAR MADAM:—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 13th inst, and its enclosure relative to the quality of beef purchased and delivered to Kiowa Agency, Oklahoma, and the methods used in killing of the cattle.

In response you are respectfully informed that the purchases for the fiscal year 1893 provide that cattle are to be delivered as required and no loss in weight will occur.

As to the killing of the cattle Agent Day reports under date of June 20, 1892, "that the manner of killing was brutal, the Indians vying with each other to see who could inflict the most unnecessary torture. I took immediate steps to remedy the evil, and made strenuous efforts to that effect. On the last issue, June 17, I am happy to state that not a shot was fired at the corral, the cattle being driven to the Indian camps and there slaughtered without unnecessary torture, . . . and to respectfully state that our manner of issue and killing are now above criticism." Very respectfully, 5406 Ind. Div., '92. JOHN W. NOBLE, Sec.

This letter is very satisfactory, but the matter will bear watching. Any who read this and who feel enough interest in the Indians to wish that they may become decent, well-behaved citizens instead of brutal savages, and who think it a disgrace to our boasted civilization that it is still possible for God's dumb creatures to be so misused, and whose travels give them opportunity, should keep an eye on the Indian Agencies and report at once any deviation from the improved methods which Agent Day reports. Faithfully yours in the work,

MARY F. LOVELL.

REPRESENTATION WITHOUT TAXATION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—From the ranks of the "silent seven" some Indians have passed and taken their places among enfranchised citizens. They were present as delegates at the Republican convention at Madison, South Dakota. And "lo! the poor Indian" was no longer an outcast from the social world, but a voter beloved. Each candidate was anxious to pin his badge upon their manly breasts. The politicians vied with each other in attentions. They were button holed, cigared, and in every way treated like white men.

That very day Senator Pettigrew was asking Congress to make an appropriation to pay the taxes of these same enfranchised citizens. Indians who hold their lands in severalty are exempt from taxation for twenty-five years. In certain sections of the state the greater part of the land is in possession of the Indians, and the burden of taxation rests heavily upon the white settlers who are seeking federal aid. Doubtless the government that refuses the ballot to women who pay taxes will pay the taxes of these Indians.

The Indians of S. Dakota will be free to vote taxes upon the white women who hold property in that state, and who will have to endure the double tyranny of taxation without representation, and of representation without taxation. The stream of human progress is flowing on, but there are bewildering eddies often seen in its mighty course. ELIZABETH U. YATES,

TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

Wherefore if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?—Matt. 6: 30.

Another $10,000 with interest was paid Marshall Field last week. This makes $125,000 paid him on his stock besides interest, in six months. One half the stock held by Mr. Field is now paid for—in half the year allowed to do it in. As has been said before this could not have been done, nor would we have dared to enter into the contract with Mr. Field without having, besides the gifts to rely upon, the receipts from the sale of the Temple Trust Bonds to meet the payments on the stock. So the bonds have proved not only an excellent aid to the W. C. T. U. gaining possession of the Temple stock, but an admirable investment for our friends. Think of it, six per cent payments made semi-annually, on a security as absolutely safe as any government bond ever issued. To be sure this does not seem a large percentage to people who have itching palms, who desire to double their money in a year and get something for nothing. Such people never put their money in a safe, moderate, paying investment. They are the ones who are ever ready to be caught by the bait of shrewd advertisers who offer to double their investment in a year. Not one in a thousand of such investors make anything out of their speculations; but it is not so with the Temple Trust Bonds—they are sure beyond a peradventure. Mr. H. C. Speer, 237 La Salle street, Chicago, and 412 Exchange Building, Boston, Mass., is our financial agent. All letters in regard to the Bonds should be addressed to him.

While on the subject of finance, I desire to say how I deplore the many personal schemes that have lately sprung up of a purely money-making character, which have sought to catch on to the "W. C. T. U. peg," in order to secure the success of their enterprises. While I do not object to anybody "feathering his own nest," as people have a right to do by honorable means, the backing and power of the W. C. T. U. ought not to be frittered away in schemes of a purely personal character.

We want to say to our Loyal Temperance Legion girls and boys, that the three beautiful painted silk banners which are to be presented to the three Legions that raise the most money for the Temple by the time that building is completed, have not been forgotten. The presentation of these banners will take place at the dedication of the building next June, when the World's W. C. T. U. meets in Chicago and during the great Columbian Exposition, which will then be under full headway. Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Frances E. Willard will make the presentation in Willard Hall to the person whom the Legion selects as its representative. We trust that each Legion will appoint a boy and girl from the membership for this office. All sums sent in up to the first day of June, 1893, will be counted. Only ten months in which to work now remain. Let all our L. T. L's go to work with a will and let the world see what the children can do toward paying for the beautiful Temple before it is dedicated.

"We have been very much interested in the Temple," writes Mrs. M. W. Nevins, superintendent L. T. L., Webster Groves, Mo., "and at our last meeting voted unanimously to send you $20 to help pay for it. We raised this money by holding a silver medal contest. Our Legion has fifty boys and girls who have taken the triple pledge, and who mean to do all they can to down King Alcohol." The Kingdom Division, Company D., L. T. L., Dixon, Ill., sends $20. From Florence, N. J., L. T. L. comes $20 on a pledge of $100. The Nashua and Taylor, Ill., Band of Hope sends $16.50 on a $100 pledge. The L. T. L. of Wabash county, Indiana, is raising $100 for the Temple. The L. T. L. of Wabash, Ind., sends $10 on this pledge; $10.33 comes from the Millersburg, O., L. T. L. secured by collections in mite-boxes. The L. T. L. of Newport, Ky., forwards $9. The Rockwood, Pa., L. T. L. sends $5.26, contents of Temple mite-boxes; $5 from the L. T. L. of Boston, N. Y., to apply on the Erie county pledge; $4.60 from the Beatrice, Neb., L. T. L. We may have something more to say in regard to this at another time. The L. T. L. of Odessa, Texas, gives $4. Birthday offerings for the year 1891: $1.36 from the Poughkeepsie, N. Y., L. T. L., $1.30 from the Hammond, Wis., L. T. L.; $3.32 comes through Mrs. S. W. Lord, from the Junior Christian Endeavor class of Carthage, Mo.

In sending for a Temple inkstand, Mrs. C. H. Johnson, secretary of the state W. C. T. U. of Michigan, expresses herself in the following beautiful words: "I desire to have a model of the Temple of the world, whose every stone is a song, a self-denial and a prayer. How like the mustard seed in Jesus' illustration." Let our friends send for one of the silver models of the Temple, when they want to make a beautiful gift.

A two-cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, the Temple, Chicago, will secure a mite-box, descriptive card and bulletin; remember, all who fill a mite box ($3.65) before next April will receive a photographic group consisting of Lady Henry Somerset, Miss Willard and the founder of the Temple. All drafts should be made out in the name of Miss Esther Pugh. All matters pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Carse.

A ROSE KISS.

BY ELLA BEECHER GITTINGS.

Dainty little Margaret
In her night-gown white
Lightly trips across the room,
Wishing each "good-night."

When she reaches mamma's side,
Tossing back a curl
From her face, she gaily cries:
"Here's your little girl,

"Coming with a pretty kiss—
Nicest one of all—
Your kiss has a red rose in it,"
And the fingers small,

Clasping, lock the dimpled arms
Around mamma's neck—
"Doesn't it smell just as sweet!
Mamma, don't you s'peck

"That you'd like to have me tell
How your kiss was made?"
"Yes, my darling." Close against Mamma's cheek were laid

All the soft curls. "Hold your ear,
An' I'll tell you how—Yesterday I eated up
Rose leaves—truly now!"

Soberly in whispers low,
Said this little miss,
"And they changed inside of me
To a sweet rose kiss!"

A TRUE HEROINE.

BY MINNIE E. BLOOD.

[The main incident of this narrative is fact and not fancy.]

"I can't help it," said Dora Deane impatiently, "I don't more than half know the piece and I'm not going to make a fool of myself for anybody."

"But," suggested her friend, Helen Easton, "you have all day to-morrow, and you know, Dora, you can recite beautifully if you only will."

"The tennis tournament is to-morrow," answered Dora decidedly, "and I'm sure I'm not going to sit cooped up all day memorizing a temperance speech." Still Helen was not convinced.

"It seems to me," she said, "you should take the part anyway. You agreed to do it, and if you would rather go to the tennis tournament than to stay at home and learn it, I think you ought to do as well as you can with it now, and let it go at that." Dora laughed scornfully,

"Now really, you don't suppose I would try if I didn't think I should take the medal, do you? You ought to know me better than that, Helen Easton. Haven't I always taken the prize when I have contested for anything? That is because I know what I am about. I don't try unless I'm sure of it, and I can't be sure of this unless I study and practice all day to-morrow, and I'm not going to do that for anybody or for any medal. I didn't care to try anyway. I only said yes because Mr. Austin urged me."

As the young girl finished speaking, she pushed her safety bicycle, against which she had been leaning, from the sidewalk into the road, swung herself easily into the saddle, and flew down the street, leaving Helen at her own gate looking helplessly after her.

It was the first week of September, the last week of the school vacation. Walter Austin had considered this fact when he had undertaken to arrange for a Demorest medal contest in the First church for Thursday evening. He argued that the young people would have more time for learning their parts.

Walter Austin took a great interest in the cause of temperance. He was an active, earnest young man, although with little time to devote to anything aside from his work and his family. He was a bookkeeper in the Welton Mills, and had not much money to give, but he found ways of giving himself, both to the church and to the good cause of temperance that would not have occurred to another. Walter Austin and his wife Alice were believed in and looked up to by the young people of the village as were few others.

Alice Austin was not yet twenty-five years of age. She had always been called a remarkable girl by those who admired her but did not understand her. She had worked in the mill, and the mill girls had called her a little queer. To be sure, she was very unlike them. They all respected her, and some loved her, and every one offered congratulations when it was announced that the bookkeeper was to marry Alice Hastings and to take her out of the mill. They had gone to housekeeping in a small cottage on one of the side streets, and Alice's widowed mother had come to live with them.

Dora Deane did not dismount from her wheel until she reached Mr. Austin's house. Alice was setting the table for supper, and singing to the baby meanwhile. Mrs. Hastings was away, but was expected to return the following day. Mr. Austin had not yet come from the mill. The doorbell rang impatiently, and Alice hurried to the door to find Dora Deane standing on the steps.

"How do you do, Dora?" she said gently, taking the girl's hand. "Won't you come in?"

"I can't stop but a minute," answered Dora stepping into the hall and bringing a breeze with her. "Please tell Mr. Austin that I can't take that piece to-morrow night. I really haven't had time to learn it."

"Why, Dora," said Alice, "he will be so disappointed. It is too late now to find anybody else. You must do it, that's a good girl."

"It isn't any use, Mrs. Austin," said Dora, running on rapidly. "I just can't do it, and that is all there is to it. Please tell Mr. Austin that I am sorry."

At the supper table Alice delivered Dora's message. "That is bad," said Walter. "I will see Dora in the morning. She will not leave us in the lurch when she knows that the medal cannot be awarded if her part is not taken. You know, Alice, there must be six contestants."

When Walter came in from the mill the following day, he said, as though he had been thinking it over carefully and had made up his mind, "Alice, dear, you memorize easily. Couldn't you take Dora's piece?"

Alice opened her eyes suddenly. "Not for the world," said she.

"Not for the world," echoed Walter pathetically. "That is just what Dora said."

Both faces looked troubled for a moment, and then Walter took up the baby and began to chatter to her cheerily, and no more was said of the Demorest contest until dinner was ended.

Just as Walter took up his hat, Alice laid her hand timidly on his arm and said with a little quaver in her voice, "Not for the world, but for you, dear, and for the Master." His face brightened.

"You are as brave as you are good," he said as he kissed her good-by.

At three o'clock that day Alice's mother found her rocking the baby quietly, while her eyes were fixed on the lines she was endeavoring to memorize.

"Oh, mother," she exclaimed, "I am so glad you have come. Walter has been in such perplexity. The Demorest contest takes place to-night, and Dora Deane has given up her part at the last moment. Walter asked me to try, and I said I would, but I am so frightened. The piece is long, and I cannot possibly get through it without stumbling, and you know, mother, I am so easily embarrassed."

Mrs. Hastings stroked her daughter's hair soothingly as she said,

"If you try your best to learn it and cannot, Alice, surely Walter will be satisfied."

"Oh, but, mother, don't you know he can't give the medal unless there are six contestants? That is why he asked me to try." Mrs. Hastings thought a moment, and then said:

"Well, then, it doesn't matter whether you do well or not, so long as you do your best. Of course Walter doesn't expect you to take the prize." Alice laughed at this. The idea of her taking the prize seemed so preposterous.

"I know," she said, cheerfully, "it doesn't matter, and of course Walter can prompt me, and I shall get through it somehow."

Alice put on her most becoming dress that night. "I can at least look my best," she said to herself. And as she took her place on the platform she did look altogether sweet and pretty in her simple white dress, with a bunch of scarlet geranium at her throat.

Walter sat on the front seat and prompted her, but she gave the recitation with such unconscious grace, in spite of her evident embarrassment, that even the most sympathetic in the audience forgot to feel sorry for her.

The affair was on the whole a great success, and netted a small sum to aid in the church finances. Walter Austin was treasurer of the church, and, after his usual fashion of shouldering responsibilities, had undertaken this entertainment partly for the purpose of making up a slight deficiency. The medal was awarded to a colored boy, by the unanimous marking of the judges.

As Dora Deane and Helen Easton walked home together, Dora said, "Well, I'm extremely glad I didn't try. I know I couldn't have outdone Ned Howard. But didn't Mrs. Austin look lovely? It must have been very humiliating, though, to have been the only one prompted. I should have died of shame." At this, Dora's father, who was walking with the two girls, laid his hand affectionately on his daughter's shoulder, and said:

"I have been proud of my daughter many times. Indeed, I am usually proud of her. I didn't understand until to-night that the award could not be made except her part were taken. I will not say just what I think of my daughter to-night; but to my mind Mrs. Austin is a true heroine." The same thought was expressed by many that night.

"Walter," said Alice, as they walked home together, "were you very, very much ashamed of me?"

"Ashamed!" ejaculated Walter. "Not at all. I never was more proud in my life." And Alice believed him and was happy.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—The pleasant vacation time is really over now, and the happy fall season is begun. I can see you all, through my mental glasses, busy at school-desk, office or store, cheerfully doing the work of each day, and no matter how occupied you are, always thinking of, and manifesting in your acts, your temperance principles. To make room for "Uncle Walter's" good letter and our own weekly budget, I will add only a "God bless you" all, Faithfully your

FROM UNCLE WALTER.

I have been reading Buttercup's letter, wherein she was told that if there were no bars there would be no hotels. I have had an experience in twenty-three different states in the Union, from Maine to Texas. Though drinking men often claim they cannot make a hotel pay unless they can sell liquor and have a bar in it, I have noticed that except in large cities, where competition is very great, and oftentimes there too, the more attractive they make the bar-room the less attractive I find the bed-rooms; and the more attention they pay to the trade in alcoholic fire the less attention they pay to providing appetizing food, so that in the end the bar often proves the cause of a bare cupboard and an empty purse.

The most constantly crowded small hotel in New York City is one where neither liquor nor cigars are sold.

CHURNING.

BY JULIA MILLS DUNN.

She stood upon the vine-wreathed porch,
  Soft breezes gently straying
Among the vine leaves overhead
  Sent flickering shadows playing.

She wore an apron snowy white,
  Snow-white her dainty fingers,
A pleasing picture to the sight—
  Where memory fondly lingers.

As up and down the dasher flew,
  I heard a warbling sound—
"Oh, never doubt 'tis love, 'tis love
  That makes the world go 'round."

The whistle shrieked, the train flew on Across the swelling meadow;
I saw no more the rustic maid,
  The vine leaves' quivering shadow;

But through the city's noisy din,
  Fond memory still is bringing
A picture of a vine-wreathed porch,
  A sweet voice still is singing;

I hear the dasher's steady beat
  And, mingled with the sound,
"Oh, never doubt 'tis love, 'tis love
  That makes the world go 'round."

DAVID DOUGLAS AND HIS WIFE.

BY MRS. O. W. SCOTT.

CHAPTER II.

"David Douglas, Chesport, Connecticut." This was what the bishop read, when on the last morning of the annual conference the ministers received their appointments in the usual manner. Several of Mr. Douglas' friends turned and nodded approvingly, for Chesport was one of the "desirable places."

"Going to Chesport, are you? I congratulate you!" said genial Mr. Strong after the last hymn was sung and the crowd was leaving the church.

"Yes, you'll have a good time. It's a wide-awake church, and a place where you'll find good social privileges and excellent schools," added his friend, Mr. Harper.

Near by stood Mr Ludlow, who had just left Chesport, and Mr. Douglas cared more for a word of congratulation from him than from any other man. Perhaps he showed this in his glance, for Mr. Ludlow promptly extended his hand.

"I have prepared the way for my successor as far as I could," said he. "You'll find a good directory and a good parsonage; the schools are excellent, as Mr. Harper says."

Instinctively Mr. Douglas felt that something was wrong. A minister about to serve a new people turns toward them with more than a spiritual interest. The transition means so much. Will they demand and appreciate his best efforts on all lines? or will they make it impossible for him to do "many mighty works" there? Do they desire a leader? or will they tolerate only the man whom they can lead? Do they long for more aggressive, practical Christian living? or have they paid for their pews on the "sleeper" plan?

He looked inquiringly into Mr. Ludlow's face, but that good man only pressed his hand, wished him unbounded success and turned away.

There was no time during the following week to cultivate the suspicion which had been awakened. Last errands to do, last words to say, last nails to drive in the big boxes, took all the physical and mental, aye, and morat strength of our friend. When at last he turned the key in the front door and Dorothy exclaimed with a sudden outburst of grief: "Where's my little bed going to be to-night?" the family came very near giving way to those "feelings" ordinarily supposed to be kept in a suitable condition for transportation. They paused for an instant and looked back at the old parsonage which had held them so comfortably for three years.

"It seems as if our own faces were looking out of the windows at us," whispered Mrs. Douglas.

"Good bye, old apple tree, where Dot and I played," said Ted.

"There, now, don't let's go to the train with red eyes," cried Marion. "There'll be lots of folks to see us off, and I don't want them to think we feel so dreadfully bad. Come, Hugh, let's walk faster."

So the farewells were said half cheerfully, and a few hours later they were greeting new friends, in a new parsonage; and in a pleasant upper room, Dorothy had found a place for her own little bed!

"The king is dead! Long live the king!" and between the two exclamations are volumes of unwritten sentiment.

A minister in a new parish is something like an Adam in a new Eden. His predecessors may have had trouble, but he thinks he knows how to avoid it. The "other man" has made mistakes; has offended this one; has failed to charm that; but his errors are to be avoided by this man who has just come to his kingdom! Life may have treated him heretofore with marked disrespect; may have pinched him with poverty, and wounded him at many a sharp corner, but each time he "moves" he "begins over again," with fresh courage in God and humanity.

Mr. Douglas found himself in this exalted frame of mind, when, forgetful of weariness, he faced his congregation on the first Sabbath. The day was one of April's loveliest; the platform was adorned with flowers—the people were out in force, and organ and choir harmonized beautifully! Mrs. Douglas, quietly watching the incoming crowd, noted their evident intelligence and affluence. One family, entering a little late, particularly impressed her; a tall, portly gentleman, followed by his richly dressed wife, daughters and son. Their advent was recognized by a slight rustling and turning of heads which said to the minister's wife, who had studied congregations before, "This is a great man and his family!" This thought was verified soon after the service was over, when Mr. Pettigrew, the Sunday-school superintendent, made his way to the minister's side.

"You must come this way and meet Mr. Sloan," he said in a low tone; and clearing his way to the great man's pew he was soon presenting "our new minister" to Mr. Sloan, his wife, Miss Bertha and Miss Minnie, and Rodney Sloan. There was an exchange of polite greetings, a murmur of appreciative words for the sermon, from the ladies, and then Mr. Pettigrew was ready to introduce others who were patiently waiting.

"You want to be solid with the Sloans," laughed Mr. Pettigrew a little later. "He's one of our heaviest givers."

"A member, I suppose?" questioned the minister.

"No, but his wife is. He's very generous, though;—he put in an organ for us. Cost him two thousand."

"Ah!" Mr. Douglas' interest was increasing. Other things being equal, a minister has reason to prize a generous man above his fellows. And such men do not form an overwhelming majority in New England churches.

"What is he, a retired merchant?"

"Ye-es, a retired merchant." The slight hesitation in Mr. Pettigrew's reply was fully explained a week or two later.

Meanwhile, home comfort slowly evolved from the necessary confusion of unpacking at the parsonage. The limited stock of pictures and bric-a-brac was judiciously distributed, not without seasons of mourning over broken or marred treasures. The children were in school—even Dorothy finding a "candy garden" as she persisted in calling the kindergarten, where she could be happy half of each day in using her ever busy fingers.

One morning, when there really seemed to be time to look out and see what May was doing among the apple trees and tulip beds, Mr. Sloan's majestic, colored coachman came with a note, inviting the minister and his wife to drive with Mrs. Sloan that afternoon.

"We couldn't refuse, of course," said Mr. Douglas after the coachman had left, bearing a note of acceptance. "They tell me that Ludlow would have stayed another year if he hadn't failed to meet some overtures from the Sloans."

"Is that so?" and Mrs. Douglas' face wore a shade of anxiety. "But, David, I don't like to feel obliged to be devoted to any one family. Do you? I wish our people wouldn't be so anxious to have you please him. Why, Mrs. Pettigrew told me the other day that the Sloans were perfectly delighted with your sermons; just as if it were essential. Now, of course, I can lay aside Marion's dress and go to ride, and I shall enjoy it, for it's a lovely day, but—"

"There! there! now let us have no bugbears! Put on your best bonnet and we will see Chesport in its beauty. Of course Dorothy must go, but she won't take much room."

The afternoon was all that could be desired. A carriage which seemed to be chiefly composed of springs and cushions and glitter; a pair of sleek, high stepping horses, a statuesque coachman and Mrs. Sloan and Miss Minnie to point out and explain objects of interest, made a delightful combination. Dorothy, a small embodiment of satisfaction, sat between her parents. They drove into the country, past orchards whose trees were huge bouquets of pink and white, perfuming the air. They saw forests clothed in the soft tints of early verdure, and far away hills with smoky, dreamy outlines. They passed pretty summer residences which would, a little later, be alive with gaiety, and then back and forth through the better portion of Chesport, where great elms shaded pleasant homes.

"I begin to think, Mrs. Sloan, that Chesport hasn't as much poverty as most places," said the minister. "Now, this being a license state, we naturally expect to see the inevitable results of the curse in saloons and crowded tenement houses everywhere."

"You'll see enough poverty and so forth if you go the other side of the railroad," said Miss Minnie with a laugh. "Oh, it's just horrid! and then down Water street! Why, you would wonder how people could live there. Every minister has to be horrified over Water street, doesn't he, mamma? But those creatures have to exist somewhere, I suppose. They're perfectly dreadful, I think! If I'm ever obliged to go through the lower part of Water street I put my handkerchief to my nose and make Thomas drive as rapidly as possible," and then the young lady dismissed the subject with a shrug and a smile, while her mother hastened to call attention to the soldiers' monument, which they were passing.

Mr. Douglas was away that evening until quite late, and when he returned, his wife met him at the door.

"David," said she, hardly giving him time to remove his hat and reach a chair, "do you know how Mr. Sloan made his money?"

"Why, yes, he's a retired merchant, so I've been told."

"He's a retired brewer, that's what he is!" ejaculated Mrs. Douglas.

"Is that so? Are you sure? Who told you so?" and the minister's voice held a challenge of disbelief.

"Mrs. Reed. She was here this evening, and she referred to it in connection with church work. She says his money keeps things quiet. And will you believe it? the houses on River street which hold those dreadful creatures Miss Minnie told about, are his."

"I declare! That's what ailed Ludlow!" and Mr. Douglas smote the arm of his chair in pained surprise; "but such a man as Sloan must be ashamed of that business, I'm sure. He's too much of a man to be satisfied with it. And he's got to be somewhere in society. Why shouldn't he give money to the church. I'd like to know? I wish, Mary, that you wouldn't let Mrs. Reed, or any other gossiping woman fill your mind with prejudices. You can't make me believe that Ludlow, or any of the other ministers they've had here would fail to preach temperance, no matter who sat in the pews."

"Yes, he did. Mrs. Reed said Brother Ludlow was an earnest temperance worker; and Mr. Sloan bears all the preaching and all the praying without a protest. He don't care much as long as the ministers vote to please him. But Brother Ludlow began to pull away from the party a little and so he had to go."

His easy chair evidently did not prove comfortable, for at this point Mr. Douglas arose and began to pace back and forth while he freed his mind.

"There! I might have known what led to all this. Our precious Mrs. Reed is a Prohibitionist! She evidently found a congenial spirit in you, Mary, and by to morrow night every crank in the church will know that your political sympathies are with them."

"David!" said his wife in a rather intense tone.

"Excuse me, dear, but this business just upsets me, I declare! They ought to have told me what Sloan was! I do hate to have women come to you and tell all the hateful things." And so Mr. Douglas continued to walk and talk, while his wife, who was something of a mind reader, and understood the real source of discomfort, waited until the first surprise was over. In less than five minutes he paused behind her chair, and stooped to kiss her forehead.

"If I were a woman," said he, "I really believe I should look at these things as you do. I hate the abominable business, and to think of preaching to please Sloan is like treason, but I can't prevent such men being in my party, you know that, Mary. You understand me, dear, don't you?"

"Yes, I try to understand you as far as a woman can," replied his wife with a slight touch of sarcasm; "but I'm not logician enough to see how a man can love a party which upholds and defends what his soul abominates. Excuse my stupidity, won't you?"

"I love you in spite of your imperfections," replied David with a smile.

"The case is not a parallel one!" and Mrs. Douglas' tone indicated a just resentment. "If my 'imperfections' amounted to outbreaking sins, in defiance of human and divine laws, if I was trying to destroy your friends and neighbors and undo all your Christian work, and if our relations were simply those of a citizen to his party, how long do you think your affection would survive? Such an argument hasn't a vestige of common sense."

"Oh, hear the woman talk!" laughed her husband. "You're clear headed so far as you understand the subject, but I'm too tired to discuss it to-night, and I throw myself upon your mercy. I'll sleep over it and see what's best to do."

To prevent any possible misconstruction at this point, please understand, dear friends, that this is a love story. Ordinary love stories, ending with the wedding day, give us simply the beginning of a solemn speculation, but the loyalty of these two strong-willed people had been tested many times and had endured. Theirs was the love "which many waters cannot quench, neither can the floods drown it." Differences of opinion there were, however; most of them upon questions discussed by the brightest and best men and women of our day, and lying within that charmed skirmish ground which surrounds the kingdom of unself ishness and equality.

CARE FOR THE YOUNG WORKERS.

BY MARY DUSTIN LUDLUM.

An article in THE UNION SIGNAL a few months ago on "Care for the Workers," was very timely and important. Mrs. Bottome always seems to write because she has something to say, and not merely because she can say something well.

Not long after God's chariot suddenly "swung low" at our door and our only daughter, the light of our eyes, the rest of our hearts, the rock of our hopes, stepped in, and we were left gazing up into heaven. It was on the eve of her twenty-fourth birthday, just in the ripening glory of her young womanhood. On the faith side we could only say, "Now we see through a glass darkly"; on the earth side there was much that could not be hidden. An enthusiastic teacher, a heart-warm worker in the W. C. T. U., the Young Woman's Missionary Society, the Epworth League, with musical talent consecrated to every good work; it was all clear, alas! too late! The earnest soul had overdrawn on the store of vitality, so that when the deadly grippe came there was no reserve power to resist.

We had seen the danger at home where the "giving down" was more manifest, and had tried to shield from its cares as far as could be, but under the stimulus of action, the bright, full face and quick, cheery step, were false lights deceiving those who saw not the other side. We were all glad she was not going to teach next year, but she loved it so, there seemed not reason enough to stop now; then in the League the other willing ones were busy also, so she could not refuse to do her share; then came a church supper, where the fires had not been lighted early enough for the early coming committee; then a few weeks of fever and pain and dreadful fear; then the beautiful memorial service here and the long procession at the old Ohio home, and she rested beside her mother, for she had not always been mine.

We do not dare rebel; we have seen her glory-lighted face as she seemed to try to ask us not to wish it different, yet we think the lesson is plain. We should not allow our zeal to outrun our faith, but trust Him for help when strength begins to fail, or let some things wait while we care for the Lord's children, His greatest care.

An invalid for several years, I sit with weak hands and chained feet and think of the young life that might have been saved; therefore I utter this warning. Burden not young hearts and hands too heavily with the world's sorrow and sin and plans to make them less. Each pure soul that lives on earth is a light shining away the darkness, and no better work can be done than helping it to live long. Let us take up our work and teach others the same, calmly, with deliberate determination, feeling that it is to be like serving the Lord in any other way, "all the days of our lives."

THE APPROACHING ELECTION.

If the approaching election could be estimated at its proper measure of importance, it would appear an immense thing, a thing of wonder and admiration. The number concerned directly in the election astounds us. There can hardly be less than twelve million of voters claiming to represent at least fifty million of women and children. These, representing every degree of intelligence, are giving attention to the election with every conceivable, and many an inconceivable, distorted conception.

The spectacle presented by this mass of voters deserves close attention. To begin at the foot of the class, notice first the voters who cannot read their ballots. Many of these are black men, but by no means all. Whether black or white it is a sickening spectacle to see millions of men who fancy they are exercising the elective franchise, but who are in reality the tools of other men. They do not know for whom they are voting, they are incapable of anything except a blind belief in what some one tells them. With equal propriety one may vote his horse and his dog.

There is another class that can read who are not dependent on the reading of another but who know nothing of the issues presented. They are new to the country, ignorant of its language, occupied in their own affairs and disposed to be clannish. Think of such a jury before which to plead a great governmental question!

Still another large group speak and read the English language. They have been accustomed to the names of parties, to the doings of conventions, to "platforms of principles." They have been members of a party for years. They have voted the ticket of their party. They will vote it again, of course. Nothing would surprise them more than a serious proposition to vote any other ticket. They would resent, as abusive and insulting, the insinuation that they were incapable of a judicial frame of mind. But the simple fact is they will go to the polls and vote with the calm serenity of the profoundest ignorance. They know what their party leaders have told them with tongue and pen, this, and nothing more.

But the spectacle which excites our alarm is that of intelligent and able men who lend themselves to that which Washington feared most, the cultivation of a party spirit. They parade the fact that they have always been true to "the party." They hesitate at nothing which means party success. Their intelligence and gifts of leadership are devoted not to their country but their party. The field of their activity is the domain of ignorance, not for the purpose of enlightening it and securing a truthful, honest and righteous verdict, but to mass the ignorant and purchasable voters for "the party." It is an open question whether these are not to be considered enemies of mankind.

It would not be difficult to secure this verdict against them but for the fact that parties are a necessity in our form of government, and party leaders find it easy to secure an influential position and the credit of patriots. They will declare with most unctuous appearance of sincerity that love of country inspires them, and that they are found in "the party" only because they can thus serve their country, and as the necessities of the case require organization and official position, the corrupt passes in with the genuine patriot, to a place in the political pantheon.

In a government like ours, where the citizens are the ultimate authority, there are laid the bases of different parties in the very nature of man. The man who looks to the future with hope, and who seeks the improvement of the race will not be able to keep step with the man who is satisfied with things as they are. Inevitably, parties will crystallize around these points, and they will tend to perpetuate themselves. Honest differences will exist. As time goes on issues will be made and will be taken up for discussion and action. All this is right as long as the party is a tool with which to work out results. When it becomes a master who wheedles or bullies as the mood takes it, then we have another condition of things.

Looking at this army of twelve millions, and marking the different groups of which it is composed, we note another thing. All these insist upon the voting privilege as a right inherent in their human nature, not a privilege conferred by some one else for any reason. Yet the same rule does not apply to one half the human beings in the country. The twelve millions of women, educated, law abiding citizens, held to the same moralities as men, interested equally, at least, in a stable and honest government, have no word to say. It is the nineteenth century which has found a place for the thought and work of women, which has witnessed extensive emancipations, but only a little group of women appear in the mighty procession of American voters.

This army of voters propose to do what if done in Austria or Russia or Prussia would be revolution. They propose to turn out an administration, a family, a group of families. If a few millions of citizens were to unite to dismiss the Hapsburgs, or Romanoffs, or Hohernzollerns and their friends and adherents, it would be an effort parallel to that which will culminate in November in this country.

But sweeping as this change is it affects the government but to a very small extent. The personnel of officials will be affected most sweepingly, but the new President will simply do what the old one would have done, and so on through the list. Desperate efforts will be made to persuade the voters that a change will mean something terrible; that if the McKinley tariff is disturbed the glory will have departed, but all this is the vaporing of special pleaders intent on party success.

In 1884, when a Democratic president was elected for the first time since 1856, there was possibly some ground for apprehension, at least many honest people were greatly disturbed. To their minds "Democrat" and "Rebel" were synonymous terms, and the spectacle of a "Rebel President in the saddle" was to them something frightful. But months grew to years, and the administration drew to its close and the dreaded evils failed to materialize. The same will doubtless be true of the coming administration.

Wherein, then, consists the greatness of the national election? In the fact that a great nation, far up in the millions, can hold a deliberative assembly on a single day and indicate its wishes to some small extent; because there will be a discussion of some problems of importance, an imperfect discussion, to be sure, but still a beginning. But especially will it be great in the fact that if either of the candidates named be elected, and that should happen which would rend Russia, or Austria, or Prussia to fragments, it would be accepted with entire equanimity except by the displaced office-holders.

THE OPENING OF THE COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION ON SUNDAY.

There is one thing that Christian people may as well accept as settled, and that is that the Columbian Exposition will be open on Sunday, if the powers of darkness, assisted by their usual allies in this world, the evil, the well-meaning, but mistaken or indolent, the indifferent and the weak, can compass that event. The tone of the secular papers shows that it is fatal to trust to any partial victory or to any temporary decisions in favor of Sunday closing. The opponents of that measure will not be defeated until they are utterly routed. This being the case, it is the part of wisdom to look the issue squarely in the face and see just what the opening of our World's Fair on Sunday involves.

Negatively, we throw away the rarest opportunity of preaching to the world, by a magnificent object lesson, the benefits of a day of rest. According to a reliable writer a Swiss commissioner to the Centennial gave lectures after his return home, in which he declared his conviction that the superiority of American over European workmen was very largely due to the weekly day of rest accorded to the former. A congress, composed of delegates from many European states, was also held, to discuss the practicability of introducing into Europe the American Sabbath. In 1893 we may repeat and enforce the lesson of 1876, of the industrial and social benefits of the Sabbath. Incidentally, our faith in and loyalty to our religion will preach with all the tongues of Pentecost the gospel of Christ. At a cost which cannot be computed of labor, treasure and love, we send our brightest and best to carry that gospel to foreign lands. In our own land, without labor or sacrifice, we may proclaim Christ's religion to the whole world by the most effective of all modes—practice. If we throw open the gates of the Columbian Exposition on Sunday, we are false to the greatest opportunity ever granted a Christian nation.

But not alone do we fail to influence others, we strike a fatal blow at our own institution. Open gates upon the Sabbath will prepare our people as no other one event could for the utter destruction of our day of rest and worship. What that day is to the workman, what it is to all our overworked, nervous American people, what it is to our institutions, civil, moral and religious, none of us, perhaps, will fully realize till it is gone. Chance experiments here and there have proved the value of the day to the physical nature of man and beast. It needs no argument to show that it is a necessity to the moral and spiritual well-being of society. So surely as we become a nation of Sabbath-breakers we shall find we have incurred the penalty of the law. Not alone the Bible, all history proclaims the curse of God upon the nation which violates His law. But the pursuit of gain is the ruling passion of our day. Moral and philanthropic issues grow dim to eyes blinded by the glare of modern civilization. Arguments based upon these issues will not influence the active opposers of Sunday closing. One dollar more gate fee outweighs all moral, philanthropic, and patriotic considerations. There is Christian sentiment enough in the land to close the Exposition gates on Sunday. But if Christians do it, they must unite their forces and direct their attack against the one vulnerable point of the prince of this world—the money point. If half a million people who purpose attending the Fair let it be known that they will not patronize it as a Sabbath-breaking institution mammon will speedily come to terms.

THE SECRETS OF A HAPPY LIFE.

Among "The Secrets of a Happy Life," that are included in the inventory given by one of our most sunshiny lecturers, he used the expression, "The soul looking out through its windows"; indeed, what he is pleased to call in happy phrase, "the sunshine of a woman's face." He says that moroseness, malice, envy, opposers of peace and maligners of happiness, are greatly more of a nuisance than the criminal that we shut up in prison. The great trouble with grumblers and fault-finders is their tenacity of life. They live right on and on, for the next world seems to want them as little as this world does.

Old Izaak Walton used to say, "Every misery missed is a new mercy." The trouble in general is, men are too proud; they want to look down and not up for comparisons when they hunt for happiness. A true philosopher marks his own deserts zero, so when the mercury moves up goes your happiness. For example, if your shoes are worn out body and soul and you cannot buy another pair don't worry, there are plenty of fellows who haven't even a pair of feet. Happiness belongs to home, but many homes are so mean that happiness cannot get in. It is a pitiful sight to see men with money tyrannize over a dark, gloomy house with funereal furnishings, the only pictures being some deathbed scene of Luther or John Wesley. The trouble is we go through life with one eye open and that one ever searching for aches, disappointments, miseries and ills. They work indeed on futures and on margins in a worse sense of the word than do the men upon the Board of Trade. In classing our ills we forget our mercies. Oftentimes our religion is too gloomy to catch the crowd, for the general public gets the idea that religion and groaning are synonyms. The assassination of pleasure in the churches has done more harm than infidelity. There are plenty of hymns that it would do no congregation any good to sing; for instance, "Hark! from the tombs a doleful sound," "I ask not to stay where storm after storm rises dark o'er the way," "Through this gloomy vale of tears," and others of that ilk. We need to appoint a revision committee on the church hymnals, and no better, no greater good has come in many a day than the sweet collection of the gospel songs, and the songs of the cheery Salvation Army.

WE wonder how many of "our folks" know the good things that are being brought out these days by our department of publications. "Saloons and Railroad Men," is one of the new department leaflets; "Practical Hints for Social Work," by Miss Jennie Stewart, of Toledo, O.; "True Patriotism," by Mrs. J. C. Fernald, of New Jersey. The last two are responsive readings for the local union, and would help more than any other one adjunct that could be put into a local president's hands. Mrs. Frances J. Barnes has a delightful Bible reading on "Wisdom," treated in her unhackneyed, uncanting, Quaker way. Miss Greenwood has the "Key-Notes of Joy," which was perhaps the best of her choice Bible readings before the National Convention. Mrs. McMinn has one Bible reading on "Boys of the Bible," and another on "Girls of the Bible." Mrs. Helen G. Rice tells "How to Hold a County Convention of the Loyal Temperance Legion" in which work Massachusetts was the pioneer. We have a new catalogue devoted to her juvenile supplies, which have become a library in themselves. Last of all we note The Advance Guard, for our temperance alumni. We are devoutly thankful that the missing link has been found for those boys and girls who come between the juvenile society and the Y grade. There is not now a class for which our gatling gun of the W. C. T. U. does not provide plentiful ammunition. Dr. Cushman, Faye Huntington, Julia McNair Wright, and other experts, with the "filling in" of Miss Guernsey's own pen, make a toothsome table of contents in every number of The Advance Guard.

PLEDGE.—"I hereby solemnly promise, God helping me, to abstain from all distilled, fermented and malt liquors, including Wine and Cider, and to employ all proper means to discourage the use of and traffic in the same."

Q.—Does the taking of the strong pledge debar one from partaking of the sacrament when fermented wine is used?

A.—We think it would if the communicant knew the wine was fermented.

Q.—What are the duties and privileges of a vice-president-at-large?

A.—Unless the constitution provides otherwise, and this is very unlikely, the office of vice-president-at-large is honorary, and carries neither privilege nor responsibility. She would therefore in no way collide with the first or any other vice-president.

Q.—Do life members of local unions pay annual dues to their union?

A.—As life membership really is a device to obtain money and carries with it no immunities, unless provided for in the constitution, those who have thus given to the treasury must be paid for to the state, hence the proper channel is their own annual fee.

Q.—What are the duties of district president?

A.—Send to Mrs. Caroline B. Buell, the Temple, Chicago, for her excellent compendium of W. C. T. U. work, entitled "The Helping Hand." It costs ten cents. Send also for Miss Mary Allen West's "School of Methods," a little manual, and you will find answers to these questions, also for reports which Mrs. Buell sends out to those who ask for them. We cannot explain the "Pennsylvania plan of reporting." Write to Mrs. Mary H. Jones, W. C. T. U. Headquarters, Arch street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Q.—What can we do or use in the place of liquor when a person becomes unconscious?

A.—If a person becomes suddenly unconscious from faintness, exhaustion, fright or shock of any kind, place him or her in a horizontal position, with the freest possible access to fresh air; dash a few drops of water on the face, neck and chest, repeating it at short intervals, until consciousness, or at least breathing, becomes regular; put a spoonful of water in the mouth, and if it is swallowed then give another, with ten drops of aromatic spirits of ammonia added, or give a spoonful of tea or coffee instead of water. After consciousness is fully regained, no remedies are required but rest and simple nourishment. Alcoholic liquors in such cases are not only not necessary, but their use is positively injurious.

N. S. DAVIS, M. D.

Q.—Is there any truth in the statement that "there is a certain percentage of alcohol in all life"? Does it exist in any substance in its natural state?

A.—On this point, Gustafson says, in "The Foundation of Death": "All fermentations can be divided into two groups: the one for maintaining life, and the other for producing death and dissolution into original elements. Alcoholic fermentation belongs to the latter group, because, as far as known, alcohol can never be obtained from any living organism, substance or chemic compounds containing life, death and decay being necessary pre conditions for its natural production. And as alcoholic fermentation is a saccharine fermentation, and as saccharine fluids are inherent in all organic compounds—saccharine ferments being spontaneously present wherever saccharine fluids exists—and as all organic compounds are subject to the law of death and decay, it follows that all organic substances, in a certain proportion to their saccharine contents, may be productive of alcohol, i. e. be alcoholizable."

As a result of recent experiments in this line, "alcohol has been detected in the wastes of living organisms . . . Alcohols and acids are constant and immediate outcomes of animal death, so that very shortly after death takes place, alcoholic fluids are obtainable from the tissues."

But the presence of these alcoholic fluids after death is not contradictory of the statement accepted by scientists the world over, that the life-principle protects an organism against alcoholic fermentation.

We have no sympathy with the hue and cry against women teachers in the public schools, and think it is on that basis of dollars and cents which, unhappily, seems to be the basis of affairs in this country. At the present time men desire positions in the public schools, and it is true that women have more than their share there, but it is equally true in the world at large that they have much less than their share and they moved into the position they now occupy along the line of least resistance.

The whole question will settle itself justly and satisfactorily to them by the openings of multiplying avocations for women. But we believe that as the world needs mothering, so the public schools need the hand that has helped to make boys manly and chivalrous, and in this age nothing has helped more than the fact that these boys had women teachers from whom they learned to have respect for woman's intellect and power of government, and who, we doubt not, have sympathized with the boys, and shown them as much consideration and kindness, to say the least of it, as would the schoolmaster either at home or abroad.

Q.—Should we send prominent officers to our conventions, or give all the members a chance by turns?

We have been decidedly taken to task for saying, "Pass the honors 'round," when the question was asked whether or not district presidents should be sent to the National W. C. T. U., therefore we are minded to tone down our remarks to some extent, because there seems to be a certain amount of method in the madness of our correspondents.

They take a position like this (to quote from one of them): "The National Convention is not a dress parade where a company of soldiers come to receive honor one from another, but it is a time of most earnest work—a time when plans are laid for the coming year, hence I say, send first of all to its sessions the one who can bring inspiration and help to the largest number of the rank and file. It may be said that the district president can read the report and get the gist of the proceedings, but it will be several months before an accurate report will be placed in her hands and during these months she may have been the only woman in her district who was constantly out speaking, and who most needed the enthusiasm which comes from personal contact with the best workers and the most successful leaders. Let me give you a bit of experience: In one district where I was working with the president we came to a rum-cursed village where the W. C. T. U. was not popular, as a matter of course, and there were small signs of any diminishing prejudice until the district president devoted a whole evening (as was her custom wherever she spent a few days) to the Boston Convention. This gave the people an insight into the work of the W. C. T. U. such as no newspaper report could possibly have done, and was a perfect revelation to the audience. At the close, twenty of the most valuable people in that community came to the front and asked the privilege of joining the ranks and donning the white ribbon. This same president has gone up and down her district, and her practical report of the National Convention has carried conviction as well as inspiration. What other woman in that vicinity could have brought the same returns back to those for whom she worked? On the other hand, I could tell you of women in the rank and file to whom honors have been passed who went out sight-seeing at the convention when matters of importance needed to be voted on, came home and never so much as gave a report of the convention to their own local unions."

This is a subject for flexible action and not for positive advice.

Q.—Is it better to have men or women teachers in the public schools?

A.—It seems to us that the best way to answer the question is by a comparison of the parents in the home. We believe that while it is a conceded and well-known fact that widows bring up their boys to be excellent men—that is, in so many instances that it has become a generalization which proves that women can occupy the double place when the necessity occurs—it is still better to have the dual and equal head in the school and in the family. We do not believe that there are any special characteristics which make it best for a man to be the principal of a school and a woman to be the vice-principal; for a man to rule and a woman to serve. This is to our minds a relic of barbarism. Experience has shown us that there are womanly men and manly women.

As civilization advances, we have every reason to expect, judging from the past, that more and more will it be true that the best men and women will be very much alike: so that in the schools, those who lead and administer discipline should be those having the strongest faculties, whether they happen to be men or women; but we believe that while this is true, there is yet a great advantage in the comparison of views and the co-equal government of the school-room by men and women, for they

A little Australian prayed, "Lord, make the devil a good man, please." Clothing the liquor traffic with the garments of the law to try and make it respectable is about as efficacious as this child's prayer.

One of the improvements most to be desired in our towns and cities in America is the introduction of the European custom of forbidding persons to ride in omnibus or on the street car unless there is room to sit down. When all the seats are occupied, it is the custom in foreign countries to pull a string, which brings a transparency to view, with the word meaning "complete" or "full," and under no circumstances would an added person be permitted to enter either omnibus or car. This is vastly more reasonable, healthful and safe than the American method of "hanging on by the eyelids," to use the expressive phrase of the street.

Criticisms are often made on public speakers because when they hear a good anecdote or expression they are apt to use it. We can see no harm in this. "Let each be willing to communicate." It has passed into a proverb that Dwight L. Moody used to say to his co-workers, "Boys, it's time we met and exchanged anecdotes." What are these illustrations and forms of expression but clothing, in which the same old ideas are dressed, in order to attract the thought and conviction of the people, and if we can raise a revenue for righteous causes by this method, by all means let us do it. Every speaker who has enough fiber in him to be acceptable to the people, must, in the nature of the case, have enough individuality to free him from the charge of appropriating the wares of others because he has none of his own. If he is willing to play the game of give and take, as all sensible men and women speakers are, surely "a fair exchange is no robbery." We have always found that those who had the richest furnishing were the most willing "to live and let live," to give and to receive.

ON DUTY.

WISCONSIN.

VIGILANCE.

"Give but a prompt—a cunning wit,
And villainy shall win,
While all the virtues sit
And meditate on sin."

The above seems all too true, especially every presidential year.

Only this morning a friend remarked: "Well, it does seem as though evil workers are much more active than we who are working along the line of reform."

"Yes," I replied, "they only serve one master, while the most of us work for God, keeping one eye on Madam Grundy, fearing lest we ruffle her good nature and fall short of all the social enjoyments around us."

Before we can accomplish what God requires of us we must be converted to the great principles of truth that underlie all ethical questions. Just so far as we have known the truth, just so far we have given ourselves to this work. If the truth be not planted deeply within us, its roots are not freshened by the "Rivers of Waters," and they must wither and die.

All through this sun-pouring weather I have received excellent reports of work done in many quarters. One such report from De Pere closes with the words: "We have some grand women up this way!" Such women are needed throughout the country.

WORK ACCOMPLISHED.

The third district held a convention at Oregon. The program consisted of a Bible reading, "The Master has come and calleth for thee," by Mrs. W. A. Reed; paper, "Why do I belong to the W. C. T. U.?" by Miss Pennhaglegan, and "What is the Local Union doing for Temperance?" by Mrs. Ellsworth; parliamentary drill, led by Rev. Ella E. Bartlett, Madison, and evening lecture, by Mrs. M. A. B. Smith, district president; subject, "The Liquor Laws of Wisconsin."

Jefferson county held its fifth convention at Lake Mills. Mrs. Williams read a paper, "What shall we do with our Girls?" Mrs. Rogers, of Fort Atkinson, read a helpful paper on "Finance," and a Demorest medal contest was held in the evenings, but a greater part of the time was occupied in discussing plans for the future.

Taylor held its convention in Medford. Mrs. G. I. Follett, district president, and our state organizer, Miss Lois Russell, were present and helped to render the meetings very interesting. A large audience listened in the evening to a presentation of the work of the W. C. T. U.

Waukesha union has a reading and lunch room. In three months it made a net profit of $82.93.

Fort Howard has an L. T. L. of 100 members. This union holds parlor meetings with 100 in attendance. Dallas union is composed of members from two townships, Dallas and Prairie Farm. There are no saloons in either place, but many who drink and favor the liquor traffic. Professing Christians prove a stumbling block with their cider. The union has decided to commence a systematic distribution of literature. Durand is doing faithful work, although the members miss the presence of our former state president (Mrs. Amy Kellogg Morse), she having resided in that city after her marriage. At Durand there have been three saloons, but one saloon-keeper has gone into the grocery business, another into a furniture store, and the third has a large family of boys and therefore opened a harness shop in which his boys are to learn the trade. Here are two families who have gone to producing something, instead of living upon the products of others, and the grocery man will prove, if honest, a great convenience to his neighbors instead of a nuisance.

Pine Grove reports interest continually on the increase. One year ago they numbered fourteen, but now have thirty-one members.

Windsor follows the course of reading given in THE UNION SIGNAL, and, besides other good works, have seen that temperance instruction is given in the public school.

The Marshfield union has had the care of the public library for several years. After much petitioning the city council voted them $150. They immediately opened a reading room, in which are kept fresh magazines and papers, besides fifty new books added to the old ones. Its sewing school for girls is also well attended.

Green Bay held a mite-box social in the parlors of the First Presbyterian church. About ninety ladies assembled, fifteen of whom had mite-boxes. After a talk about the glorious Temple by Mrs. Alma Robb, and many other interesting exercises, the boxes were opened and found to contain thirty-four dollars, a large sum considering the short time since distribution. Many more boxes were taken for another trial.

The West Side, Eau Claire union regrets the resignation of its president, Mrs. H. T. Jones, whose failing health prevents her filling the office which she has held ever since the union was organized. Arena union lost its hall through a fire originating in a saloon; feel thankful the organ and library were saved. They hope to build a temperance temple in the future and have done profitable work through the year, although visited by sickness.

Lodi holds its meetings in the Baptist church. Its membership has more than doubled during the past year. They held a "Tobacco contest" in which the effects of narcotics were set forth by seven young ladies from twelve to seventeen years of age. Miss Aggie Storie won the prize. The essays were original. They also found time to hold a social for the benefit of the Temple.

All the members of Muknanago union take THE UNION SIGNAL and after reading send it to friends further west. They use monthly leaflets and feel that people are interested in their meetings. New London, with its forty members, is very active in circulating petitions and literature, raising funds for various objects and holding a Sunday evening service. River Falls has been greatly encouraged by the interest excited by two Demorest contests. Each contestant, with the exception of the winners, was given a basket of flowers, their presentation being a beautiful feature of the program.

Tomahawk, though small in number, is not discouraged, for it considers its mission is to keep the temperance work before the public until it is universally received. Waupaca works on with good will although the members do not see the fruits.

Berlin feels happy over its new quarters and the fact that its influence is being felt in the homes of the city. The members of Viola union take an active part in school-meetings along with other temperance work. Racine reports a very interesting lecture by Mrs. S. M. Perkins, an Ohio white-ribboner, and Prof. Marx gave half the proceeds of a lecture on "The Holy Land" to the union. Whitewater has an L. T. L. of one hundred members, while Sparta union has become the possessor of an old-time saloon building, which is to be used as a coffee-house and reading room. A fountain will be erected in front of the building as a thank-offering for the no-license law that passed this spring. The unions of Wisconsin enjoy having our National lecturers with them.

Mrs. Mary C. Leavitt, our round-the-world missionary, has been with us and those who have been privileged to hear her are very enthusiastic in her praise. Evansville union, with its invited guests, visited our new state president, Mrs. Vie Campbell, at her home. Speeches by men and women, songs and recitations, made a very enjoyable program, and after a bountiful repast a twenty dollar collection was taken up.

I cannot close this letter without mentioning the grand opportunity that was given ex-Gov. St. John, of Kansas, to place prohibition before a large audience at Monona Lake Assembly, Madison. A Prohibitionist, a Democrat and a Republican spoke on that day; the fact had been thoroughly advertised and over ten thousand people came to see and hear. St. John's speech made a great impression and many will carry with them the object lesson given when the speaker, placing a large sheet of tin in a chair said: "This is what the Republican party is fighting for, and" (drawing a smiling boy to his side) "this is what the Prohibition party is fighting for."

MARYLAND MATTERS.

Glyndon Park prohibition camp closed August 2d, after a most successful season beginning July 1st. The following well-known National speakers and workers took part in one or more of the meetings: Hon. John P. St. John, Col. Geo. W. Bain, Dr. A. B. Leonard, Rev. Anna Shaw, Rev. Wm. H. Boole, Mrs. Ella A. Boole, A. M., Mrs. Helen G. Rice, Miss L. J. Newcomb, Hon. A. G. Wolfenbarger, Rev. John Hector, Mrs. Amanda Smith, M. Van B. Bennett, Miss Elizabeth U. Yates, Prof. A. W. Hawks and John R. Clarke. Maryland Prohibitionists were well represented by Hon. Wm. Daniel, candidate with St. John in the presidential campaign of 1884, W. Frank Tucker, state organizer of the Prohibition party, Dr. P. C. Williams, of Baltimore, Rev. J. W. Rogan, of Westminster Presbyterian church, whose brave pulpit work in Baltimore for prohibition is well worth a wide following, Rev. W. T. D. Clemm, one of the veterans in the field, Edwin Higgins, president for several years of the State Temperance Alliance, Levin S. Melson, Wm. Silverwood, J. W. Wheatley, Eben Hearn, Rev. R. I. Coursey, Rev. A. S. Mowbray, Rev. G. C. Bacon and many others of like standing.

The musical program was admirably carried out by the Walter Harman Quartette, the Hudson trio, Prof. A B. Huckins, of Nebraska, Miss Lily Runals, of New York, and much excellent amateur talent. The spirited character of the musical selections, both in words and air, the strain of victory throughout, was a subject of comment and a valuable object lesson to those preparing for "annual conventions" or similar meetings.

"Juniors' Day" was among the pleasant innovations, and resulted in the formation of a state Junior League in the interests of prohibition with Charles R. Wood as president. John Lloyd Thomas, of New York, was one of the speakers of this day.

July 21 was given over to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union! The platform was a feast to the eyes with its masses of green and its multitude of blooms—the first decorations of the kind there during the camp. Tiny white ribbon bows dotting the letters W. C. T. U., made of green, was one of the unique and prominent attractions. Mrs. E. A. Robinson, of Baltimore, a state vice-president, was in charge. Three of the state officers, Mrs. Baldwin, Miss Cathcart and Mrs. Lake were on the platform, also Mrs. E. B. Murdoch, one of the ablest veterans in the work, Mrs. W. W. Matthews, Mrs. A. H. Eaton, Mrs. J. F. Dix, Mrs. Perry, of Baltimore, Mrs. L. M. Corey, Miss Carlisle, Mrs. A. M. Hopkins, Mrs. J. C. Carpenter and other members of the state union.

Mrs. Boole, of New York, spoke on methods of work, dwelling mainly on ways and means by which the regular meetings of local unions can be made interesting and instructive; Mrs. Rice, of Boston, told of work for and with the children; Miss Cathcart read a descriptive report of the great work at headquarters, Baltimore; Mrs. Matthews read a paper by Mrs. Murdoch, on narcotics; and Mrs. Lake spoke briefly on this, and also in deprecation of the popular sentiment that holds the mother responsible in the training of children, to the utter ignoring, as a rule, of the responsibility of the father.

Mrs. Baldwin, state president, gave an encouraging and inspiring talk, urging complete trust in God, as to the time and means for bringing about the consummation of our desires in the prohibition of the liquor traffic, that it is "not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit, saith the Lord," that in a way we know not, and at a time least expected, this would probably be reached. Mrs. Eaton gave a forcible and finished Bible reading, and Mrs. Robinson spoke on various phases of the work as they were presented in turn. Rev. Clinton B. Adams was among the speakers, and little Carrie Foster, the possessor of an L. T. L. medal, gave a most effective recitation. The Walter Harman Quartette, and Professor Huckins rendered invaluable assistance by their music. The "Bonnet Brigade," one of the Professor's songs, was to many a new and amusing picturing of the white ribbon hosts. The exercises were considered by many the best yet held by the W. C. T. U. on their "day" at this popular camp.

The annual convention of the Prohibition party of Maryland was held at the camp July 27. The heat was intense, but not equal in intensity to the spirit of a goodly number of the men in this warfare. For, determined, apparently, not to "mind this thing of the flesh," over two hundred of them gathered in Baltimore at a point some distance from the railway station, and preceded by a band of music, marched two abreast, with flying colors, through the center of the city to the train for Glyndon. They were met at Glyndon by the children and others from the camp, about a quarter of a mile distant, and greeted with the "campaign yell" of the party. They were then quickly formed into line again, and with the children also in line as escorts, marched to the camp.

Twenty counties of the twenty-three of the state, and three legislative districts of Baltimore City were represented in the convention by one hundred and ninety-six delegates. The platform adopted was similar to that indorsed at the last convention of the organization, but with enlarged boundaries. The suffrage plank seemed particularly well expressed, viz.: "That the right of suffrage rests on no mere circumstance of race, color, sex, or nationality, and where from any cause it has been withheld from persons of suitable age with mental and moral qualifications for the exercise of an intelligent ballot, it should be restored by the people through the legislatures of the several states on such basis as they may deem wise." As suffrage irrespective of sex was only adopted by the convention of 1891, and after considerable discussion, this is a great forward stride. The italics are mine.

Maryland may rejoice in this and also in the fact, that though numbered among the Southern conservative states it was on her soil the victory was won for representation, irrespective of sex, in the General Conference of the great Methodist Protestant church, held recently.

"For ever the truth comes uppermost,
And ever is justice done."

The last annual convention of the state W. C. T. U. was held in Westminster, same town in which the above-mentioned conference was held. At the time the final vote of the conference was taken on this vital question, the church was crowded, and the scene was one of enthusiasm and anxiety. The women applauded the speakers favorable to their side, but were promptly hushed by the president's gavel. On one side of the church were the young women of the Western Maryland College (where a wide-awake Y was organized during the convention), while the young men of the college (many of them honorary members of the Y), were in the gallery, and in other parts of the church. These did not hesitate at every opportunity to give expression to their sympathy with the affirmative side of the question, and when the vote was announced, crowded about Mrs. St. John and the Rev. T. B. Appleget, of New York, who had led the woman's cause to victory.

Mrs. St. John has won high favor everywhere, press comments were most favorable, and great good was evidently accomplished for our work by her presence with us. State work is flourishing. Thirteen unions have been organized since my last letter, and many of the old unions visited and strengthened by Mrs. Haslup, an admirable state organizer.

Kent county convention was held recently at Chestertown, and was a success in every respect, although from the conservative character of the place many timid ones feared a failure as far as the public was concerned. A large number attended the day meetings, and the evening meeting was crowded to excess. Two of the state officers, Mrs. Baldwin and Mrs. Lake, were present, addresses were made by several ministers, by the editor of the Kent News, and by several bright and earnest members of the union. The reports read were of a most interesting character, and showed much valuable work done in various lines. The evening was given over to the Y's, and an entertainment, more fully appreciated by an audience and more thoroughly enjoyed, it would be difficult to imagine.

Mrs. Ella A. Boole, A. M., of New York, will be one of the speakers at the annual meeting of the state union, in Elkton, Cecil county, October 5, 6 and 7. M. A. L.

ILLINOIS.

State Motto:—All Illinois for God and temperance.
State Flower:—The white Chrysanthemum.

There is an entertaining article in The Chautauquan of last May, entitled "Flower Shows in the United States," and I am both pleased and proud that the state of Illinois has chosen this queenly flower for its floral emblem. The chrysanthemum is at the front in the great and popular flower shows, and the English language is strained to find suitable adjectives wherewith to clothe this brilliant product of the florists' gardens, this regal, gorgeous importation from Japan. It has been discovered that the Japanese had chrysanthemum shows over one thousand years ago, and "the flower is the imperial or government seal for public business, and is embroidered on the flags and banners, and printed on all official documents of that very flowery kingdom." Thus you see our state flower has an aristocratic, yes, even a royal lineage.

All this leads me to say that Illinois is quite worthy of having such royal symbols of power and beauty, but just now I wish to confine my boasting to the worth and work of our own white-ribboners, who number over sixteen thousand, without counting our honorary members. True, Ohio is the Crusade state and must forever wear that crown. God bless her, but why did Ohio ever permit any state to outrank her in point of membership? What do you say to using THE UNION SIGNAL as a telephone, ring up Mrs. Monroe, president of Ohio, and make her tell? "Live so worthily that you can always think well of yourself," is a motto of which no one need be ashamed; that means for each to do her best.

Perhaps some of you, dear sisters, have wondered why our beloved state reporter, Mrs. G. H. Read, has not given us of late, more news from the field. I feel quite sure, however, that you will all think and speak of her very tenderly when you come to know that for long, weary months she has stood under the greatest shadow that can hover over a woman's life. Anxiety has forced its presence into her heart by day and by night for nearly if not quite a year, as she has looked into the pale face of her husband, so full of the marks of suffering, and yet so sunny with the "shine" of patience. Thousands of prayers have gone up to the dear Father above to spare her the bitter cup; but it seems now as if the work of Gordon H. Read, that true, noble man of God, who has stood from the very beginning so royally for our cause, and so tenderly by the side of his faithful, devoted wife, is nearly ended. We still hope and pray, and speak softly, but we all with our dear sister, Mrs. Read, say even in tears, "Thy will be done."

The work in our state does not seem to flag. In a few unions the attention to the dues has not been as prompt as it should have been. If we come up to the state convention in October, with a reported membership of less than 16,000, whose fault will it be? Will it be your president's who has sought with every mental resource in her power to bring before local unions, and especially before local treasurers the necessity of calling upon every member once, twice or a dozen times if need be, until the "dues" are paid and the regular movement of our W. C. T. U. pendulum indicates that our work has assumed clock-like order? What a blessed thing it is to work systematically, orderly, regularly! I wish that every union in the state would make itself a model in that direction. That would mean the payment of dues in the beginning of our fiscal year; that would mean a prompt response with the one dollar from each union, for the Illinois Watch Tower; that would mean the same alacrity in regard to the dollar for the National Hospital, and then the unions could settle down to their regular work with a free and comfortable conscience.

The county conventions this year have been marked for good attendance and most interesting exercises. I have attended twenty-five county conventions and county conferences in Illinois this year, and have observed with great satisfaction the advance made in the intelligence and general plans of work applied. Some people are so afraid they will make a blunder that they will hesitate very long before they will try to speak, or write a paper, or, if in convention make or speak to a motion. I am delighted to see a wonderful gain on all these lines. Will every woman who has tried to conquer her timidity in these directions accept my personal thanks.

Illinois still stands at the front of the long line of states in subscriptions to our grand National organ, THE UNION SIGNAL, so says our always faithful state superintendent of literature, Helen Walker. Our state paper, The Illinois Watchtower, has continued to make friends all the year, and while we hold it second to THE UNION SIGNAL, we believe it is too dear to us to be given up. How we hail its coming, and eagerly read what our sisters are doing!

The district conventions are now fairly begun. The fifteenth led the way, August 17 to 19, with a splendid program well carried out, and the district did itself honor in reëlecting Mrs. Goldman as its standard-bearer for another year. She does not say to her women, "go," but "come," and she leads the way. The fifteenth district will hold the state convention within its borders, in the lovely city of Danville, October 4 to 7 inclusive.

I have reserved for the last the best news of all, viz., that in no one year have I found so many new workers for our harvest field. The failing health of our devoted young sister, Miss Anderson, president of the sixth district, made it necessary for them to secure some one to finish out the year. Mrs. Grout, the recording secretary of the state, appealed to me, and the Lord brought to me at the Warren county convention in June, just the very one, Miss M. Lena Morrow, a noble, highly educated Christian girl, who turned her face away from positions of higher salary and gave herself gladly to the work in that district. Mrs. Grout writes me recently, "We are in love with Miss Morrow, and so glad you gave us the first chance at her." Another choice spirit and capable worker is Mrs. Daisy H. Carlock, who has been a teacher for a few years in Berea College, Ky. She has resigned her position in that school, on my urgent solicitation, and writes me, "I am at your service; command me for whatever work you choose to give, but please let me go into the thickest of the fight." God bless her! If she stays in Illinois W. C. T. U. work she will find "lovely fighting" almost anywhere. Then we have Miss Mary C. Gregory who is acting as corresponding secretary pro tem. Her life has been given to God in the school room for many years, but now she is "one of ours" in the comradeship of W. C. T. U. service. If she could look over my shoulder as I write these words, she would say, "Oh, don't, Mrs. Rounds, I don't want to be praised," but she isn't looking over my shoulder, and she shall be praised for she is one of the truest souls I ever met. Her faith and fidelity burn like a steady flame, and she loves and prays much for our workers and work. Then there is Mrs. Nettie L. Hobbs who did such good work in the twentieth district last spring; she made her first venture in field work on that trip and the "Watch-Tower" has spoken for her.

At the twentieth and eighteenth districts conventions, Mrs. Carlock kindly offered to fill my engagements, owing to my extreme weariness and many cares pressing in all directions. Word comes to me from Mrs. Spilman, of Tamaroa, that steady W. C. T. U. light in Southern Illinois, that "Mrs. Carlock's addresses were well received, and her talks in the convention very helpful." If I could see every district with a capable, well paid president in the field, I believe we would see Illinois W. C. T. U. with a 50,000 membership.

Dear sisters, think of our advance these last two years. Think of our school suffrage law which means so much to the children.

And now about our coming state convention. The church where we are to assemble is beautiful and well supplied with rooms of all kinds, large and small for committees.

Of course the Danville union will put in the shade all former efforts to make our annual harvest home a good time. Miss Lodie Reed, the corresponding secretary of Indiana, in reply to my invitation for the white-ribboners of her state to attend our convention, replied, "We'll be there—at least some of us." Our diamond contest on Tuesday evening, October 4, in the Grand Opera House, will be an event worth recording in the history of our state. Let every district be sure and send the name of one at least who is eligible to contest for the prize, to Miss Emma Norton, of Marengo. We are going to make that evening a wonderful evening in our history, and if anybody who might have entered the lists refuses to do so, it will be to their discredit. Who knows the name of the one who will win the prize? Sometimes the judges make most wonderful decisions! and at all events, although but one contestant can secure it, all may win a better prize, even the prize of a duty well done. That is a diamond which outshines all earthly stones. Let us rally to the contest. And another lovely thing to tell is that Mrs. Frances Barnes, of New York, National superintendent of Y work, is to speak on Thursday, the Y evening. Every union in the state is entitled to send two delegates; send them with instructions to remain until the convention closes.

For myself, September is full of work. The morning of the ninth I leave for Brookings, South Dakota, to attend the state convention and to give the annual address. Then I am engaged for several district conventions in my own state, where I love most to be, and after September 22 will be at home gathering up the final details prior to our descent upon Danville. Now, beloved comrades, let us keep cheery and work hard to bring success.

MRS. LOUISE S. ROUNDS,
State President.

NEBRASKA.

WORK AT CHAUTAUQUAS.

The Dawes county convention certainly found something new under the sun at their recent gathering at Whitney. The meeting opened with a good representation and the presence of county officers and district president, Mrs. Glasner. A "workers' round table" so interested the delegates that it was necessary to call a halt for dinner. The report of departments in the afternoon showed activity in all directions. Threatening clouds caused the omission of the evening program, the address of Mrs. Glasner on "Blood Money," being given in the afternoon. A steady rain set in and was still falling when morning dawned. The White river which divides the town had risen in the night, bridges were rendered unsafe and the convention found itself standing on two sides of a muddy, impassable stream, fully two hundred feet wide. Hearts beneath white ribbons are not easily dismayed, however. After the rain had ceased, the secretary seated herself on a gossamer with a damp knoll for a writing desk, and "took the minutes" which were shouted across the river. Led by the president, with raised voices, all repeated the twenty-third Psalm and then with Mrs. Davenport's clear tones cutting through the sound of rushing waters, the Lord's prayer was repeated more quietly. The remaining business of the convention was transacted, election of officers (by acclamation), appointment of superintendents, etc., all shouted across the water, and the convention adjourned by singing the temperance doxology in time and tune beyond criticism! So ended a genuine cold-water convention.

Neither summer's heat nor winter's cold lessen the ardor or retard the work of our earnest W. C. T. U. women, nor do Nebraska winds and floods of water prove more than a temporary check upon their vigorous proceedings. The long continued rains of the spring and subsequent floods did interfere with the attendance and complete success of many of our conventions, but in no case did any of them prove a failure. There was always at least one woman to "hold the fort." At the Gage county convention, held in Blue Springs, no trains run upon the first day of the convention, bridges were washed away upon the country roads and no delegates appeared. Our ubiquitous state president had, however, managed to slip into town before the general stand-still, so the convention was opened, an address given in the evening, and late next day, at the first moment possible, the county president, Miss Anna Goudy, arrived with a number of delegates, and the necessary business was completed with dispatch. Excellent papers were read by Mrs. Hawley, of Liberty, and Mrs. Sillik, of Wymore. Miss Goudy, declining to serve longer, Mrs. Vreeland, of Blue Springs, was elected president.

The first district convention held at Auburn was also greatly interfered with by high water and washouts. Two delegates and the speaker, Mrs. Cooley, of Lincoln, were the only ones to appear the first day. But in the evening a Demorest contest was held, in which six young men from fifteen to nineteen years of age gave their stirring recitations. Mrs. Cooley, in her sweet, motherly way, presented the medal to Harry Harmon. A telegram was received from the president, Mrs. Fulton, of Pawnee City, that she was on the way with the Pawnee delegation, but owing to the condition of the roads they did not arrive till three o'clock the next morning. In the meantime Mrs. Battles presided. The program was well carried out. Mrs. Cooley gave a very interesting lecture which was well attended. The old officers were reëlected.

The fifth district has 525 members, and had present at a convention held at Edgar, thirty-two officers and delegates, Mrs. M. S. Putnam presiding. The old officers were reelected, and nineteen departments of work provided with superintendents.

The sixth district held its annual convention at Aurora in June. Mrs. Hitchcock, our state president, was present, ready to be of any service, as occasion required. The L. T. L's of the district were represented by delegates bringing their banners. Miss J. M. Klinck, the district superintendent, conducted the exercises of the L. T. L's, which were most excellent. Miss Klinck seems particularly adapted to this work, and greatly endears herself to both parents and children. Mrs. Blair, the state superintendent of the L. T. L., was also present, and a great help and inspiration to the convention, as she is to the work in the district. The musical association of Aurora added greatly to the enjoyment of the occasion. Mrs. Lizzie Ferguson, of York, was reëlected president.

The W. C. T. U. of Nebraska finds no time for a summer vacation. The intensely hot days of July and August witnessed the successful operation of four Chautauqua assemblies within our borders, at each of which our state union sustains a school of methods. At Crete, Mrs. Octavia Jones, of Hastings, editor of our state paper, The Union Worker, had charge of the work. She was ably assisted by various superintendents. Mrs. Blair spoke in the interests of the L. T. L., and gave a bright chalk-talk to the children who gathered [illegible] superintendent of scientific temperance instruction, followed, in the interests of our boys and girls at school. Mrs. Smith, of Lincoln, told how to work for railroad men. Mrs. Clark, matron of the Open Door at Omaha, reached the hearts of all as she talked of the need of social purity and how to secure it. Unable to be present herself, Mrs. Newman sent a very acceptable substitute, Mrs. Bigelow, of Lincoln, who told of the great work done by the flower mission and in the jails and prisons. On Sunday the W. C. T. U. united with the other organizations in a consecration service. A delightful addition to the program was a choice Bible reading by Rev. Miss Townsley, who also presided over the question-box, to the satisfaction of all present. The headquarters were cared for by Mrs. Abbott, of Crete, and proved a haven of refuge to many white-ribboners. The meetings were held here until the boundaries proved too narrow, when the Congregational headquarters were generously offered for our use. The spirit of the whole assembly was thoughtful and earnest, and our workers were refreshed in spirit by the hours spent there.

At Fremont Chautauqua, Dean Wright, conductor, the state president, Mrs. Hitchcock, superintended the school of methods. Returning from the Cincinnati convention, she went directly to the assembly grounds, where headquarters were maintained and services held in the large state W. C. T. U. tent. Fremont Assembly is but two years old, and we have no state building as yet. Five of the meetings were held in the pavilion—Social Purity, Parlor, Franchise, Children's Hour and Temperance day, with Bain and Gault as speakers. The state superintendents present were Mrs. Clark, Mrs. Blair, Mrs. Moore (Y's), and Mrs. Williams, parlor meetings. The franchise meeting called out a large attendance. At one of the meetings Mrs. C. H. Walker presented a paper, "Business Methods for the W. C. T. U.," which was highly commended, and a synopsis of which was given in one of the local papers. In all, twelve meetings were held. The management were most kind and accommodating, rendering all assistance possible.

Beatrice Inter-state Assembly has always given the W. C. T. U. a prominent place upon its program. This year was no exception. The fine large building known as Willard Hall, built by the first district, has passed into the hands of the state union, and the state vice-president, Mrs. C. M. Woodward, was given charge of the school of methods. Large numbers gathered each day in Willard Hall, and many expressions of pleasure and satisfaction were heard. In order to meet another engagement, Mrs. Woodward was obliged to leave several days before the close of the Assembly, much to the regret of those who had enjoyed her instruction. One department of our work was especially favored by the management this year—that of franchise. Although suffrage day was not under the charge of the W. C. T. U., a great impetus was given public sentiment in one of our most important departments.

The addresses of the day were given by Miss Susan B. Anthony, and Mrs. Laura D. Gordon, of California. On a later day, Mrs. Clara B. Colby, editor of the Woman's Tribune, gave her lecture on Wyoming, full of truth, logic, and convincing argument. It was enthusiastically received. Suffrage sentiment is strong in the west, and great disappointment is felt that the new "party of reform," the great "People's" party, at its convention in Omaha, did not take a stand for justice to women, but contented itself with the clause in its platform, promising to "move forward until every wrong is righted, and equal rights and equal privileges securely established for all the men and women of this country." As they rent the air with shouts and rapturous applause over this clause, the band very appropriately struck up "The Girl I Left Behind Me." But look out, brothers, she may get there before you.

The work of the flower mission and jails and prisons, under the loving care of Mrs. Angie F. Newman, is deserving of special mention. The work has been so well cared for that it has yearly increased and reached out through various parts of the state, and Flower Mission Day is observed in nearly every union. This tender little poem was written by a prisoner in the jail at Auburn, after a visit of the women with flowers.

"Who knows but the life of a flower is immortal
And its soul passes forth in its breath of perfume,
And rising, it enters through heaven's bright portal,
To blossom anew into beauty and bloom?

"Who knows but the flowers, so fragile and fleeting,
As tints of the rainbow, or drop of the dew—
The blossoms you bring us in their beauty and sweetness
Are emblems of thoughts that are tender and true?"

Yankee Hill union, near Lincoln, celebrated its third anniversary recently. This union also entertained the Lancaster county convention in June. Twenty-seven delegates were present, Mrs. S. C. O. Upton, president of the county, presiding. In her annual address Mrs. Upton remarked that the temperance cause should be recognized by the churches as church work on the same footing as the missionary cause, while she deplored the fact that the W. C. T. U. is not as cordially welcomed in the churches as are the missionary societies. An address of welcome was given by Miss Lehne, teacher of the school, responded to by Mrs. Rev. Wehn, of Roca. Miss Osborne presented greetings from the Baptist missionary society. Various departments were reported—Mrs. Professor Hartley presenting the Sunday school work; Mrs. A. Roberts, scientific temperance instruction; Mrs. Bigelow, the foreign work; Mrs. Trester, legislation and petitions. Mrs. Williams read a paper on social purity, and Mrs. Wilson, state superintendent of franchise, gave an address on "Facts About Franchise." An excellent Bible reading was given by Mrs. Bowers, and the young people rendered choice music. Rev. C. E. Bentley, chairman state Prohibition Committee, gave a fine address. The delegates were most hospitably entertained.

Antelope county convention was held at Elgin, presided over by Mrs. Childs. A very full and instructive program was carried out, consisting of papers on L. T. L. work, by Mrs. McDougal and Mrs. Suddaby, one on "Franchise," by Mrs. Cary, and on "Narcotics," by Miss Libbey. Mrs. Peterson spoke on "Mothers' Meetings," and Rev. Tonge [illegible] temperance work in England. In the evening Mrs. Woodward addressed the convention on the "Royal Progress of Reform." The Neligh Y's rendered beautiful music upon this evening, and the Oakdale Y's gave an Indian club exercise which was highly entertaining. Mrs. Childs was reëlected president.

Valparaiso is a small union blessed with a live president, and though only the "faithful few" work, they sustain a reading room, mothers' meetings, a column in their paper, and a monthly literary meeting. Some of their ways of earning money are unique and may be helpful to other unions. One member baked bread, bringing it to the rooms for sale, reserving only enough to pay for the flour; others brought jelly and catsup to be sold; those who lived on a farm brought apples and farm produce. The wife of a merchant brought little articles from the store, the profits of which were donated. Two members sold ice cream at a picnic and made five dollars. Two others had a lunch counter at a G. A. R. reunion and took in fifteen dollars. One member knit lace enough to amount to two dollars. Now they are preparing for a sale of useful articles and getting up an album quilt. "Where there is a will there is a way."

Mrs. Sue Wehn reports Roca union as holding mothers' meetings, gospel temperance meetings and sustaining a flourishing L. T. L. They respond to all calls made upon them. Dependable!

Harvard union mourns the loss of a prominent worker, Mrs. E. J. Moger, who died in great peace and trust. She was one of the pioneer settlers and always bore her part in every good work.

Miss Mary Ripley, of Kearney, our energetic state superintendent of scientific temperance instruction, has been honored by an appointment to the Advisory Council of the Woman's Branch of the World's Congress Auxiliary on Education.

Official Communications.

TO STATE SECRETARIES.

The time for the National Convention is drawing near, and important communications must pass between the National and state corresponding secretaries. I find that some of the states and territories have made changes in their officers during the year and no list of the new officers has been sent me. In various ways some of the names have come to me, but not all, and important documents have failed to reach the proper person.

Will not each state having made changes in its officiary send a correct list to

Yours sincerely,
CAROLINE B. BUELL.
The Temple, Chicago.

JUVENILE DEPARTMENT.

May we not have on September 28 a very general celebration of Miss Willard's birthday by our L. T. L. companies? We can give the children no better lessons than those out of Miss Willard's consecrated, helpful life. Especially let us emphasize on this coming birthday her devotion to the mother who has passed into the heavens. Let us help the boys and girls to realize the beauty and blessedness of the filial love which smoothed the pathway of that mother to the very gates of the celestial city. The knowledge of this has made us older ones better; it will enrich the children's lives also.

From The Young Crusader you have learned of the new program for this birthday celebration, entitled, "Fairy Folk," which "pictures the work of the Seed-fairies, Blossom-fairies, etc., and the mischief done by the evil spirits that spoil the grape juice and the grains."

The Willard cards should be given to the children as souvenirs of the day.

HELEN G. RICE,
National Superintendent.

LITERATURE DEPARTMENT.

To State Superintendents of the Literature Department:

BELOVED HELPERS:—Just a word to stir up your minds by way of remembrance. The annual convention at Denver approaches, and the report of the National superintendent depends largely upon you. Do not fail to gather up the fragments and forward such report as may result to my address, not later than October 1, 1892, that ample time may be given in which to summarize the same for use at the National Convention. Let us unite in this that the best report ever carried may be the result of the year's work.

Yours for success,
F. H. RASTALL,
The Temple, Chicago. Nat. Supt.

CHINESE LITERATURE.

You all wish to become immediately acquainted with the W. C. T. U. Chinese literature. It is excellent. There are three leaflets purposely translated for the department, others by missionaries, in all twenty-six, five of which are on narcotics and alcohol, the others, gospel leaflets. Send for price list and see that each Chinaman is provided.

Address
MRS. M. S. CAREY.
San Jose, Cal. Nat. Supt.

SYSTEMATIC GIVING.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Please kindly call attention to a valuable paper, published mainly in the interest of proportionate giving and consecrated wealth, entitled, The Worker, issued at Pittsburg, Pa. Terms, fifty cents per annum. It is a twelve-page monthly, full of suggestion and forcible in the presentation of its leading theme. I would especially commend it to the favorable notice of state superintendents and other workers in my department. Address, E. E., Box 63, Pittsburg.

Yours,
ESTHER TUTTLE PRITCHARD,
Western Springs, Ill. Nat. Supt.

IMMEDIATE AND IMPORTANT WORK.

It scarcely seems possible and is certainly not probable that after Congress has by so large a majority voted against Sunday opening of the Exposition, and the appropriation has been accepted with that condition, the same Congress at its next session should repeal its former action. Yet we are told the directory not only greatly desires this, but has strong hopes of carrying such a measure next winter; depending, doubtless, on securing votes from the great number of members who failed to vote on either side last winter.

Let us all ascertain what position our members took, and strengthen every doubtful man before the winter session of Congress. Should such a bill be introduced, of course we must all rush to its overthrow by letter and petition. But it is more likely the new Congress to meet March 4 will be relied on. Let us take a hand in the canvass.

Will not every state executive see that each Congressional candidate is interviewed and influenced if possible, to commit himself to Sunday closing and also to the banishment of liquor. Our petition covers both, and we are yet but half satisfied. Let the position of every candidate on these points be known early and published, that voters may act intelligently. Induce business men, ministers and Sunday Rest Leagues to help, and let us look after both points, each union requiring if it cannot influence one representative.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

ILLINOIS' CALL.

The nineteenth annual convention of the Illinois Woman's Christian Temperance Union will be held in Danville, October 4–7, inclusive. A large attendance is expected. Mrs. Frances Barnes, superintendent of the National Y work, will address the convention on the Y evening. Other prominent speakers and workers are expected.

MRS. LOUISE S. ROUNDS,
President,
MISS MARY C. GREGORY,
Cor. Sec. pro tem.

WORKERS IN COLORADO AND CALL FOR STATE CONVENTION.

It has been our good fortune to have with us of late Rev. Henrietta Moore, of Springfield, Ohio. No speaker ever visited Colorado that made more friends and left sweeter memories in the hearts of our people than did she, though she was with us but one month. Her sound, persuasive logic, her sweet, womanly presence, won all hearts, "Lengthened cords and strengthened stakes." Preceding her were Mrs. Hoffman, Mrs. Lathrap, Mrs. Woodbridge and Dr. Mary Wood Allen, through each one of these noble workers our numbers were increased and cause strengthened. And none bore away more "sheaves" than did Miss Moore, which is saying much, because all were greatly admired and beloved. The 16th of September Mrs. Hoffman comes to us again, when we expect a thorough awakening, and the results of all such effort we hope to see at the ballot box in November.

The thirteenth annual convention of the W. C. T. U. of Colorado will convene at Rocky Ford, September 16–19. Executive committee will meet the morning of the 15th at nine o'clock.

CALL FOR SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA STATE CONVENTION.

The tenth annual state convention of the W. C. T. U. of Southern California will be held in San Bernardino, October 5–8.

A meeting of the state executive committee will be held the day preceding the opening of the convention. It is very important that all members of the executive committee be present at this meeting. The state officers, state superintendents, and county presidents, and editor of state organ are members of this committee, and ex-officio members of the state convention. Presidents and delegates of local unions, whose dues have been paid, are also members of the convention.

Local unions are entitled to one delegate for every twenty paying members, or fraction thereof; unions having less than twenty paying members ere entitled to one delegate beside the president.

It is requested that each union send the names of its delegates to the president of the San Bernardino union, that the entertainment committee may provide for them.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE HOSPITAL NOTES.

Among the recent callers at the hospital were Miss Susy Gaston, Mrs. Gregory and Miss Griffin, of Mississippi. Miss Griffin found a Massachusetts room, a Dakota room, but no Mississippi room, and felt sure that her state would furnish a room when the attention of the unions was called specially to the work.

The matron and others of the hospital were the recipients of one dozen real live chickens this last week. The Dalton union thus remembered them, and many thanks are returned for the same. Mrs. Mary E. Dubudge, of Morrison, Ill., paid the hospital a pleasant call last week and gave a French coin which she highly prized, to help further the work of the hospital. Miss Alice M. Dunmar, of Crawford, Ill., remembered that the hospital had a building fund and added thereto.

The following letter has been received: "Inclosed please find an order for ten dollars from the Phœnix W. C. T. U. for the benefit of the National Temperance Hospital."

Another sister writes: "Please find inclosed a draft for two dollars for the National Temperance Hospital in place of fruits and jelly we were to send."

One of our officers was told recently by a late graduate of one of the New York medical schools that the professors had advocated the use of alcohol as a stimulant much less this past year than during any previous years. Friends, if you have not responded to Miss Willard's plea in our behalf you can still send your contribution. You know that "wealth well used is as the net of the sacred Fisher who gathers souls of men out of the deep," and that the hospital can rightfully ask for your help, for it is trying to demonstrate a principle that gives man protection when he helpless lies on beds of pain. When non-alcoholic medication has been fully demonstrated, this generation has builded strong for coming generations; for then one of the means of arousing a dormant appetite for strong drink, or the formation of the taste, will have been wiped out of existence.

CONCERNING ACCOMMODATIONS FOR VISITORS ATTENDING THE NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION.

Hotels and hotel rates for visitors at the National W. C. T. U. Convention to be held in Denver, October 28 to November 2, and for delegates preferring hotels, are being secured by the committee having the matter in charge.

One noticeable feature of Denver is the large number of family hotels or first-class boarding houses, not devoted to the transient trade. These have been taken into consideration as well as the regular hotels within a convenient distance of Trinity M. E. Church, in which the Convention is to be held, and convenient, also, to rapid transit by cable and electric lines.

Brown's Palace, very close to the church, will furnish entertainment at $3 and $4 per day according to location of rooms. This includes meals, as the hotel is conducted on the American plan. The Palace, just completed and furnished, is probably the finest west of Chicago, and superbly located. These rates are given upon the contingency of securing not less than fifty guests.

The Albany, corner of 17th and Stout, offers most reasonable rates, considering the excellence of the hotel, its advantageous location and admirable management. Room and meals, $3 per day, two persons occupying a room, $5 per day. The Albany is a favorite place for conventions. The use of the club rooms will be donated to the executive and delegates, if the Albany is chosen as headquarters. Its distance from the church is about four blocks and the managers are noted for their attention to the comfort of guests.

The Gilsey, 18th and Stout, will furnish rooms by the week, price $4 to $6, two occupying a room will pay nothing extra. Meals, short order. The proprietress is willing to do everything possible for the guests.

The Albert, 17th, between Glenarm and Welton, and distant three blocks from the church, offers pleasant and newly furnished rooms for $1, $1.25 and $1.50 per day. An attractive café gives meals at $1 per day; no bar.

St. James Hotel, Curtis, between 15th and 16th, makes reasonable rates. Cars pass the door.

Broadway Hotel: Rooms and board, $3 per day; two occupying the same room, $2.50 each; very convenient to the church; no bar.

The Ramona, 14th Avenue and South 14th.

L'Imperial, Court Place and 14th, and other family hotels conveniently located, will make reasonable rates, conditional upon having rooms to spare.

The Woman's Christian Association furnishes rooms and board at exceedingly moderate prices.

The Woman's Exchange—auxiliary to the W. C. T. U.—is conveniently located, furnishes meals on the short order system, and is convenient to many places where rooms can be secured.

A bureau of information will be established later. Meanwhile, it is desirable that the committee should know as certainly as possible the number of delegates and visitors to be expected, that arrangements can be made more definitely. Those delegates wishing to be together should definitely say so. For the present, all parties desiring information on this matter can address

REMEMBER

That on September 15, THE UNION SIGNAL will be devoted to the interests of the World's W. C. T. U.

The special number of THE UNION SIGNAL now being prepared for this memorial day, will excel all previous "special numbers."

Order early!

Order it to show outsiders what the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is doing in all nations!

Order it because strength at home will be increased by the knowledge of respect and admiration abroad!

AGENTS WANTED

For our books, which are unexcelled. We have the following list:

THE JUNIOR PARTNERS, by Abel M. Rawson, a new book of wonderful interest and power. Rev. Dr. Thompson writes concerning it: "I am enthused and uplifted." All who read commend it. It is a fascinating story, showing the temptations which come to business men. It also shows the relation of insanity to the drink traffic.

A YOUNG WOMAN JOURNALIST, edited by Frances E. Willard and Lady Henry Somerset, which is rapidly growing in favor. The success of one young life is portrayed in a manner that will stimulate others to like effort.

THE STORY OF A CLASSIC TOWN, by Frances E. Willard. A book for all interested in ascertaining how towns founded on temperance principles become safe places for the homes of intelligent, progressive people.

GLIMPSES OF FIFTY YEARS, the autobiography of Frances E. Willard. It is enough to say that 50,000 copies of this book have already been sold to indicate its popularity.

CHILDHOOD, ITS CARE AND CULTURE, by Mary Allen West. This is a help every mother and every teacher should own. Highly spoken of by all.

THE WORLD'S SPECIAL.

On our little Red Letter Day Calendar, September 22 is in red, because it is the birthday of the pioneer of all the around-the-world W. C. T. U. missionaries, and it is the desire of our National and World's President that this should be the day celebrated as World's W. C. T. U. day. It has therefore been determined that THE UNION SIGNAL for September 15th shall be devoted to the purpose indicated, and its contents will be of universal interest. As it will be sent to so many new unions and new members of old unions and to those not belonging to any union, it has been deemed wise to have an article prepared which shall give a brief epitome of the work of the W. C. T. U. from its inception until now, after it has attained a world-wide growth. This should be extensively scattered where it will do most good. It will also contain one for Thursday, September 22, for use in local unions, and one for Sunday, September 25, for public use. These programs will be prepared by Miss Willard. Important and interesting articles on the condition of the temperance cause in many countries will also appear.

The price of the World's special edition will be $1.50 per 100 when ordered in lots of 50 or more. A package of 10 voters' leaflets will be sent with every order for 100 copies. Address

"The youths of to-day will be the men of to-morrow, and those men must not reel if they will uphold the nation in dignity and power."

The Sunday-school scholars of to-day are the church of to-morrow, and those scholars must not fail to learn the "Thus saith God" on the alcohol question.

Where shall they learn it? Who is responsible for the teaching? What is the Christian church doing to teach the children that belong to it by birthright and adoption, the truths of God along this line?

One Thing

it is doing—that is, a part of the church is using

The Quarterly Temperance Lesson

in its Sunday-schools.

Many Schools

have not yet tried it. Is yours one of them?

The lesson for September 25 is one of unusual interest, and should be studied in all the Sunday-schools of our land. It will help to answer questions that arise in the minds of all our young people.

STOP DRINKING! "I CAN'T."

Nearly every person knows of some one who has the drinking habit fastened upon him—fastened so tightly that he is absolutely powerless to shake it off. He may not own it, not even to himself—but you know he is a slave to an appetite which, at times, at least, is utterly uncontrollable.

What this means to one who fully realizes his condition, words cannot describe. We, who may be more fortunate, watch him often, perhaps, without the sympathy that is his due. We see him try to stop drinking, and think that for a time he has succeeded; then away he goes "on a tear" and we wonder how it is possible for a man to be so miserably weak and foolish!

If we knew all, our wonder would be how, with that terrible craving at his vitals, he is able to resist even for a short time.

A craving on which will-power, moral suasion, the pledge and self-respect have no effect whatever, and which, until recently, has been an insurmountable bar to reform in thousands upon thousands of cases.

But the time has come when that craving can be stopped!

SURE—just as sure as it is possible to cure a cold or set a broken leg. The appetite can be eradicated; the system restored to its normal condition; the man placed back, so far as drinking is concerned, just where he was before he acquired the habit.

In other words, he is given "one more chance."

Ah, yes! But how long will it last? Will the appetite not return, and the patient soon be as bad as ever?

That depends on the man. The cure does not relieve him from the responsibility of being a free moral agent.

But he will have to learn how to drink all over again, and the effort required will be so great, that if the man is worth saving, he will never make it.

With these facts before you—mind they are Facts, not theories; facts established by indisputable evidence which will be cheerfully furnished—will you not take a little pains to call the attention of every person who has the drink habit fastened upon him, to perfected cure as performed at the National Bichloride of Gold Institute, corner Monroe Street and Hoyne avenue, Chicago.

This institution has the support of the leading clergymen and temperance workers of the land. Its founder and superintendent, Dr. Mark M. Thompson, has had seven years' experience in the study and treatment of inebriety, and his success is probably the most wonderful on record. His methods are absolutely safe; the treatment is scientific and the time passed at the Institute, during the short period necessary to bring about a cure, is without restraint and full to the brim with hope and joy and high resolve, and all that makes life worth living.

Hundreds of cases have been cured. In fact there has been no failure to cure in any case treated. This is also true of the opium habit. The most rigid investigation is invited. Our methods are sunlit.

Branch institutes are now being established throughout the United States and in foreign lands.

The stock of the company is now quite valuable, and only a small amount remains unsold. Small investors who wish to be associated with this grand work, and at the same time have their money bring them handsome returns, should investigate.

For further particulars regarding treatment or stock, address or apply to the

THE ADVANCE GUARD

for September is now ready. You, we are sure, will want it. Words of warmest commendation come from all quarters regarding it. The Cheeryvale Law Club continues its discussions. Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson contributes a poem of usual merit; answers to Bible Search Questions for August are given; Effie Jay Bee answers the question, "What's the Matter with Alcohol?" Faye Huntington Miller's story is continued; John G. Woolley contributes an article on "Christian Patriotism," and Alice M. Guernsey describes "The City Wonderful." In "The Way of the World," we are told what the brewers say. We quote from the introductory page: "In this number of the Advance Guard we open a new department with the expressive name, 'Ladies and Gentlemen!' Under it we shall give material for recitations and declamations, dialogues, and other helps for public meetings."

As stated before, you need it. Price, single copy, 5 cents per year, 50 cents.

READ THIS ONCE MORE.

You Should Help.

WHO? Why, every member of the W. C. T. U., and friends of our cause.

IN WHAT? In introducing into every Sunday-school the Temperance Lesson for September 25.

WHEN? Without delay. See the superintendent and tell him what a beautiful, illustrated Lesson he can secure, and how it will help in forming character to instill its teachings into the minds of the children.

BUT IF—Yes, if there is any obstacle, then vote money from the local treasury so that the truth in telling force can be carried to minds and hearts not yet reached.

Mrs. Helen G. Rice and Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson have done excellent work in the preparation of this Lesson and hundreds of thousands should be distributed.

Price, for 100, 65 cents; 500, $2.75; 1,000, $5. The Young Crusader and the Lesson will be sent on the following terms: For 100, $1; 500, $4.75; 1,000, $9; 2,000, $15; 5,000, $35; 8,000, $48. All orders between numbers named at the rate immediately preceding.

Order from the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, The Temple, La Salle and Monroe streets, Chicago, Ill., and in time for distribution in the Sunday-schools September 18, the Sunday preceding the Temperance Sunday, September 25.

A MEMENTO.

Readers of THE UNION SIGNAL who were interested in the memorial number commemorating the life and services of Madam Willard will be pleased to know that we have a very fine photograph of that venerable lady, copies of which can be secured for 25 cents each.

We will add this to our list of photographs which can be secured through service rendered in securing subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL. See notice elsewhere.

NOW IS THE TIME.

Of course you will want Willard souvenir cards to use on the occasion of the Harvest Home Festival. They are not only useful but beautiful. The autograph of Miss Willard is on each one, and in fac simile of her own handwriting is the wise advice, "Tell mother everything." On the reverse side are suitable Scripture texts. Let every child you can reach have one. Price per package of 10, 15c.

Washboards Make It Warm.

Bobbing up and down over them is pretty hot work. That rub, rub, rub on them is the best thing in the world to warm you up, and tire you out, and wear holes in light and delicate summer garments.

Why don't you use Pearline, and take it easy?

You can keep cool—and yet have the work better done. Pearline takes away the rubbing, and the washboard, and the warm work. It gives you more time to yourself—and saves your money.

THE CHILDREN WILL APPRECIATE.

Mrs. Emma R. Greene, superintendent of the L. T. L. work in Michigan, writes of the Sunday-school lesson for September as follows: "I do think that the lesson is just what the children will appreciate. Very often the children have asked me the question, 'Is the wine used at communion service intoxicating?' and they want to know all the whys and wherefores."

Children usually appreciate. The failure seldom can be traced to little folks. Let us see that all have the opportunity to enjoy this lesson. See price elsewhere.

Orders for the Fair number are still reaching this office, and if your fair has not been held you can still secure what you need. Do not put off ordering until the last day, however, but give us reasonable time for shipment. We do not need to tell of its merits; you have seen and read it. Do you not think it is exceedingly cheap? Where else could you get a paper equal to it for $1.75 per 100 or 1¾c per copy in 100 lots? How much good might 2c do when used for this purpose? We are holding the plates and can put them on the press and print what you need on short notice.

Signal Notes.

It is estimated that over nineteen millions of persons have been killed in war in the past century. When women can help decide about war such figures will be impossible.

The statement that two hundred thousand persons have been enrolled as members gives one some idea of the large field of influence reached by the C. L. S. C., since its organization fourteen years ago.

Notwithstanding so much has been written and said by the friends of restriction in favor of the Gothenburg system, the latest report from Stockholm, hitherto quoted as the model city under that system, shows an increase of over three hundred sentences for drunkenness in 1891, and also an increase of insanity from alcoholism.

The Agassiz Association, organized in 1875 to encourage the personal observation of nature among the pupils of a small school in Connecticut, has now spread to every part of the world, and has a total membership of twenty thousand. Collections of plants, animals, and minerals are made, papers have been published, museums started, and libraries founded.

Political campaigns are thought to be expensive luxuries in this day, but it was a costly affair even in the "good old times." A certain celebrated Yorkshire election of 1807 cost the three parties over two millions of dollars. One party hired twenty bruisers to intimidate voters. At another old time election, one candidate owned nine public houses, and kept the whole town drunk.

Unique among summer camps is the Missouri Sunday-school Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterians at Pertle Springs It comes near the close of a long series of assemblies held on the same grounds, our own School of Methods, under charge of the state W. C. T. U., being one of its predecessors. Up to the time of her mother's death Miss Willard expected to speak on the closing evening of this assembly for '92, and even in the following prostration from grief and care, she was loath to withdraw from the engagement. Under the circumstances, the management has generously excused her, of course. In spite of the disappointment, the assembly has had a delightful and successful session this year.

A citizen of Buffalo is responsible for the statement that the slums of Boston, New York and London cannot compare with Buffalo in openness of vice. Buffalo is the first lumber and grain port in the world and twenty-three railroads pass through it, so it not only employs thousands of men, but it is also the rendezvous for other thousands of homeless men. The resident portion of the slums numbers only three thousand and according to a policeman's statement it is hard to find a man over forty who was born there. "Them as ain't dead are in prison." Canal street, the main artery, is a solid mass of saloons and dives. Such a mass of humanity is capable of terrible crimes and of fomenting strikes and uprisings against law and order. Three missions are now settled in this leprous district, one of which is an incorporated company, composed of representative business men and known as the Christian Homestead Association. It operates two institutions, a boarding and lodging house and a mission. A mission for fallen women is under the charge of a lady who has voluntarily left a cultured home to work among the degraded. A sewing school and a kindergarten reach the children.

False Economy

Is practiced by many people who buy inferior articles of food because cheaper than standard goods. Surely infants are entitled to the best food obtainable. It is a fact that the Gail Borden "Eagle" Brand Condensed Milk is the best infant food. Your grocer and druggist keep it.

"What is meant by free 'alkali,' Doctor? I see it mentioned in the advertisements of Ivory Soap."

"'Free Alkali,' Madam, is the alkali which is not combined with the fats or oils of which the soap is made, due to the ignorance or carelessness of the soap maker. Soaps in which 'free alkali' is present are decidedly injurious to both the clothing and the skin when habitually used. I have seen reports of analysis made of the Ivory Soap by men eminent in our profession, and all pronounce it to contain no 'free alkali,' to be made with great care and of materials of the best quality, carefully selected, so I unhesitatingly recommend it for every purpose about the house for which good soap is required."

LOW RATE HARVEST EXCURSIONS.

The announcement that the North-Western Line, comprising over 8,000 miles of thoroughly equipped railway, has arranged to run two low rate Harvest Excursions during the months of August and September, will be gladly received by those who are interested in the development of the great West and Northwest, as well as by those who desire to visit this wonderfully productive region at a season of the year when exact demonstration can be made of the merits and advantages it offers to home-seekers and those in search of safe and profitable investments.

These excursions will leave Chicago on August 30th and September 27th, and tickets can be purchased at the very low rate of one fare for the round trip to points in Iowa, Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, Idaho and Montana. They will be strictly first-class in every particular and will be good for return passage at any time within twenty days from date of purchase. Full information concerning rates and arrangements for these excursions can be obtained upon application to any coupon ticket agent, or to W. A. Thrall, G. P. T. A., Chicago & North-Western R'y, Chicago.

It is noticeable how many so-called manufacturing towns tell what is going to be done, but few of them tell what is already done. Harvey is a remarkable exception to this rule. From its inception it has had continuous prosperity, and we commend Walter Thomas Mills & Co. for the care they have taken in making reliable statements. We have just been shown a book published by Walter Thomas Mills & Co. entitled "Harvey Illustrated," which they send free to any address, containing over twenty photographic views of Harvey and its surroundings, showing most wonderful results, and proving that a great town can be built on temperance principles. It is surprising to see so many immense factories gathered in one plaee in so short a period of time, and all of such good substantial character. The educational part has been well taken care of by Walter Thomas Mills & Co., who have erected a large, commodious academy which was open for school last January. Its June term closed with ninety three pupils. Harvey's greatest enterprise is the World's Fair Temperance Hotel now being built for the accommodation of 2,000 guests during the World's Fair on Block R, Academy Addition. Walter Thomas Mills & Co. also have exclusive sale of the stock for this gigantic enterprise. They say the completion of the hotel will double the value of every lot in that locality. They have a few lots which yet remain at original prices, but this will not be the case very long. What the citizens of Harvey desire every one to understand is that the improvements in their wonderful town are already on the ground and a fixed fact. They do not think it fair to their town to make comparisons with so-called manufacturing towns whose promises of something yet to be done are put against the solid enterprises already established at Harvey. Harvey has averaged more than a new house every day for two years.—From August Number World's Fair News, Chicago.

HARVEY

We have just issued a 20 page book entitled —HARVEY— —ILLUSTRATED— Most of the pictures were taken by our special artist and it gives a better idea of Harvey, (2 miles from Chicago,) than anything ever issued. This book will be sent free to any address. It gives the best pointers where to buy lots.

NO SALOONS

There is every reason to believe that those who purchase lots of us now will double their money in a short time, as there never has been a time in the history of this wonderful town when there was the rapid growth there is today. With the enormous wealth of the manufacturing industries to supply business, and the town peopled by the best class of Christian Temperance Families who have come to live and make it their home, is an attractive feature, both as a place for residence or investment—especially to those who can purchase BEFORE OCTOBER THE DATE OF THE NEXT INCREASE OF PRICE. A deposit of $10 holds a lot for thirty days, thus giving you time to come and investigate. Our largest sales are always made to those who come and look over the whole situation. Taxes light. Dry ground. Moderate prices.

AND WORLD'S WHITE RIBBON.

THOU HAST GIVEN A BANNER TO THEM THAT FEAR THEE; THAT IT MAY BE DISPLAYED BECAUSE OF THE TRUTH."

Volume XVIII. CHICAGO, September 15, 1892. Number 37

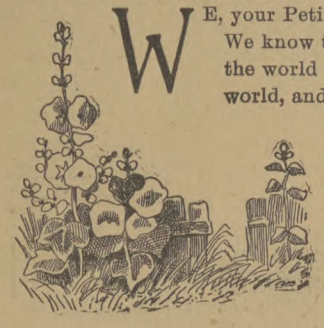
PETITION OF THE

WORLD'S WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION

FOR THE PROTECTION OF THE HOME,

Addressed to the Governments of the World.

Honored Rulers, Representatives and Brothers:



WE, your Petitioners, although belonging to the physically weaker sex, are strong of heart to love our homes, our native land, and the world's family of nations. We know that clear brains and pure hearts make honest lives and happy homes, and that by these the nations prosper, and the time is brought nearer when the world shall be at peace. We know that indulgence in Alcohol and Opium, and in other vices which disgrace our social life, makes misery for all the world, and most of all for us and for our children. We know that stimulants and opiates are sold under legal guarantees which make the Governments partners in the traffic, by accepting as revenue a portion of the profits, and we know with shame that they are often forced by treaty upon pop ulations, either ignorant or unwilling. We know that the law might do much, now left undone, to raise the moral tone of society and render vice difficult.

We have no power to prevent these great iniquities beneath which the whole world groans, but you have power to redeem the honor of the nations from an indefensible complicity. We therefore come to you with the united voices of representative women of every land, beseeching you to raise the standard of the law to that of Christian morals, to strip away the safeguards and sanctions of the state from the drink traffic and the opium trade, and to protect our homes by the total prohibition of these curses of civilization throughout all the territory over which your Government extends.

TO OUR WHOLE HOST FROM THE 'CHIEFTAIN."

The little one has become a thousand. The handful of wheat on the mountain-top waves like Lebanon. The stone that the builders now reject bids fair to become the head of the corner. Never was I more impressed with the truth of these wonderful figures of Holy Writ, in their application to the host of Christian women of which we are aggregated atoms, than on these "heights of answered prayer," and from this coign of vantage built by hard work done. The white ribbon movement has steadily broadened until now it includes every good thing that women may do with hands united and faces lifted for the imprint of the Spirit. We could not study "temperance" so long without tracing its roots and branches so far that we at last perceive this God-given reform to be the Banyan of the Forest—the tree whose leaves are for the healing of the nations and from a thousand ills that flesh and soul are heir to, ills against which in earlier days temperance reformers had not learned to fight.

We now believe that so closely are the labor, the woman and the purity movements allied with the temperance reform that we cannot work for one without strongly co-operating with them all. For this reason our literature has broadened in its scope beyond what we could have conceived eighteen years ago, and the faithful little groups of united heads, hands and hearts that represent our local auxiliaries in all countries, are studying all these questions and trying to help forward the interests of all. So wide a circle in thought and purpose must inevitably take on one evolution more. These bright spots will magnify, will meet each other, will send their rays out into the realm of government, and the equal and intelligent participation of men and women in all the affairs of that larger home we call the state, will be the necessary and natural culmination of the woman's temperance crusade. This is comformable to reason; this is in the nature of things.

Nothing so stirs my enthusiasm as the thought of these multiplying groups of women speaking no fewer than forty different languages, translating our motto, "For God and Home and Every Land" into the vernacular of the orient, of the occident, of the antarctic and well-nigh the arctic continents, of the islands in the far south seas and the peninsulas of the slow but steady north. The vision of that "larger home" we speak so much about grows on me with the years. The right of every human being to be well born, and being born to find as his natural heritage the assurance that he shall never lack for food, clothing or shelter throughout all his lifetime, but that the work he does shall be held by society as an equivalent for the supply of all his natural needs—this has become with me a cardinal doctrine of Christianity. The conservation of every human being's powers of hand, head and heart that he may react on his environment in the most direct and helpful way—this principle involves the temperance reform, for the integrity of the intellect is the most precious, is the most sacred and essential single characteristic of the human being.

The giving to every human being of the fullest possible estate, physical, mental, moral and spiritual is his right. Whoever interposes artificial barriers between any human being and this development is, in so far as he does it with intelligent purpose and intention, an evil spirit and not a good one. This is the woman question in a nutshell, and we work to remove from least to greatest every filament and chain that has held any woman from her utmost beneficent reaction on the world round her and the age in which she lives. We believe every reaction beneficent that is natural. We believe that her own nature should determine her relations to the world and that no other human being or class of beings should by the smallest iota hinder her in determinating that development.

The foundation of the home must be the lifelong faithfulness and loyalty of two, each to the other. Whatever interferes with this should be looked upon by society as a disintegrating force, not to be for one instant tolerated. This is the purity question in a nutshell, and we work through the study of heredity, hygiene, total abstinence, prohibition, equal property laws, education for women and their participation in government to reduce to the smallest possible minimum the temptations of women and the opportunities of men to be false to the home.

The World's W. C. T. U. is but an outline map as yet. The shading is to come. The tones are to be wrought into its texture, with the perspective and the atmosphere that shall make a glorious picture. How soon this shall begin to dawn on human eyes depends on each one of us—in the last analysis, perhaps, as much on one as on another. What manner of women ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness? "What carefulness it wrought in you, what clearing of yourselves?" First of all, personal purity and personal consecration must be our contribution to the society we love and which we have helped to form. Out of these will grow intelligent and steadfast work, according to a plan. The great petition will not then be overlooked by us, whether we are presidents of nations, states, districts, counties or local unions. We shall send for it to Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, Ravenna, Ohio, and we shall circulate it with might and main in our several white ribbon parishes, returning it when we have done "what we could" to Miss Alice Briggs, Rest Cottage, Evanston, Ill. We shall make it our business to see that every little child is pledged, sending for cards for this purpose to Miss Anna A. Gordon, Evanston, Ill., and returning them to her. We shall urge THE UNION SIGNAL, The Oak and Ivy Leaf and The Young Crusader into every home and reading room. We shall never prosent ourselves anywhere without having on that white ribbon, which is the insignia of our holy war, and we shall tenderly and sacredly observe that trysting time "before the mercy seat," the noon hour of prayer. We shall waft toward the white ribbon temple in Chicago, that wonderful outgrowth of woman's faith and fealty, thoughts and deeds of hope, of love, of purpose, until it becomes our very own "from turret to foundation stone" and its income is distributed in all parts of the world, according to the respective contributions of our auxiliaries, for the building up of the work in their respective countries and the sending out from headquarters of white-ribbon missionaries to organize and strengthen local unions everywhere. It is my confident expectation that within ten years the World's W. C. T. U. will be better known the world round than the "National" is to-day in America, the "British Women" in England or the "Australian" in the antarctic countries. It is the first step that costs. The first years are the hardest, but later on the momentum of thorough work done with devotion buoys us up and bears us on in a geometric ratio of growth and progress.

All these thoughts are "familiar in our mouths as house hold words." They were the staples of conversation between my mother and myself. She was devoted heart and soul to this mighty movement. She said to me over and over again in her last days, "I am glad to go now that I am so old and weary, for I can help you and the white ribbon women more hereafter from the other side than I could possibly help you on this." Sailing across wide and stormy seas to that strong friend and ally raised up of God in England, where I shall counsel with her as to the best means of lengthening the cords and strengthening the stakes in the World's W. C. T. U., with my faithful comrade by my side, who has with me "sowed beside all waters" throughout the bounds of North America, I have a smile on the lip though a tear in the eye, and bewildered by the greatest bereavement that has ever come to me, I am yet borne up by the mightiest hopes, for through the bright, clear air a hand beckons and a voice calls, "Be of good cheer my daughter; we are helping from the other side."

Believe me, beloved comrades the world around, and you who have so cherished and comforted me in my own dear native land, I am and shall be in all worlds, yours for the coming of the kingdom of our Lord in the customs of all society and the laws of all lands.

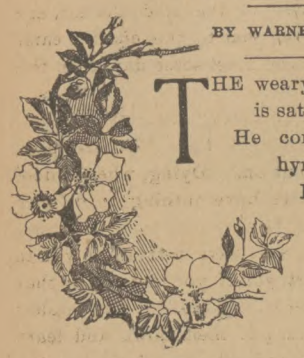
THY KINGDOM COME.

BY WARNER SNOAD.



THE weary world with wrong and woe is sated.
He comes! Messiah! whom our hymns have sung;
He comes! the Prince for whom we long have waited,
And back the gates of righteousness are flung—
Christ the Deliverer!

See the red wine cup at His feet lies broken,
And lust's foul beasts slink trembling from their prey;
Truth's diamond words by every lip are spoken,
Doubt's murky mists melt into perfect day—
Christ the Deliverer!

No more can suffering or sickness flourish,
Nor war's shrill clarion sound to blood and flame;
Nor Love's fair roses blight and mildew nourish,
Nor womanhood be sunk in sin and shame—
Christ the Deliverer!

No more can party strife or statesmen's jangle
Build shrines to self, while trampled justice bleeds;
Nor priests and saints o'er true religion wrangle,
For Christianity shall conquer creeds—
Christ the Deliverer!

No more can women's eye be reared with weeping,
Nor hearts with endless toil grow wrung and sore;
The riches of the earth are in His keeping,
And poverty's gaunt wolf is seen no more—
Christ the Deliverer!

Harvest and orchard pour unstinted treasure,
The lion and the lamb shall partners be;
Through blessed work and fresh unsullied pleasure
Walk men and women equal, blessed and free—
Christ the Deliverer!

Christians awake! across the sunset amber
God writes in characters the wise may read,
"The Bridegroom goeth forth from out His chamber,
His footsteps near the earth. Arise! Take heed!"—
London, Eng. Christ the Deliverer!

WORLD'S WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

Lady Henry Somerset's address at the recent World's First Conference in London.

I feel there are different Christian societies working with different objects, but all having one common aim, and that we, as women, with clasped hands and uplifted hearts, could gird the world with this purpose. The World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union has done this. They have sent out six All-the-world missionaries.

In South Africa, New Zealand, Australia, France, Germany, Italy, Spain—in forty different countries this work has now spread. To each succeeding age and generation God has sent His own particular message. That which came to the world in the last generation was freedom for the brotherhood of man, and all over the globe men's hearts beat with the desire to liberate the slave. To day there are slaves to be set free who are bound down in chains and fetters quite as terrible as those that held the black men and women. And we are bound as Christian men and women to liberate those in our own land cursed by alcohol, and abroad held down by the opium traffic. When we face the fact that England not only forced the opium traffic on India, but that those who received licenses from the government to sell opium were fined, if they did not sell a certain amount per month, we realize our responsibility as Christian women.

The opium trade, fastened by England upon India, is among the darkest blots upon our national honor. The Chinese Empire would fain resist the traffic we force upon it, but fears another opium war, such as that which has already disgraced our annals. We have taken liquor and opium with our Bibles, until we sometimes wonder whether the nations would not have been less cursed had we left them in their barbarism. In God's name, then, is it not time to appeal to England to join in this great work? Ought not the women of our land to look beyond their sea-bound limits to the great horizon of their colonies, whither they send their sons, and where the motherhood of those true hearts, who are the natural guardians of homes, will shield them from temptation? Is it not our duty, and is it not our joy, to don the bow of white that binds the whole round world "For God and Home and Every Land"?

It has been my lot in life to visit many countries, and to revel in the beauties that art has accumulated, and the treasures stored by centuries; to stand in places built by the great dead, to linger on the spot where Charlemagne knelt, where Dante walked, or Virgil sung. But when I crossed the great Atlantic Ocean last October, and landed on the shores of the New World, whose portals are kept by the figure of liberty she holds so dear, I felt within me that which made me say, "The living, the living shall praise Thee." The whole of that great world pulsates with the larger hope, and that optimistic spirit seems breathed into its philanthropy, for the air is filled with the presence of regeneration and reform.

There are times in our lives when a great momentum is given to our convictions; when a sight of what has been accomplished teaches us what can be done; when the power which has enabled others to triumph is specifically promised afresh. My visit to America has meant all this for me; nay, it has meant more. It is impossible to hold the hands and look into the faces of those women, who in the strength of the Spirit were led out into the great crusade, and not receive a fresh baptism of power. It is the glory of the temperance work in England that we at that time caught the glow of their heavenly vision, and when Mother Stewart, of Ohio, a central figure of the Crusade, came to our shores on the invitation of Mrs. Margaret Parker, of Dundee, the foundations of our society were laid, the first golden link was forged in the lengthening chain that binds our hearts to the hearts of the white-ribboners beyond the sea.

In 1883, the formation of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union came as an inspiration to the president of the National Society, Miss Frances E. Willard. After a visit to California she said that in that garden of the gods she had looked into the mystic face of the Orient, had felt the breezy breath of Japan, and had learned the magic transformations in the civilization of that wonderful land, its readiness to take Western customs and its dangers from western vices; she had seen the desolation of the opium dens of San Francisco, and had realized how that poison habit which cursed the victim more, and the home less, was spreading through the land, and was being forced by Christian governments upon populations helpless and unwilling. The life-line of the white ribbon was thrown out, till to-day it girds the world, a fit emblem of the white light of truth which it has called out in its radiant existence.

On the 18th of November the first convention of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union was held at Boston, Mass., assembled in Faneuil Hall, the old "Cradle of Liberty," and was called to order by the president, Miss Frances E. Willard. The delegates assembled represented nearly forty countries, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, Burmah, India, China, Japan, Newfoundland, the Sandwich Islands, North and South America, Canada, Italy, France and England, and among the central figures was that brave-hearted woman, Mary Clement Leavitt, who for seven years has gone out alone the world round to "terminate the evil" and help "diadem the right." From every land there came the same sad story, "We are cursed by alcohol," and from the East the wail of the opium evil. America's women have forged their way, carrying the gospel of total abstinence to the English speaking nations, as well as to the heathen world, and I felt, as I listened to the testimony of our own country women and colonists from Canada, Australia New Zealand, South Africa, India and Ceylon, that the time had come when the nation whose pride it is, that the sun never sets upon her dominions should arise and clasp hands with this great sisterhood of service in gratitude and love for all they have accomplished, and with a strong determination that they will no longer loiter by the way, but hasten to keep step with woman's greatest missionary movement.

In Australia, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is the strongest of all the temperance influences. It is splendidly organized and corrolated into a great National Union. Miss Jessie Ackerman, of California, who has been the main power in the movement, and is now its president, will soon come to this country. Dr. Kate Bushnell and Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew, whose presence was a benediction at our last year's convention, are now in Australia and Mrs. Leavitt in America. Many and heartrending are the calls that come for help from distant lands, from drink-cursed Africa and opium-enslaved India. These consecrated women started on their mission with no money or provision for the task before them, but their faith and trust have been rewarded, for they have wanted for nothing, but provision has been forthcoming everywhere.

The next great World's Convention is to held the first week in June of 1893, in connection with the Columbian Exposition at Chicago. In response to our invitation to an International Temperance Convention of women, our comrades on the other side entrusted me with a message of hearty appreciation and compliance, hoping that the date would be fixed for 1895, as the World's Constitution now provides for triennial conventions.

The great petition now registers one million names, and Miss Willard and I hope to obtain another million before it is presented to the world's governments, the greatest protest that will ever have been made against the greatest curse. The work done in England was splendid, though the time was very short. Miss Morgan labored with noble intelligence and zeal, and the result was all that we could have anticipated I deeply appreciate the magnificen exertions made throughout the branches of the British Women's Temperance Association and the loving work bestowed upon the Polyglot petition. They are already as a society affiliated with the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union. The white ribbon is our badge; the noon-tide hour of prayer our trysting place at the portals of heaven. Our interests are identical, and I trust our co-operation henceforth will be complete, even as our work is one.

It is of unity that I would wish now to speak. We are all working in different battalions, but all in one great army and with one great object. Let us together follow that one standard, keeping step to step and shoulder to shoulder, feeling that as we look toward the one Great Commander we are bound in one allegiance, and held together by the ties of sympathy and of love.

SOME PASSAGES IN THE PRACTICE OF DR. MARTHA SCARBOROUGH.

BY HELEN CAMPBELL.

Chapter V.

The old Squire's eyes had twinkled as he opened the door of his own particular room, at the doctor's tap that afternoon, though he spoke with a little hesitation as if half ashamed of his own yielding.

"We've gone all over this ground before doctor," he said. "You know well enough I don't take stock in all this talk about food and hygiene and all the things our fathers did well enough without. But here's Johnny with the old Templeton backbone all gone out of him, and here am I with so many queer feelings lately, that I'm not sure what's going to come next."

The twinkle was gone. The doctor looked at him steadily and said to himself,

"He's aging fast and if he doesn't look out there's apoplexy ahead, and not far ahead either."

"It's Templeton fashion to go in a jiffy," the Squire went on. "I've been turning it over, and if you're willing, I'm going to make you Johnny's guardian, and give you full power to run things as you like till he is twenty-one, if you get him through to that time. I may come to it myself but 'tisn't likely; 'tisn't likely. If you kill him that's your lookout. The fact is, we may be all wrong up here, and if we are he ought to have some sort of a chance. So I shall turn him over to you and that extraordinary partner of yours, as innocent as a baby and as experienced as any ten patriarchs. Make him over if he can be made over, and if you succeed I've a plan"—

"Let plans go till we see how things work," Dr. Scarborough answered, but the old Squire shook his head, and, rising from his seat looked first into the hall and then carefully closed the door, drawing his chair nearer and speaking in a half whisper. Dr. Scarborough smiled as he went on and shook his head once or twice.

"No, no," he said at last." "Let that sort of thing take care of itself," but Squire Templeton set his mouth in the firm lines that came with any strong desire, and brought his foot down with a little stamp.

"I've as good a right to my notions as you to yours," he said. "We don't need any more words about it, but I shall make a memorandum of it in the proper place; and now I wash my hands of the whole responsibility and shall clear out to avoid making any trouble. You'll have money enough to do what you need, and I'm settled not to interfere."

"You may repent in a week," the Doctor said.

"Very likely I shall, and to head off any results, I'm going to take myself out of the way. The fact is I've done considerable thinking about it. The child can't have a fair chance if I am round, and so I shall keep out of the way till you've got him into line. By the Lord Harry, Scarborough, there isn't another man on earth I'd do it for, and you know it. May the Lord deal with you as you deal with him."

"Amen," the Doctor made answer solemnly, and with no more words turned and left the room.

So it chanced that Johnny, to his profound surprise, found himself transferred, he and all his belongings, to the east chamber in the Doctor's great square house, opening into a smaller room, in which was soon installed a woman, who, as Dr. Scarborough had long ago announced, was the only woman in Linborough township who knew how to obey orders. That she often disagreed with their tenor, made no difference. She had nursed too many patients under his direction not to know that the thing that seemed to her folly might save the worst case to which she was called. If he chose to spend time on a child that everbody knew had no more stamina than a May-fly, and had been spoiled from his cradle, that was his lookout and not hers. To settle, however, definitely in one spot and agree to give her services as long as they should be wanted, made against all her habits of years. Beginning long before as village tailoress, Miss Prissy had found huge enjoyment in her progress from house to house, with the intimate knowledge thus acquired of all her neighbor's affairs. That she never gossiped made no difference. Her satisfaction lay in hearing speculations and wonderment, far away from any guess at the real facts, and in silently chuckling as she had the varied versions of an affair, which, very likely, she had overseen herself. The Templeton history was familiar from its earliest page. She doubted a little if it were worth while to spend time on this last twig of the old tree, the only vigorous branch of which, the old Squire, was already shaky and uncertain. But if Miss Malvina was placable, there were many reasons for helping on the Doctor's latest experiment, and thus far Miss Malvina had made only mild objection, in her inmost mind certain that whatever Nathan wanted must from that fact be the only righteous course to pursue.

It was a nine-day's wonder in Linborough when the Templeton house was closed and Simon Bassett and his wife moved up from the Hollow and took possession of the long wing at the back. Simon's leathery countenance gave no token of what his own views of the matter might be, and the group that settled neighborhood affairs each evening in the store could only conjecture what the future might develop.

It was remembered by more than one, that when the news came of young Tom Templeton's death, his father had locked himself into his room, and for weeks refused to see anyone, and old Tipton settled the reason for the present mysterious course.

"He's consid'able older, the Squire is, an' I calkilate he thinks that Johnny is goin' to die, an' that like as not to see him would bring on a shock, an' so he's jest turned him over to the doctor an' run. I don't know as I blame him a mite, but it's kinder tough on Johnny."

As for Johnny himself, his state of mind could hardly have been defined. To be with Dr. Martha had always been his chief happiness, but to meet Dr. Scarborough's keen eyes, and recall the number of times that Aunt Matilda had said to him, "Now, Johnny, I'll give you what you want this time, but remember you are never to let the doctor know," made the same shrinking he had always felt. As for Miss Prissy, who save for his bath and rubbings, remained discreetly in the background, he had not yet made up his mind, and his great eyes considered her attentively, wondering what she would do if he screamed and kicked as he had been wont to do with Aunt Matilda. He did not wish Dr. Martha to know how often this happened, The Templeton temper was part of his inheritance, and Aunt Matilda expected kicking and screaming, and yielded on the instant, fearing consequences if she did not. Johnny had traded on his weakness, and expected things to give way to him, and he watched now with his eager eyes and sharp little face, trying to discover the weak points of the enemy, and quite unconscious that Dr. Scarborough was no less busy.

Had anyone but Dr. Martha been the teacher, active rebellion would quickly have followed. But so much of the new discipline appeared to be taken for granted; so many things at which alone he would certainly have rebelled, were part of her daily life, that, in spite of himself, he yielded. He had eaten when he willed and what he willed, and always the richest and most highly seasoned food the house afforded. He had lain in bed or got up at such hours as he wished, and fled from a draught or a drop of rain like a valetudinarian. Now, nobody talked about it, but he found himself daily taken from bed and put through a course, which ended with Dr. Martha appearing with her dumb-bells, a new pair like them for him, and showing all the things she did, till he found himself copying the motions, and actually wanting his breakfast when all was over. And finally, when, one day he had supposed everybody but Miss Prissy away, and had suddenly determined upon a paroxysm which should end in giving him some of the fruit cake he had discovered Miss Malvina kept in the sideboard, the door opened, just at its height, and Dr. Scarborough entered without a word, took his hand and led him into the library.

"When you want a thing come to me and we'll talk it over and find out if it is the best thing," he said as Johnny, reckless of consequences now that he had been caught, danced up and down with rage. But to keep it up with those cool, gray eyes looking steadily at him, was impossible, and he suddenly cast himself on the big sofa and burst into crying, in which many feelings found vent; rage, mortification, and something else for which he had no name, but which was very suddenly plain as a sense of the nonsense of it all.

"It's time for us to have a little talk," Dr. Scarborough said presently when the sobs had ceased and Johnny began to wonder what was to come next. "When I have a sensible patient I always talk over things with him, and you are quite man enough to understand and be treated like one. I didn't think you would do quarter as well as you have done. Now I am going to tell you a story and see what you think about it. I should not tell it, if I did not believe that, little fellow as you are, you have sense to understand, and pluck enough to want to work with me."

It was the Templeton story that Dr. Scarborough told him, and all that went with the old name dying out, with all its honors and all its shame, and to end with him unless he were cured, and taught how to conquer the inheritance that came with it. Johnny's intent, searching eyes never left his face. His breath came quick and his cheeks flushed. To live, to enjoy every breath, every act of daily life, to know the joy of free motion, of owning earth and air and sea, and taking from each the gift it had for man. It was like a fairy tale. Was this what it meant to be alive? Could there be the same pleasure the fish felt in cleaving the cool water, or the bird the air, and with all this the joy of knowing that to this end the earth had been made and that all men must some day learn this was their birthright?

"We are all poor creatures of a day;" Aunt Matilda had often said, "we are born only to die. "We are born to live," the friendly voice went on. "Dying, when it does come is only larger life, but we have nothing to do with dying at present. And living is perpetual conquest, perpetual victory. All these ills that have hurt all of you in every generation, cannot hurt you if you determine they shall not. You are a conqueror, and one of the noblest of the earth, if you face them, put them down and learn their real lesson. I know you understand. You are going to work with me and know that you will grow into just what I want you to be, if you are patient and obedient. Tough of course, but a brave soldier doesn't mind hardness and you are going to be my soldier, and know that God made you strong enough to conquer every enemy."

There was more that cannot be written here. When it had ended, Johnny suddenly cast himself into the Doctor's arms, and then as he felt them tighten about him, broke for a moment into crying but whisked the tears away.

"I believe every word you said. I am going to do exactly what you say, and won't grandfather be surprised when he comes back?" And with this he ran from the room and out to the apple tree, where Dr. Martha sat on a low bough, waiting for what might happen next.

THE TEMPERANCE OUTLOOK IN CANADA.

BY ELLA F. M. WILLIAMS.

President of the Dominion W. C. T. U.

The Act of Federation providing for the union of the British Provinces in North America under a central Dominion government took effect July 1, 1867. Eight years later, (in 1875) both the House of Commons and the Dominion Senate—the latter by a vote of twenty-five against seventeen—declared themselves in favor of prohibition, and expressed the opinion that the government should bring in a bill to that effect. Agreeing as to general principles, opinions differed as to methods; in order to arrange for satisfactory, concerted action, sixteen members of the House united in calling a convention of temperance workers, which was held in Montreal in September of the same year. Five provinces were represented, the total membership of the convention being two hundred and eighty. By its resolutions this representative body declared against the license system, and demanded the "entire prohibition of the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors as beverages." It asked that the Dominion Parliament should be urged to frame a prohibitory law, and in order that it might have the support of the community, subject it "to ratification by popular vote."

Another important result of this convention was the formation of a "Dominion Prohibitory Council" which, in 1876, took the name of the "Dominion Alliance." At the present time its annual council is composed of its officers, representatives from its provincial branches and from all other provincial temperance organizations (including the W. C. T. U.) as well as from the different religious bodies in Canada. Its object is the "immediate prohibition of the liquor traffic." Its constitution provides that at each annual meeting a standing committee shall be appointed, "to be known as the Committee on Legislation, composed of members of both houses of Parliament and other members of the council, which shall hold a special meeting at Ottawa during each session of Parliament to watch and advise concerning legislation."

In 1877 an attempt was made to secure prohibitory action in the House of Commons, but was unsuccessful. In 1878 the Dominion Alliance drafted a Local Option Bill and submitted it to the government. This bill formed the basis of the "Canada Temperance Act," more popularly known as the "Scott Act." According to this act each county could declare for prohibition within its own territory, and, once carried or lost, the question could not be again submitted for three years. Many difficulties arose in attempting to effect the different provisions of the act, and it has been well-nigh impossible to obtain the necessary amendments, or to secure enforcement in counties where it has been adopted. In consequence of these deficiencies as a prohibitory measure, it has been repealed in twenty-nine counties and four cities out of the fifty-six counties and five cities which had adopted it. Wherever enforced it was a blessing to the community while waiting for a Dominion Prohibitory Act.

In 1884 the House of Commons by vote of one hundred and twenty-two against forty, declared in favor of the principle of prohibition, but by vote of one hundred and seven to fifty-five pronounce against present action in that direction. In 1887, at the instance of the legislative committee of the Alliance, Mr. Jamieson, a member of the House, introduced the following resolution: "That in the opinion of this House it is expedient to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating liquors, except for sacramental, medicinal, scientific and mechanical purposes. That the enforcement of such prohibition, and such manufacture, importation and sale as may be allowed shall be by the Dominion government, through specially appointed officers." This was defeated by a vote of one hundred and twelve against seventy. In 1888 the subject was again brought before the House but no vote was taken. In 1889 Mr. Jamieson again moved the same resolution. The usual parliamentary tactics caused this defeat, since by vote of ninety-nine against fifty-nine it was amended by striking out all the words after "purposes" and inserting the following: "When the public sentiment of the country is ripe for the reception and enforcement of such a measure of prohibition."

In 1890 the Dominion W. C. T. U. held its annual convention in Montreal, and passed the following resolution: "That this Dominion union invite other temperance organizations to unite with it in petitioning the Dominion Parliament to pass an act submitting the question of prohibition to the people." This proposition was considered so objectionable by the council of the Alliance that the white-ribboners, though possibly still of the same mind (as women are apt to be), considered it unwise to press the matter.

Later in the year, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church and the General Conference of the Methodist church in Canada decided to issue petitions for governmental prohibitory action and invited the coöperation of churches of all other denominations, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and other temperance organizations. The response to this invitation was most cordial and comprehensive. The W. C. T. U. heartily indorsed the movement and gave valuable help in securing signatures and making written and personal appeals to various members of Parliament. During the spring of 1891 these petitions were forwarded to Ottawa, 2,626 being presented to the House of Commons and 2,436 to the Senate. It is estimated that these petitions represented at least 900,000 signatures. On the 25th of May an influential deputation representing the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and Disciples churches, the Salvation Army, the Alliance, the W. C. T. U. and other temperance organizations waited upon the Dominion government to urge the granting of these petitions for total prohibition of the liquor traffic. The delegation was received by the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Finance and each society was allowed a few minutes for presenting its plea, Mrs. Alexander, of Ottawa, speaking for the eight white-ribboners who represented the Dominion W. C. T. U.

Meanwhile, at the request of the legislative committee of the Alliance, Mr. Jamieson again brought before the House of Commons his celebrated resolution, commencing with the words: "That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived when it is expedient to prohibit," etc. This resolution being before the House while the Dominion W. C. T. U. Convention was in session in New Brunswick, a telegram was sent by the convention, urging its adoption. History repeated itself, and the usual question, How can we replace the $7,500,000 of revenue we shall lose if we do away with the liquor traffic?—confronted the advocates of prohibition. The petitions were not granted. Mr. Jamieson's resolution was defeated by an amendment offered by the Hon. George E. Foster, minister of finance. This amendment, which was carried by vote of 107 against 88, struck out all but the first word of the original resolution and substituted several clauses making the amended resolution read:

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable, without delay to obtain for the information and consideration of Parliament, by means of a royal commission, the fullest and most desirable data possible respecting:

1. The effects of the liquor traffic upon all interests affected by it in Canada.

2. The measures which have been adopted in this and other countries with a view to lessen, regulate or prohibit the traffic.

3. The results of these measures in each case.

4. The effect the enactment of a prohibitory law in Canada would have in respect of social conditions, agricultural, business, industrial and commercial interests of the revenue requirements of municipalities and the Dominion and also as to its capability of efficient enforcement.

5. All other information bearing on the question of prohibition."

The day after this action by the House of Commons, on motion of Hon. A. Vidal, president of the council of the Alliance, the senate referred all the prohibition petitions, received by that body, to a committee which was instructed to examine them and "recommend such action to be taken thereon by the senate as the said committee may deem expedient."

The decision as to a Royal Commission becoming known, Miss Willard suggested to the executive of the Dominion W. C. T. U. the advisibility of asking the government to appoint at least one woman as a member of the Commission, believing that the women of Canada were quite as interested in the questions to be considered as the other sex; the application was made, and the name of one of our prominent white-ribboners was forwarded to Ottawa. The Alliance was asked to indorse this request but declined to do so and, by resolution, declared that they considered it "unwise and inexpedient" to commit themselves "to the Commission in advance by recommending or indorsing any person for appointment thereon." Probably the government also disapproved of the request; at all events no woman was appointed.

Although the resolution adopted by the House of Commons declared the desirability of securing information "without delay" and although this arrangement effectually prevents any other attempts to secure Prohibitory legislation until this Commission has reported, more than one year elapsed before it began its work. The first hearing was held in Halifax, Nova Scotia, July 25, 1892, Sir Joseph Hickson, of Montreal, presiding. Since that date evidence has been taken in other parts of Nova Scotia (including Cape Breton), in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. In September the Commission will probably be at work in Quebec and from there move onward to Ontario and the Western Provinces.

Learning that the liquor party had employed a representative to attend the meetings of the Commission in order to look after its interests and secure the right kind of evidence for that side of the question, the Dominion Alliance appointed its secretary, Mr. F. S. Spence, of Toronto, to similiar service for the temperance people of Canada. At its June convention the Dominion W. C. T. U. heartily indorsed this action and urged the Provincial unions to assist in collecting funds and evidence. In Halifax the president of the local union was asked to testify and did so. Other ladies have been present at the hearings but, as a rule, are not called upon for evidence.

Notwithstanding the fact that this commission is considered merely a governmental method of dodging the real question at issue, and has been described as "a criminal conspiracy" to shelve a troublesome subject, Canadian temperance workers believe it may do good by bringing before the public many facts concerning the evil traffic which have, hitherto, been unnoticed or unknown. This in itself may arouse deeper interest and prove a valuable educational agency. Meanwhile, prohibitory legislation is delayed, and the per capita consumption of liquor in 1890 was nearly four and three-quarters gallons with a direct per capita expenditure of about $7.85.

The plebiscite just taken in the province of Manitoba, resulted in a victory of three to one in favor of prohibition. This expression of public opinion will probably compel the passing of a Prohibitory Act by the provincial legislature. If this is done an interesting question is likely to arise in connection with the Inter-Provincial Commerce Law, as to how far a province can constitutionally prevent the importation and sale of liquor from other provinces. No opportunity has yet arisen for the settlement of this question by the courts.

From a careful study of the situation it appears:

First, That Local Option and Provincial Prohibitory Acts are but temporary palliative measures.

Second, That the final end and aim of Canadian temperance workers must be a Dominion Act providing for the total prohibition of the liquor traffic.

Third, That it will be impossible to secure a Dominion Prohibitory Act until temperance is made a test question in all elections.

Fourth, That, to accomplish this, a new political party must be organized which will make the total prohibition of the liquor traffic a prominent plank in its platform.

Montreal, Can.

MRS. LEAVITT.

Colonel Frémont, during his life-time was called the Path-Finder because of his pioneer achievements, and has passed into history as such. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of to-day can also claim a path-finder—Mrs. Leavitt!

To comprehend what we know she must have endured, must have overcome and really did accomplish in her round-the-world trip is quite beyond one's mental grasp. We only know that her seven-years' labor among all tongues and peoples has made it possible for us to claim to-day an organized connection encircling the globe.

Let's imagine for a moment a man having just awakened from a Rip Van Winkle sleep of ten years only! He naturally asks for explanation of various unfamiliar conditions, until finally he is heard exclaiming:

"TEMPERANCE TEMPLE!

and built by women! What wild story is this? Your pretty fiction reminds me of the Temple of Science built on the Hill of Knowledge in the old allegory. What! '$102 just sent to our Temple from the Orange Free State of South Africa'? I don't believe a word of it. How could South Africa know anything about it? What's that you're saying? 'Missionaries know'? and you've 'a white ribbon emblem, that a woman has trailed around the world in seven years touching South Africa on the way'! What nonsense! 'Went alone'! 'ALONE'? Well now, I don't believe you; I'll go to sleep again."

FROM TEMPLE TO CRUSADE DAYS

we see, in retrospect, an apparently impossible stretch of thorny ground, black quagmires, noisome slums, and evil specters hissing invectives, and we marvel, as we look how the patient Crusaders have ever traversed the distance. But looking higher we joy to see it spanned by a triumphant arch, each end resting upon faith, the keystone, prayer.

Turning from Crusaders to Temple again, we realize that the rough places of the past have been made smoother for later comers, that the highways and by-ways opened out for workers present each a long vista, lighted in the distance by the aureole glowing from the Cross of Christ—its luminous arms beckoning laborers to enter in. With such avenues for useful activities before us, surely every loyal heart will be thrilled anew with zeal, and resolve to render whatever service, small or great, shall further the work before us. THE NEW COMMANDMENT AND THE NEW SONG.

BY HANNAH WHITALL SMITH.

BIBLE READING.

A new commandment I give unto you, That ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another. John 13: 34

O sing unto the Lord a new song; sing unto the Lord, all the earth. Sing unto the Lord, bless his name; shew forth his salvation from day to day. Declare his glory among the heathen, his wonders among all people. For the Lord is great, and greatly to be praised: he is to be feared above all gods. For all the gods of the nations are idols: but the Lord made the heavens. Honour and majesty are before him: strength and beauty are in his sanctuary. Give unto the Lord, O ye kindreds of the people, give unto the Lord glory and strength.—Ps. 96: 1-7.

The World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union is a chorus of the voices of many women, all the world over, who are seeking, according to their measure, to obey the new commandment and to sing the new song to "all the earth." It is an outgoing of hearts that have learned the wonderful secret that "if we love one another, God dwelleth in us and His love is perfected in us," and who are consequently reaching out to the "kindreds of the people" loving hands and earnest voices, showing forth the salvation of the Lord and declaring His glory "among all people."

Sing unto the Lord a new song, and his praise from the end of the earth, ye that go down to the sea, and all that is therein; the isles, and the inhabitants thereof. Let the wilderness and the cities thereof lift up their voice, the villages that Kedar doth inhabit: let the inhabitants of the rock sing, let them shout from the top of the mountains. Let them give glory unto the Lord, and declare his praise in the islands.—Isa. 42: 10-12.

The "new song" is the natural outcome of the "new commandment." It is impossible for us to love one another in ever so small a measure of the love wherewith Christ has loved us, and not to feel within us the divine impulse to tell out all that we know of the praises of the Lord to the "isles and the inhabitants thereof," and, if our love extends so far, even to the "ends of the earth."

I waited patiently for the Lord; and he inclined unto me, and heard my cry. He brought me up also out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings. And he hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God: many shall see it, and fear, and shall trust in the Lord.—Ps. 33: 1-3.

The "new song" of this world-wide union of women is a magnificent message of deliverance to all whose feet are in a horrible pit and in the miry clay. And it is sent out by those who have in their own lives known something of being "compassed about with songs of deliverance."

Thou art my hiding place; thou shalt preserve me from trouble; thou shalt compass me about with songs of deliverance.—Ps. 32: 7.

The soul that has experienced a deliverance for itself cannot but tell of this deliverance to others. If I am cured by any remedy of a painful disease it is an instinct with me to tell of this remedy to every one I meet who is suffering from the same disease. We are all born physicians for our friends, whether we have ever studied medicine or not; and the World's W. C. T. U. is only the following out of this instinct. It is our way of keeping the "acceptable fasts" of the Lord.

Is it such a fast that I have chosen? a day for a man to afflict his soul? is it to bow down his head as a bulrush, and to spread sackcloth and ashes under him? wilt thou call this a fast, and an acceptable day to the Lord? Is not this the fast that I have chosen? to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke? Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house? when thou seest the naked, that thou cover him; and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh? Then shall thy light break forth as the morning, and thine health shall spring forth speedily: and thy righteousness shall go before thee; the glory of the Lord shall be thy reward. Then shalt thou call, and the Lord shall answer; thou shalt cry, and he shall say, Here I am. If thou take away from the midst of thee the yoke, the putting forth of the finger and speaking vanity.—Isa. 58: 5-9.

We are continually tempted to think that the best way of pleasing God is to "afflict our souls, and bow down our heads as bulrushes, and spread sackcloth and ashes under us." In fact in my youthful days this was the idea generally prevalent, that the more bowed-down and long-faced people were, the better Christians they made; and one of my greatest troubles as regarded my own religious experience was that I could not be unhappy enough! In looking back at all this now it seems to me that that sort of religion might well be called the Christianity of the devil, so manifest is it that its source could have been only evil. Now, thank God, all this is changed, and we have learned to understand that the Christianity of Christ is something far different. We have left behind us those "traditions of men" that have in times past laid upon men's shoulders such grievous burdens, and have gone back to our Lord's own expositions of His own religion, which teach us that His Christianity is full of love and joy and peace in our own souls, and of free and happy service for others. He has said to us, "Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom," and we have believed Him, and our hearts have thereby learned the blessed lesson of being at "leisure from themselves," and of so being free to bear the burdens of others.

Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom.—Luke 12:32.

And he came to Nazareth, where he had been brought up: and, as his custom was, he went into the synagogue on the Sabbath day and stood up for to read. And there was delivered unto him the book of the prophet Esaias. And when he had opened the book, he found the place where it was written, The spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord. And he closed the book, and he gave it again to the minister, and sat down. And the eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened on him. And he began to say unto them, This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears.—Luke 4: 16-21.

If our Christianity is to be the Christianity of Christ, it must be of the same sort. We must do what we can to preach the gospel to the poor, to heal the broken-hearted and to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, and must, as far as we are able, set at liberty them that are bruised. And this is what the World's W. C. T. U. aims to do in every land the round world over.

Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted. Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ.—Gal. 6: 1-2.

The whole secret of our work lies in these words, "And so fulfil the law of Christ," with an emphasis on the "so." Many other ways of fulfilling the law of Christ have been and are being espoused perhaps, but we have learned this one lesson, that to bear one another's burdens is a certain and sure way of fulfilling this law; and it is a way so plain and simple and easy to find, that no soul need ever be at any difficulty to discover it. We offer in this World's W. C. T. U., to every woman all the world over, an opportunity to walk with us in this plain and happy pathway. No matter what your spiritual questionings or difficulties may be, here is a chance for you to help bear the burdens of your fellows, and so fulfil that "law of Christ" which you may perhaps have been long seeking to discover. I believe myself, that most people's spiritual difficulties would disappear if they would forget themselves in work for others. "The law of Christ" is a law of self-sacrifice and self forgetting; and only by obedience to this law can we hope to enjoy the bright shining of His presence and His approving smile. The soul that is selfishly absorbed in its own experiences and its own inner consciousness, can have but little knowledge of what true fellowship with Christ really means, and will share but sparsely in the joys of His salvation.

And if thou draw out thy soul to the hungry, and satisfy the afflicted soul; then shall thy light rise in obscurity, and thy darkness be as the noonday: and the Lord shall guide thee continually and satisfy thy soul in drought, and make fat thy bones: and thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water, whose waters fail not. And they that shall be of thee shall build the old waste places: thou shalt raise up the foundations of many generations; and thou shalt be called, The repairer of the breach, The restorer of paths to dwell in.—Isa. 58: 10-12.

Nowhere is there a more distinct promise than this. "If thou draw out thy soul to the hungry and satisfy the afflicted soul; then shall thy light rise in obscurity, and thy darkness shall be as the noonday." Try this plan, dear, troubled soul, and see if it will not work. And surely if we may, in ever so small a degree, deserve at last to be called a "repairer of the breach" and a "restorer of the paths to dwell in" our longing aspirations will be more than satisfied!

O sing unto the Lord a new song; for he hath done marvellous things: his right hand, and his holy arm hath gotten him the victory. The Lord hath made known his salvation: his righteousness hath he openly shewed in the sight of the heathen. He hath remembered his mercy and his truth toward the house of Israel: all the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God.—Ps. 98:1-3.

It is a glorious song we have to sing! It takes in "all the ends of the earth!" No one is so far off, or so ignorant, no corner of the world is so benighted, as to be excluded from the "salvation of our God." More than in anything else I rejoice in the "alls" of our salvation; and I love this world's union of women because it reaches out to all.

The Lord is good to all: and his tender mercies are over all his works. All thy works shall praise thee, O Lord, and thy saints shall bless thee. They shall speak of the glory of thy kingdom, and of thy power; to make known to the sons of men his mighty acts, and the glorious majesty of his kingdom. Thy kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and thy dominion endureth throughout all generations. The Lord upholdeth all that fall, and raiseth up all those that be bowed down. The eyes of all wait upon thee; and thou givest them their meat in due season. Thou openest thine hand, and satisfiest the desire of every living thing. Ps. 145: 9-16.

Make a joyful noise unto the Lord, all ye lands. Serve the Lord with gladness; come before his presence with singing.

Since God has said it, that "He is good to all and His tender mercies are over all His works," with what confidence may we say so too! And since He has promised to "satisfy the desire of every living thing," how triumphantly may we sing our new song of praise unto our God, and call upon "all lands" to make a joyful noise unto Him, and to come with us "before His presence with singing." The day will come when "every creature which is in heaven and on the earth and under the earth and such as are in the sea," will join in singing this new song round about the throne of God; and we, who are seeking practically to obey the "new commandment" of love to the whole race of man, are called upon to join with glad and happy voices in singing it in a world-wide chorus now.

And they sung a new song, saying, Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof: for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation; and hast made us unto our God kings and priests: and we shall reign on the earth. And I beheld, and I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne and the beasts and the elders: and the number of them was ten times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands; saying with a loud voice, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing. And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever. And the four beasts said, Amen. And the four and twenty elders fell down and worshipped him that liveth forever and ever.—Rev. 5: 9-14.

The World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union is doing what it can to bring about this glorious consummation for which Christ died. We seek to be fellow-workers with the "Lamb that was slain" in the helping and saving of our fellow creatures, and we call upon every lover of God and of humanity to speed us on our way with their prayers and their coöperation.

WORLD'S W. C. T. U. DAY.

BY ALICE E. BRIGGS.

In preparing a program for World's W. C. T. U. Day, there is no inflexible rule that can be followed. Where unions have lately been formed and the work is new it would be well to have an address upon the story of the Crusade, the organization, object and aims of the W. C. T. U., or the history of the W. C. T. U., besides an address on the progress of the World's W. C. T. U. work, which would naturally include a sketch of Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt and her work so inseparably connected with its history.

Much that will prove helpful in preparing the program may be found in the World's number of THE UNION SIGNAL, May 14, 1891, and in letters from Mrs. Leavitt, Miss Ackerman, Dr. Bushnell, and Mrs. Andrew, and reports from the various National unions—all to be found in THE UNION SIGNAL for the past year—also in the following helps: "The Annual Leaflet"; "The Story of the Crusade," price five cents; "History of the W. C. T. U.," price ten cents, all of which may be ordered from Mrs. Caroline B. Buell, The Temple, Chicago, Ill. The September Monthly Reading—the World's W. C. T. U. UNION SIGNAL for September 15, "Thumb-Nail Sketches," Miss Willard's annual address for 1891, from the W. T. P. A., The Temple, Chicago. Report of Mary Clement Leavitt, to be ordered from Mrs. Leavitt, care of Kidder, Peabody & Co., Boston, Mass.; the Minutes of the World's W. C. T. U. Convention, price ten cents, from Alice E. Briggs, Evanston, Ill.

Two programs are given that are intended to be merely suggestive, each union being at liberty to modify according to its special needs. The first may be used for a distinctively W. C. T. U. meeting Thursday afternoon, September 22; the second for a mass-meeting to be held Thursday evening, or the Sunday evening, following that date.

PROGRAM FOR AFTERNOON MEETING.

HYMN—Gently, Lord, O Gently Lead Us. Tune—Greenville.

SCRIPTURE READING—Ephesians 3:14 to 4:7, or 121 Psalm, or Bible Reading.

PRAYER.

HYMN—Give to the Winds Thy Fears. Tune—St. Thomas

READING—Selections from THE UNION SIGNAL for September 15.

ADDRESS—Mary Clement Leavitt and the World's W. C. T. U.

HYMN—Christ for the World We Sing.*

ADDRESS—What Next?

Reading of letter from president of World's W. C. T. U.

HYMN—Blest be the tie that binds.

Close with a text from each member present, or with a short prayer by one of the members, or with Aaronic benediction.

PROGRAM FOR MASS-MEETING.

HYMN—Stand up, Stand up for Jesus. Tune—Webb.

SCRIPTURE READING—Psalm 2, or Isaiah 60, or Bible Reading.

PRAYER.

HYMN—How Firm a Foundation.

Reading of letter from president of the World's W. C. T. U.

ADDRESS—Mary Clement Leavitt and the World's W. C. T. U.

HYMN—Christ for the World We Sing.

ADDRESS—Our later Missionaries and their Work.

ADDRESS—W. C. T. U. Growth and Prospects.

DOXOLOGY. BENEDICTION.

If preferred have one or two general addresses or a sermon instead of the addresses suggested in the program.

*Collection, distribute literature, circulate World's Petition, if it has not been done,—at both meetings.

THE WORLD ABROAD; OR, TEMPERANCE NOTES FROM FOREIGN LANDS.

BY FELIX L. OSWALD, M. D.

Author of "Physical Education," "The Bible of Nature," "International Health Studies," etc.

AN OPEN QUESTION.

The Mohammedan population of the Persian borderlands has risen in fierce revolt, the dervishes having been persuaded that the cholera epidemic now ravaging eastern Europe is due to the sale of intoxicating liquors. In the Russian province of Transcaucasia their sympathizers have demolished a large number of rum-shops, and the represensatives of the Czar demand the arrest of the agitators and their punishment for malicious misrepresentation. The Russian press, too, is unanimous in denouncing the riot, and a member of the Holy Synod goes so far as to suggest the expediency of expelling the Mohammedan inhabitants of the border provinces, as well as their fellow Unitarians, the Jews. But the question remains: Is it not possible that the anti-liquor dervishes were right?

DISQUALIFIED.

During the inauguration of the new Lyceo Pedagoico or, normal school, of Lisbon, Portugal, Professor Beraes made a strong appeal in favor of temperance text books for the free schools and government academies of the country. "When a boy is too wild," he said, "or too stubborn to be good for anything else, we let him enlist, and a run away student may, like Murat, make a first-rate soldier. But even the army has no use for drunkards. Strong drink makes a young man equally unfit for a civil, ecclesiastic and military career. It disqualifies him for life."

SIN WAGES.

Countess Fedorowna Sertinski, the sister of the novelist, Tolstoi, has awakened the anathemas of the Russian conservatives by denouncing the vodka monopoly which makes the government the direct abettor and even promoter of the liquor traffic. A civilized country, she says, with all the pluck of her reform-preaching brother, should rather reduce its expenditures than increase its revenues with sin-wages. An indictment for violation of the press-laws would only fan the sparks of revolt; but the trouble is that the views of the East European temperance agitators are rarely indorsed by the verdict of public opinion. In Hungary the delegates from the rural districts fiercely resisted the proposed increase of the wine tax, and the author of "Russian Peasant Life" describes the guests of a village inn-keeper questioning the patriotism of a young man who "refuses to invest his kopecs in vodka, the beverage that helps to fill the pockets of our father, the Czar." Personally that paternal potentate is said to be in favor of the Gothenburg law.

DRUGS AND DISEASE.

Professor Virchow, the foremost medical authority of the German Empire, has repeatedly urged moderation in the use of drastic drugs, and holds that some medicines, so called, have, on the whole, done more mischief than good, and ought to be dropped from the list of remedial agents. It would be a good plan to begin with alcoholic drugs. A single prescription of medicated brandy has in many cases led to the relapse of half-reformed drunkards and rekindled the flames smothered by years of heroic self-control. Tonic bitters have also frequently initiated the alcohol habit, and the history of all epidemics proves that the victims of strong stimulants are specially liable to the risk of contagion. In southern Asia the plague rages with special virulence among the opium-eaters, and in the yellow-fever epidemics of the West Indies the mortality among dram-drinkers is about twice as large as that of total abstainers. The Mexican Indians, who detest alcoholic drinks, are almost fever proof, while the bibulous Creoles die by thousands, in spite of abundant opportunities for becoming acclimatized.

ABSTINENT MISSIONARIES.

Archdeacon Wolfe, of Fokhien, China, reports that the principal food supply of the natives is derived from a species of yam, or sweet potato, that is cut in slices, dried in the sun and sold at the rate of one hundred and fifty pounds for half a dollar. "I have known families of four persons," writes the archdeacon, "who lived upon this food exclusively at a cost of less than two dollars a month. If missionaries would be willing to live on this food what a great saving it would make in missionary expenditure." He also hints that the proposed change of diet would conciliate the good will of the natives, who are vegetarian, either from necessity, or like the Buddhists, on principle; but the same consideration would even more strongly recommend abstinence from alcoholic drinks in the missions of Mohammedan countries. The traveler, Kinglake, who passed several years in Turkish Asia, warns his countrymen that a single undoubted case of nonconformity with the strict temperance laws of the Koran would neutralize the effects of years of moral training. In the eyes of a Mussulman a beer-drinking evangelist is a moral anomaly, almost, if not quite, as preposterous as a fox-hunting parson in the eyes of an orthodox Hindoo.

TEMPERANCE BANQUETS.

The statistics of the beer trade might make it doubtful if temperance in the course of this century has materially progressed in any part of continental Europe, but while the improvement of wages has increased the temptation of the slum-alley saloons, it is equally certain that the upper classes are becoming more abstinent in the use of all intoxicating liquors whatever. The habit of home-brewing beer has been abolished in northern Germany. Thousands of German, Russian and Austrian families of the well-to-do classes do not permit their children to touch a drop of liquor. It is also a suggestive fact that the better hotels of northern Europe have begun to leave it optional with their guests to accept or decline the wine desert, which only twenty years ago was served to all comers, and even on festive occasions non-alcoholic dinners are nothing rare in Rhenish watering places where formerly a bottle of wine was inseparable from the idea of good cheer.

Cincinnati, O.

THE WORLD'S PROBLEM.

DEAR SISTERS:—As we looked over Mrs. Williams' financial statement in THE UNION SIGNAL of August 18, I doubt not, all thought with a sigh of the money that is going by the billion yearly into saloon-keepers hands, to debauch our young men and ruin our country. But sighing will not fill our treasury, nor thinking, if the thinking is not to some definite purpose.

What is the problem before us? Nothing less than wresting the world from Satan and giving it back to God. Under the foul, false, religions, Brahminism, Buddhism, Mohammedanism, the Christian missionary is the first factor in this work, the most important, the only factor one might say, all others so minify before His holy, mighty office.

In the past, many mission fields were so free from the drink curse that missionaries might well be excused, if they did not foresee what the coming decades had in store for them; nor in the early days of missions, nor when some of the elder living missionaries were young, had the temperance reform produced that horror of the evil effects to be expected from the introduction of drink which it now felt by all Christian souls. These courses combined to prevent such outspoken positions against drink in many missions as would be taken now.

At the present moment, both missionaries and the W. C. T. U. are comfronted with a most appalling state of affairs. Individual traders from nearly every country of Christian Europe and also from the United States, have deluged and are continuing to deluge equatorial Africa with drink. England and France have forced drink upon Madagascar by treaty clauses which that government detests but cannot resist. England is using all her governmental power and prestige, building distilleries, and breweries, promoting or failing to promote native officials as they forward or hinder the sale, or almost force the natives of Hindustan, Burmah, Ceylon and the Straits Settlements to take to drink.

American brewers declare that our ambassadors and consuls in South America have helped them to build up a profitable trade there. The sugar planters have lately learned the trick of making a very destructive distilled liquor from the refuse of their sugar mills, and are deluging the countries with cheap rum. Thus two new elements are added to the universal wine drinking of past centuries and all its evil results.

The brewers also disclose that by the help of our ambassadors and consuls, they hope to build up a trade in China as profitable as that in South America. Let us not forget that Senator Blair was prevented from going to China as our minister, at the demand of the brewers, and that the dominant party dared not refuse to be dictated to by them. Let us also remember that our consul at Tien-Tsin in the autumn of 1886, was negotiating with the Viceroy for the introduction of beer into the Chinese navy, under the plea that it would make the men as brave and strong as those of the English and American navies, and that this same consul prevented me from having an interview with the viceroy lest I might intefere with his plan.

The nations of continental Europe are becoming more and more drunken every year. This is in a few short sentences the condition of affairs outside the English speaking peoples.

How does this tide of drink affect mission work? In the minds of the people of many nations, Christianity and drink are so closely connected that Christian and drunkard, are interchangeable terms—especially is this the case in Hindustan. Together with opium it is hated by native patriots and thinkers, as an evil introduced by Christians to destroy their people and give the country over to the destroyers, hence they hate Christianity.

Among the savage tribes of Africa it debases and stultifies to such an extent, that the work of missionaries is greatly hindered: indeed they must keep ahead of the drink if they would do their best work in Africa. The words of an African chief repeated to me on the banks of the Congo by the missionary to whom they were uttered, will ring in my ears till the day of my death. "I have heard about your religion. It is a good religion. But you are too late. Why did not you God men (the African term for missionaries) come before the drink came? The drink has eaten out my people's heads, and they can no longer understand any good thing. The drink has hardened my people's hearts and they no longer desire any good thing. You are too late! Why did you not come before the drink came?"

A solid barrier must be built up against the drink. As I have proved the world over, the native mind in all countries can be roused in regard to this evil. In Japan, China, India, Madagascar, Sierra Leone, Zululand and many others this was very apparent. They only need leaders to take up the work and carry it on vigorously. Leaders they must have for some time to come.

"Why cannot our missionaries do all the temperance work that is needed?" is a question that is often asked me. In the first place our missionaries are not everywhere; then beside the reasons that prevent ministers of the gospel and their wives doing all the temperance work needed in this country is the still more forcible one that missionaries are more overworked as a rule than our ministers. Specialists are needed; women who have learned all that is known upon this subject, who can give their time, their strength, who can go here and there as the call comes.

Already the beginnings have been made in nearly every country. In several the tiny shoot has become a multitude of sturdy sapplings; in some the growth and multiplication is small, in a few, more is the pity, from neglect, scarcely a germ of life seems left. Now if what has been gained is to be kept, somebody must nurse and tend and extend the work. Who shall do it? There can be, from the nature of the case, but one answer: Women sent out by the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union. This was suggested and adopted by the World's Convention in Boston in November 1891.

Where is the membership of the World's union? More than three-quarters of it in the United States. Then do you not see, dear sisters, that we must send most of the women? The Hawaiian Islands, Australia and South Africa are the only places where money is to be raised in the field for the work. A look at my reports to our various conventions or the final one made at Boston will prove this.

Seven missionaries were asked for, and voted for at Boston. Whom have we now in field. Miss Ackerman has been in Australia some years, but not at our expense. She will probably stay still longer. Miss Palmer has been sent to South Africa, four hundred dollars having been given her for traveling expenses. The ladies of South Africa have promised to support her while there. Lady Henry Somerset, presumably at her own expense, is to send Miss Pash to India. These are all who have resided or who intend to reside in any of the countries where W. C. T. U. missionaries are needed. The great want now, is not someone, however gifted or devoted the lady may be, to touch a few points where the work is strongest, but someone to live in the country, work and organize everywhere.

My own pioneer work, reconnoissance and organizing is probably completed. The five hundred dollars given me for my last winter's work in South Africa, and of which I returned the unexpended balance ninety-eight dollars the other day, is the last that will be needed for my work. I have no longer health and strength sufficient to endure the hardships that must inevitably accompany a life of constant travel from country to country.

But last winter's work forces me to pass on the call that comes from missionaries in South America, for someone to follow me and help them. Will you not then, dear sisters, in every union have special services, or a special plea made for a collection in the churches? We do not ask you to take money from your treasuries, but to ask the people to give to this grand and urgent missionary work.

Both held by Him alone,
So we trust.
But we tremble and repine,
While our rulers drunk with wine,
Vulgar motive—selfish, find
In the dust.

Lowlands, where your parties go,
Badgering, bantering, marching slow.
Destination? none who know
What, to-morrow.
Patriotism forgotten lies,
In a land where honor dies;
Where not even priest is wise—
Oh, the sorrow!

Home, and school, and child, alas,
All forgotten, as they pass
On their way to sacra mass,
At Jericho.
Priest, nor Levite pluck aside
Grasses tall where wounded hide—
Ishmael writhes by Hagar's side,
Where they go.

Millions, reeking in the slums,
Poverty, that staggering runs,
(Where the rich man's chariot comes)
Asking alms.
Politicians hiding, where Mammon or saloon make lair,
Uttering, little do they care—
Oaths or psalms.

Oh, Columbia, nation grand!
Moving toward thy promised land,
What the symbol of thy hand?
Is't golden-rod?
Or the sweet forget-me-not?
Daisy fair of meadow lot?
Hast thou nothing quite forgot?
Maybe, God.

Hast forgotten Him of old?
When thy glory was not told
By the revenue and gold
Of the state?
Rouse thee, now, to righteous deed,
Up. and heal the hearts that bleed,
Yea, confess thy loss and need,
For 'tis late.

Late, and morning dawneth, fair,
God hath yet for thee a care.
Cowards only know despair,
Awake, and see!
Better manhood shall combine,
Better sun for thee shall shine,
Woman's ballot, voice, and time,
Columbia free!

DAVID DOUGLAS AND HIS WIFE.

BY MRS. O. W. SCOTT.

Chapter III.

Sometimes one, sometimes the other proved the stronger in argument, but on this, and several similar occasions, Mr. Douglas had felt himself sadly worsted, and was correspondingly uncomfortable. So that night his thoughts ran over the perplexing conditions of society, politics and pure morality, until he was well nigh distracted. At length he effected a compromise with his conscience. He would preach the most radical temperance sermon he could possibly produce! He would show Mr. Sloan that he had no fear of his wealth or influence by taking his position, once and for all, as an uncompromising advocate of total abstinence. While mentally elaborating one of his to be-unanswerable arguments, he fell asleep.

The Chesport Mercury duly announced in its "Sunday notices" that Rev. Mr. Douglas would preach a temperance sermon, and after two weeks of intense study and preparation, our friend felt that he deserved a crowded house.

The congregation was large and respectable, nothing more, for the "masses" did not read the Sunday notices. A great many went on a steamboat excursion that day, while the "foreign-born citizens" betook themselves to a grove, with plenty of beer to drink.

The sermon, however, was a masterpiece. Stupendous facts, appalling statistics and heartrending incidents were presented with tremendous force. Past, present and future yielded testimony against the drink curse, until the monstrous evil stood in its naked deformity before God and man. The church was very still during the sermon, and women almost forgot to wave their fans, but no one lost his equanimity.

That an average congregation of susceptible Christians can bear such a presentation with calmness, proves that the highest possibilities of self-control have been attained in this, our day and generation. To be sure there were a few "Amens," and a few tears were shed by some poor women in the back seats, but upon the whole, the Chesportians bore the revelation of their country's sin and shame with the usual placidity, and proffered congratulations, after service, much as they would have done had their pastor given them a dissertation upon the probable location of the Garden of Eden.

The retired brewer looked rather white around the mouth, but even he met the minister with quite a show of courtesy as he made his way down the aisle. A little further along stood Mr. Matthews, a quaint old Englishman. He watched the meeting between minister and millionaire with a twinkle in his eye, and, joining the former, said to him as they left the church together:

"You may send the saloon to 'ell, pastor, but h'it won't stay there till h'it's fastened down with ballots."

Mr. Douglas was very weary, but he patiently reviewed a few arguments, touching "public sentiment" and the like, anxious to enlighten this humble Christian who was so far astray.

"'E did preach me a tag-end to 'is sermon" said Mr. Matthews to his wife after reaching home, "and 'e's a fine preacher, is Brother Douglas, but 'is temperance h'arguments won't stand fire. They'll shrink, they will, like a mess o' greens in 'ot water."

The temperance sermon had been preached, but no results were expected.

Old Fort Disgrace has become a target against which many a pulpit discharges its volleys of ammunition because it "must do something." But the old cartridge boxes hold nothing effective. Only one box—that which holds ballots—is feared by the men who do their fiendish work behind the walls!

The temperance sermon had been preached, and Mr. Douglas, with a sense of relief, had laid his notes away, and turned to his Fourth-of-July sermon which must fitly portray the greatness and glory of our native land.

Imagine, then, his surprise, and that of the people, when, on the next Wednesday evening, near the close of prayer-meeting, a man rose in the back part of the vestry and with tears confessed his sins, told how he had been awakened under that sermon, and asked the prayers of Christians.

"It's John Terry!" "He's more than half drunk!" "Poor fellow, he don't know what he's saying!" were the whispered words that greeted this pitiful appeal. But the minister had seen such cases before, and after the curious, chattering portion of the audience had been dismissed, a few believing ones gathered around this penitent prodigal and saw him saved.

Mr Douglas was wonderfully moved and encouraged by this unexpected conversion.

"We must work for souls, brethren," said he in a meeting of the officers of his church, a little later. "I have always believed that every season might be a harvest time if Christians were only alive to the possibilities. If you will pledge your help, I'll take no vacation and we will devote ourselves to earnest work."

There was no immediate response to this fervid appeal. After a whispered consultation, however, Mr. Pettigrew who was usually mouthpiece for the rest, said:

"You haven't forgotten that this is election year, have you? We're going to have excitement enough in politics, and seems to me it wouldn't be of much use to attempt extra church work. You can't hold people to anything till after election."

Near Mr. Pettegrew sat Rev. Simeon Snow, an elderly minister whose days of active service were over. He lived in Chesport, and was proving a mixed blessing to the pastors. After shaking his head solemnly, he added his protest, "I never attempted to hold extra meetings while the public mind was distracted by political questions."

"My thought was to move only as we had proof of God's leading," replied Mr. Douglas. "Others are feeling interested, and Mr. Terry's young daughter has already promised to join her father in seeking Christ."

"Let any come who will, of course, but I should advise no special effort till after election," said Mr. Snow with an air of finality. "Chesport 'll be a hot place for a few months now," said Mr. Pettigrew, continuing the subject as he walked homeward with the minister. "The parties are so evenly balanced that we have to manage things about right in order to swing the election. Of course, all our manufacturers are Republicans—good protectionists I'm thankful to say—and we calculate our employés shall vote right. But lots of these foreigners are Democrats, and then there's a handful of Prohibitionists that are bound to make trouble if they can. You know a few cranks can hire a speaker and set a flag fluttering, and that's enough to stir up a few other fanatics who don't know what they want, anyway. There's Matthews, and Blake, and Mrs. Reed and a few other sisters in our church;" here Mr. Pettigrew was obliged to pause and laugh.

"My soul! you'd think they could save the nation to hear them talk. I hope you understand that we don't care a straw for them, but they're aggravating. My policy is to work hard and keep still. Then when it's all over I don't have anybody's pardon to ask."

"I see," said the minister, as Mr. Pettigrew paused at the parsonage gate.

"There's one thing more, Brother Douglas, you mustn't feel too elated over John Terry. He thinks he's converted, and I hope he is, but he won't stand a great while. You can't expect it. He's one of those wideawake chaps, John is, when he's sober; but he's thrown with men that 'll try to pull him back, and every time he goes and comes from the mill he'll have to smell the stuff, and by and by it will be too much for him and down he goes! Oh, yes, I've seen such cases many a time . Good night."

Mr. Pettigrew lived "next door," and between the two families a pleasant friendship had already been established. He was a genial, generous man, and quite a leader in church matters, while his wife was equally interested in social and benevolent enterprises.

Hugh Douglas and Harry Pettigrew agreed in football and other games. Marion had found in Harry's sister Alice, a boon companion, while Ted and Dorothy played every pleasant day with Willie in the orchard back of the Pettigrew mansion.

Naturally, the minister felt the influence of his neighbor's words. Standing alone in the piazza with bared head he looked up at the stars which seemed so near that peerless June night, conscious that the enthusiasm and hope which had filled his heart when he went to the "board meeting," had vanished. Political issues were pending. The old party must be again vindicated. Soul-saving and politics were totally different, but why need they be? He remembered the old days when he prayed for Lincoln's election. and shouted and sang hallelujahs when it was confirmed. But hosannas must languish this year, for in all the pending issues, not one appealed to his higher nature.

And then, there was poor Terry! Sure to go down again, was he? And must men struggling for freedom be forever tempted? Would the time never come when strong wills and strong laws would give protection to such weakness? The cool evening breeze brought a faint rose perfume from unseen blossoms, as if "Araby the blest" were within each, and the stars shining in heights of solemn silence held a hint of eternal forces just out of sight; but Nature brought no answer to these tormenting questionings. And somehow, God does not seem disposed to send special revelations to men who will not live up to the dictates of their common sense!

With vacation days Archie came home from college bringing an atmosphere of jollity which was most reviving. But, the necessity of earning something being upon him, he was soon equipped with a canvassers' outfit, and sent forth to sound the praises of the candidate of his father's party. Then his light-heartedness vanished. Poor fellow! He was only one of the large army of unhappy youths of both sexes, who issue from schools and colleges every year and betake themselves more and more reluctantly, to the burned over "Canvasser's Territory."

"There, mother, it doesn't seem as if I could touch that book again!" said he one morning, looking at his "outfit" despairingly. "I'd rather pick huckleberries at five cents a quart."

"Where are your huckleberries, Archie?" she asked, with a sympathetic smile. "I'm sorry you have to canvass, but until somebody invents a summer vacation business, I don't know what can be done."

"But I'd rather shovel coal, or measure molasses, or sell peanuts!' quoth Archie.

"Pshaw!" interposed his father. "Just put a bold face on it and you'll have no trouble. Think of the advantages you have this summer! Here you are at home. where people will soon know you for your father's son." Archie only groaned. "The book is cheap, and one that every Republican ought to have, and if you push right along you'll find there's money in the business."

"But father," and Archie settled upon both elbows in a dispirited fashion. "These men get all they want in the newspapers. A man told me yesterday that he didn't care anything about the candidates, nor whether he was born in a log hut or a house with a French roof. All he wanted to know was if there was money enough to carry Connecticut! Another leading, citizen, said he didn't want the book, but could I tell him anything about the money barrel! The old Romans did better than this, for they wanted men for leaders, and barrels were looked upon with suspicion. And I declare, father, I don't believe much of this talk about tariff and protection, anyway, so I suppose I'm not quite sympathetic enough to suit those that want to talk politics. Lots of the fellows in college are studying and discussing these questions, and they think the United States is big enough and smart enough to go in for free trade on most lines. We think it's about time to overhaul the old parties, too, for they're awfully corrupt, everybody knows. I believe I'll vote for your candidate, mother, when I'm twenty one, and be a ranting, roaring Prohibitionist!" And Archie, in a mood which, would have found relief in tears if he had been a little boy, burst into a loud, but not altogether joyous laugh.

His mother's eyes were moist and shining as she said: "You couldn't please me better than to do that very thing. My candidate is a man who believes in the 'home protection' which protects the home first and always."

"There! there! you've taken hold of a big subject," said the minister, "too big for women and boys to handle. Meanwhile, Archie isn't selling any books, Brace up! Brace up! perhaps you'll sell a dozen to-day, and that means a dollar and eighty cents clear gain."

Archie had "soldier stuff" in his undeveloped young manhood or he could never have held on to this business which his soul abhorred, as he did during the months of July and August.

No tramp slinking around a house in search of a back door unguarded by a dog, was ever treated with more contempt than was our canvasser at the front door of many a pretentious home, when, in answer to his modest ring, the lady of the house would inform him in frigid tones that she wanted nothing, absolutely nothing of him or his wares. The relation of the public to the tramp and the canvasser is one of vital interest, which will probably be discussed sometime when scientists get through with bacteria.

As for Mr. Douglas, he continued to ponder. That he had a son who was forming opinions for himself he now fully admitted, and the fact that these opinions differed from his own did not arouse him as he felt it ought.

"The young rebel!" he would say to himself, "he's as notional as his mother is!" and then smile, with an inner consciousness of satisfaction that this son of many prayers was not among the "young Republicans," whose headquarters, fitted up with billiard tables and other luxuries, was already the source of much uneasiness in many a Chesport home.

Still, like a good "party man" he read his "party papers" and repeated: "Simon says: Thumbs up," or "Simon says: Thumbs down," as the leaders directed.

Unfortunately for his peace of mind, however, his wife received papers "ever and anon," which she had a habit of reading to him in leisure moments, or leaving where he could hardly avoid giving them a cursory glance. They contained some very unpleasant things, and Mr. Douglas was too good a logician to say, "They're lies, nothing but lies!" for he knew that to print lies on a scale so stupendous would ruin any newspaper in Christendom. He simply rubbed his forehead and waited, until something happened which was worth waiting for.

The Lord gave the word; the women that publish the tidings are a great host.—Ps. 68:11.

THE W. C. T. U. VANGUARD.

When the history of the reforms and religious movements of our times is written up a century hence, or when with clear vision we see as we are seen, the magnitude and the purely inspirational character of the crusade will be shown, as looking at it now from a near and closely involved relation we cannot apprehend. If the thousands of incidents and personal experiences could be given now no volume of romance could be so fascinating.

Yet to-day our task is difficult. Once we stood at the entrance of a mine beside a mountain of debris, looking among the many colored ores and minerals for "specimens" of value. Some one said "Oh, that pile has been culled over and over for the last fifteen years." We saw then that our quest would be fruitless. We are much in the same state now. These events have been set in order many times leaving nothing new to say. But the Israelite of old was to talk of Jehovah's dealings with his people, sitting in his house, walking by the way, lying down and rising up. Thus, should we at least once in the year recount the Lord's wonderful ways in his breathing upon his handmaidens to set them forth to redeem the temple of the Holy Ghost from the destroyer. We can only turn the kaleidoscope again, hoping for some new combination with which to arrest thought.

Nineteen years ago, to the best women, socially, intellectually and religiously, of Hillsboro and Washington Court House, Ohio, the call to arms against the liquor traffic was suddenly sounded. The equipment was not of this world, the munitions were from the Divine armory. Obedient to the call, but all undrilled and untrained they went forth, literally not knowing whither they went, to be followed in most rapid succession by like women of hundreds of towns and villages. The Great Commander issued His orders, and it did not occur to one even to think, "I pray thee have me excused," in this most novel campaign. Suddenly processions of women, who in this knew no leader but the Holy Spirit, were seen in the streets of these towns. The power which sent quiet, modest women forth from their homes, to pray on street corners and in saloons is impossible of description, and more difficult of understanding to those who were not participants. It must be accepted that nothing short of divine inspiration and commission could accomplish it. Nothing could be farther removed from fanaticism. Nothing more easy, since all thought and sense were closed to everything but the presence of God Himself, and all surroundings were forgotten. The very atmosphere was so changed that our enemies themselves being judges, acknowledged it. The air was surcharged with a divine, irrisistible presence, so marked, so pervasive, that the most ungodly knew a power now which they had never been willing to admit. Saloon-keepers awaited the coming of "them women" with pallid cheeks and trembling knees; the force accompanying these could not be bribed nor browbeaten nor bought.

The drink traffic had assumed such tremendous proportions, its respectability had been so enhanced by the government partnership in the revenue tax, the habit was increasing so rapidly, especially in the years immediately subsequent to the war, that God took a signal means to call a halt before the world. The prayer challenge had just been thrown down by freethinkers and infidels, and He would vindicate Himself by unfranchised women, those ignorant, too, of the great forces at command of this oligarchy, unaware that the saloon was not the objective point, that behind it was the wholesale dealer and the manufacturer, behind them the protection of law, and above all, that strongest passion, avarice, and all these firmly bound together by party politics. Perhaps we expected immediate answer to these agonizing prayers; we possibly looked for an immediate miracle to be wrought, banishing for ever all intoxicants. But the divine plans are wider and deeper than any of our puny thoughts, our prayers may be only the machinery for His warp and woof. The bands called in this marvelous way for street work were comparatively few, but almost spontaneously and "without observation" the hosts rallied; women came together in village and city with "Here am I, Lord, send me," these bands crystallized into state organizations, the states naturally flowed into a national, yet with little idea as to what might be accomplished or how the great end could be reached.

The very call to work itself indicated as our first line, Evangelistic work, the gospel temperance meeting and its beneficent results, and this has now branched out into many avenues. The preventive lines most naturally suggested to women pre-empting the children in secular and Sabbath schools, in learning the law of God in the written word and in the nerve and fiber of their own being. The Briareus armed forces of the press were mortgaged and now millions of leaves for the healing of the nations are sown beside all waters.

As we found that law must be the foundation upon which a pure republic could stand, so its powers have been evoked. We have learned that no palliatives avail, that right and wrong, thou shalt and shalt not, are the two paths from the beginning, as in great moral wrong there can be no ground of legal right, campaign after campaign has been fought for the entire prohibition of the traffic. There have been eighteen state campaigns for constitutional prohibition of which seven have been acknowledged successful. But in all these discussions, the agitation, the education has been past all computation. Thirty-four states have passed scientific temperance instruction laws, there have been hundreds of minor triumphs in legislatures, thousands in town councils and although there have been many defeats, yet these victories give us hope and faith and courage.

Seeing these things are so, what manner of women ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness?

FOSSILS AND FANATICS ON TOTAL ABSTINENCE.

In all intelligent circles in America, total abstinence is now a closed issue. No one who values his reputation for a knowledge of the latest results of science, defends moderate drinking. This attitude of cultured sentiment has been brought about by four causes:

1. The progress of science as represented by the latest and most approved text books of physiology and hygiene. These are now all keyed up to the level of total abstinence. Our foremost publishing houses, such as the Appleton's, A. S. Barnes & Co., Ivison, Blakeman & Co., and the great syndicate of the American Book Company are all now issuing tens of thousands of school books, teaching in the name of science the impolicy and peril of moderate drinking. The tendency of the use of a little intoxicating liquor is notoriously to produce a diseased appetite for more. Alcohol is Satan's fishhook, with a barb which easily goes in and not easily out.

2. The life assurance societies affirm that a man in middle life has a third better chance of long life as a total abstainer than a moderate driker. Many such societies divide their clients into two classes, viz., total abstainers and moderate drinkers, and find that a premium of from ten to twenty-three per cent must be paid to the total abstainers as compared with the moderate drinkers, so much less is the mortality among the former than among the latter.

3. The progress of scientific temperance instruction in the public schools. Thirty-six states of the American Union with all our territories, military and naval schools and the District of Columbia are now under laws making scientific temperance instruction in the public schools mandatory. This extraordinary result has been brought about chiefly by the labors of Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, National and World's superintendent of the department of scientific temperance instruction in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, with the vigorous coöperation of that almost omnipresent and exceedingly aggressive reformatory body. A majority of the votes of the next generation in the American republic are now in schools which distinctly teach total abstinence.

4. Most of the great Protestant denominations exclude rumsellers from church membership. The Methodist church declares that the liquor traffic can never be legalized without sin. It is of course flat self-contradiction and moral dishonor for the church with one hand to exclude rumsellers from membership, and with the other hand to vote to legalize the business of rumsellers.

It is only fair to claim that the parlor, pulpit and politics should rise to the temperance level of approved scientific text books and of the life assurance societies and of the common schools.

In this general position of really enlightened American sentiment on the temperance reform the opinions of certain fossils in support of tippling are benighted and belated to a pitiable degree.

In the following astonishing passage from a leading article in the London Times of August 2, 1892, the "Thunderer" for the thousandth time shows himself to be a blunderer:

"It has never been conclusively shown upon scientific grounds that the practice of moderate drinking is attended by injurious physical consequencs, while the personal experience of the overwhelming majority of civilized mankind convinces them that it does not prejudice their moral nature."

Club life in its fashionable quarters in our great cities often has a most mischievous effect by its defense of moderate drinking. Any club that keeps an open bar drops below the commercial level of the life assurance societies, and the scientific educational level of the common schools.

It is to be feared that some club men who are not total abstainers, but who are church members of a poor sort hold clubs over the heads of certain city preachers who, without such intimidation, would oftener speak out against the licensing of the liquor traffic and for total abstinence.

It should be always remembered that the licensing of the gilded high-priced saloon is now very nearly equivalent in practical effect to the licensing of its two notorious allies, the gambling hell and the brothel. These three constitute a trinity of infamy in our great towns under the system of high license.

The sums which the liquor seller pays to the state for license he knows how to fleece from the community. License in every form is a system by which you rob Peter to pay Paul and do not pay Paul. It is a scheme by which you save at the spigot and waste at the barrel head. It has been carefully estimated that for every dollar received by the state in license fees there is at least a waste of twenty dollars by the direct effect of the license which the dollar covers. Herrick Johnson, of Chicago, deserves to be remembered a thousand years for a single epigram: "Low license asks for your son: High license for your daughter also."

In the present attitude of enlightened public sentiment pulpit apologies for the saloon are to the last degree amazing and morally revolting. The Bishop of Chester, England, however, in the London Times of August 2d, exhibits the deficiency of his scientific, political and moral equipment by saying. "The large majority of thoughtful men allow that the moderate use of intoxicating liquors has much to say for itself and that in any case the deep-rooted habits of the nation are to be modified rather than set at defiance." He deliberately proposes a superficial scheme of state saloons in place of the existing British public house system. He would have such supervision exercised over these establishments as would "bring temperance drinks well to the front" and secure alcoholic liquors from adulteration. He is so sanguine as to suppose that the drink shop, the gin palace and the bar would be utterly abolished by the execution of his plan.

Pulpit apologies for prostitution deserve the utmost conspicuity of infamy. They astound civilization. They are an omen of impending paganism. Such apologies have been made recently by the Rev. Dr. Rainsford, of New York City. It is not amazing that he who apologizes for prostitution should apologize also for the liquor traffic and propose a system of church saloons. Dr. Parkhurst has been attacking social vice and proving the complicity of the New York City government with crime. He is one spark from Pentecost. But Dr. Rainsford's apology for the liquor traffic and prostitution we do not hesitate to characterize as a spark from the pit. He is at present, but one would think that he cannot long remain, rector of St. George's Protestant Episcopal Church. His opinions and prejudices in regard to the liquor traffic and social vice he seems to have derived from the low bred forms of the worst factions of aristocratic fashion and club-life. This preacher, as represented by the following extract from a communication of his in the New York Sun of May 24, 1892, appears to us not to have risen much above the levels of preachers to that execrable, although kingly, representative of what the modern world of average culture regard as, of course, outgrown barbarism:

"I will say this much, that if I could close every saloon in this city to-day by raising my finger, I would not raise my finger. My reason is perfectly clear and definite. I believe, and every other observing and thinking man must believe, that in a great and crowded city like this, drinking is a necessary evil. It must be accepted as one of the conditions of a densely packed population, drawn from every quarter of the globe, in the present age. In devising means to remedy the great evils of intemperance, it must be remembered that this condition exists. Closing saloons will not stop drinking. It will simply drive it to cover. If I were to close every saloon to-day, to-morrow they would all be open again, but hidden away in tenement houses, where they would do vastly more harm. You cannot suppress rum selling and rum-drinking in this age and in this city. You must attack the evil in another way. I hold the same opinion about these disorderly houses which have been talked of so much lately. Prostitution is another necessary condition of life in such a city as this. If I had the power I would not close up all such houses, for I would only drive vice into the very homes of this town. Six hundred thousand of the inhabitants of New York are more closely packed together than any similar population in any other spot on the globe. Methods which may be effective elsewhere will not be effective here.

"What we must do to combat intemperance is to provide public resorts which are not tainted with vice and corruption. If people must drink, we can provide them respectable places to drink in. We can open saloons where beer and light wines may be had by those who want them, and where the surroundings will be clean, cheerful and moral. There may be billiard tables and bowling alleys, and tables where people may sit and chat while they drink their beer. There may also be a supply of newspapers and periodicals. Such a saloon as this would offer attractions which would enable it to compete effectively with vicious resorts. It is not possible to suppress saloons, but it is possible to elevate them to a plane which they have never before occupied.

"I would have no whisky or other powerful intoxicants in these saloons. Beer and light wines will satisfy all but drunkards. Now, the man who wants a glass of beer must go to a low resort where fiery liquids are the chief stock in trade, and the temptation is always from lighter to stronger. Besides beer and light wines I would have coffee and chocolate. The tendency of the place would be temperate, while at the same time those who insisted on light stimulants would not be driven to low resorts.

"Then I would have these saloons open on Sunday during proper hours for the accommodation of those who are in the habit of having beer or wine every day, and who now have to encourage law-breaking by entering side doors into dark and ill-smelling places for their Sunday beverage. I would have these places law-abiding. I would have them close strictly at the expiration of legal hours."

We place on record as a curiosity of infamy, these benighted, belated and monstrous opinions, which have been received by the best parts of the press of the country with spiritual horror, and by the vilest elements in our crowded municipalities with acclamation.

AN UNTRIED FIELD.

Miss Margaret W. Leitch, a young missionary of seven years' experience in Ceylon, a native of Vermont, but of Scotch ancestry, has just been with us, and we have learned much about that attractive field. There is probably not a country in the world less understood by Americans than Ceylon. We have been singing for generations that it is a part of the world,

"Where every prospect pleases
And only man is vile."

Our average opinion concerning it is a striking illustration of the power of the human mind to retain a wrong impression. The facts are that Ceylon is a most beautiful and favorite island as to its humanity no less than its climate and vegetation. The people are gentle, cleanly, well-mannered, and full of traits to be admired. Missionaries work among them with excellent successes. Although thirty-five missionary societies are now laboring in China, there are but 16,500 children in their schools, while in Ceylon with but five missionary societies there are over 40,000 children in the schools.

The Island is but a few hours' ride by steamer from India and all the advantages of that great country, for which British rule has done so much of good as well as evil, are shared by the crown colony of Ceylon, which has railroads, fine post roads, and all the conveniences of modern civilization. Medical missionary colleges for men and women are to be established in Ceylon, and the natives warmly welcome help in this direction; the most intelligent families are even willing that their girls should become physicians, which shows what a wonderful overturning of sentiment has been achieved. The greatness of this change can be better appreciated when it is known that the missionaries were met on their first suggestion of teaching the girls to read by such remarks as these from leading men: "You see that horse by the wayside? Now if you won't think of teaching a horse to read, which is an intelligent animal, why should you propose to teach our girls, who have no minds whatever? I tell you they cannot learn to read. You will waste your time. You might as well try to teach your alphabet to our cows."

These remarks are more inane when one remembers that the men making them were wont to be doctored by medicine men, who, if a bone were broken, hung a charm over it and had an offering made to the gods in the temple, not having learned in thousands of years to set a broken limb. Perhaps no fact proves the lack of mental motion in the men of the East better than this other fact, that there doctors give as medicine prescriptions containing sixty different kinds of material, saying: "We give all the kinds we know so that if one does not work another will." If a patient shows great weakness they administer the powdered tooth of a horse, for "the horse is the strongest animal we know, and the tooth is the strongest part of the horse."

We adduce these facts to furnish a background for the splendid outlook of women at present in Ceylon. Now, we greatly desire to send a missionary there and Miss Leitch assures us that if we can furnish one who is equal to the occasion, and, she said significantly, "We do not want the lame of your flock," such a young woman would be furnished a home whenever she needed it in the headquarters of the medical mission for women, one of the three institutions for which Miss Leitch, her sister and brother have raised $300,000 in cash and pledges in the last five years.

One of the best means of support for such a missionary would be to have illustrations of American scenery, buildings, customs, distinguished personages, etc., which she could throw on a screen by means of the stereopticon and to exhibit to an audience for a small sum. Lecturing one evening on the subject of America, she could the next day have an afternoon temperance meeting and the next evening would be likely to draw a good audience to a temperance lecture and would secure a fair collection.

Now we propose this plan to young women who are seeking to enter the ranks of philanthropy. There is no lack of them ready and glad to go. They have the ability to make a success. Their hearts are devoted to the cause of Christ and gospel temperance, but we have not the money to pay their expenses to these countries.

We hope that some one who reads these lines will send us word that he or she is willing to furnish the needful amount to exploit these young Christian workers to countries that need them, for, as Miss Leitch wisely says, the missionaries are now so burdened that they cannot sustain the work of temperance as they ought to do and as they desire to do. They are like a horse with a heavy load going down hill, the load pushing with all there is in it at every step, for they are tasked to the utmost of their power by the societies that send them out and though they may do some teaching in the schools that will help on the good cause of temperance, physiology and hygiene, we cannot expect systematic and concerted action unless we send out our specialists to quicken the enthusiasm of the missionaries and to aid and abet their efforts.

The World's W. C. T. U. is rapidly becoming an assured fact stretching its telegraph lines wherever civilization has preceded it. We wish to multiply its benign forces under all skies and we do not believe that so small an amount of money could be used anywhere to bless the race more signally than by paying the expenses of capable young women who shall go out under our banner to fight opium and alcohol in the oriental countries.

WONDERFUL are the orderings of heaven. When God would lead out His people He chooses a pathway that no human power would have dreamed of indicating. It is always after the punishment of plagues has long been tried, and after His people have patiently endured hardness, as good soldiers in the houses of their taskmasters. Then He chooses their leaders, sounds His trumpet call sifts out the hearts of men before His judgment seat, sends the pilgrims on their way under cover of great darkness, and commands them to march onward through the sea which opens before them at His word, and closes behind them, swallowing up their enemies in a divine deliverance for the hosts of God, and vengeance on the hosts of sin. This miracle is repeated in every age according to the supreme crisis of the time, and men are fond of saying: "It is the world spirit, it is the modern movement, it is the new conscience, it is the scientific method"; but over, under, and within all these it is God, and God alone, hidden in manifold disguises, but following the old plan of leading out of Egypt by way of the wilderness into the promised land. The temperance reform is no exception to this rule. Indeed, how could it be since it is the greatest movement that the world knows in these later ages, and supremely demands for its success the supreme method of God? It is a movement not only for the protection of the home from the curse of voluntary insanity—otherwise called drunkenness—on the part of those who are its sworn protectors, and from the Satanic greed that gorges itself on victims the most helpless and the most innocent; but it is God's way of leading out one-half the race into their wide and heavenly heritage, which is to make not an individual home alone, but to make of humanity and all the world a larger home for all who dwell therein, not for their own sake only, but for the sacred sake of humanity as a whole. The group that is of all others fittest to survive is the one that includes father, mother and child, and whatever reformer fails to take note of these figures and to put them in their immemorial place as keystone of the arch he is building has simply squinted at his work and proved himself incapable of giving to it an all-rounded symmetry and scope.

The good tidings comes from across the waters that an accomplished young woman, a graduate of Girton College, has been chosen by the British women to go as white-ribbon missionary to India. She will be accompanied by a young woman helper and will remain in that country organizing our societies and developing our methods. The World's Union greatly desires to send a representative to China, another to Ceylon, and another to Egypt, but has not had the money to do this. If the collections made on World's W. C. T. U. Day, September 22, authorize this expansion of the work it will promptly be done.

It is earnestly desired by Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt that there should be no misunderstanding as to the use to be made of the collections received from the local unions on the World's W. C. T. U. Day. Such collections are to be sent to Mrs. Ella F. M. Williams, 26 Chomedy street, Montreal, Canada, treasurer of the World's W. C. T. U., to be employed in carrying on the work, strengthening our societies in foreign countries, and multiplying their number; also for the office expenses of the society. It is earnestly hoped that a fund will be created as a memorial of our appreciation of the pioneer work done by Mrs. Leavitt, and that such an enterprise will be inaugurated by the National convention in Denver, October 28. September 22 has been specifically set apart for the purposes herein indicated.

The only two round-the world missionaries who have gone out together, in Apostolic fashion, are Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew, and Dr. Kate Bushnell. Two years ago this month, they left their homes in Evanston and the work and workers endeared to them in their native land, and turned their faces eastward, not knowing by what path the Lord would lead them. After six months of constant meetings in Great Britain, they sailed for South America where they labored for another six months. India was the next field and here their efforts were chiefly for the promotion of social purity among the women of the military stations. Particulars of this wonderful work will be given later. They are now in Australia, where they have received a warm welcome, as testified by the following letter: "When we saw from THE UNION SIGNAL twenty months ago that Mrs. E. W. Andrew, and Dr. Kate Bushnell had started on a tour round the world, as World's evangelists, we never expected to be so honored in our small corner. Their addresses have taken hold of us, they seemed just suited to our needs. Mrs. Andrew is such a lovable, earnest woman, that to be with her for a short time, means to want to be more in earnest ourselves, while Dr. Bushnell has a face which is a revelation of 'the life hid with Christ in God.' Her subject, social purity, is so cleverly handled, and is placed on such a firm basis of Bible truths that we feel God has indeed called her to the work, and has given her the wisdom needed for treating successfully such a delicate and intricate question."

Readers of THE UNION SIGNAL will be glad to know that there is a stirring up in the Valley of Dry Bones away over in the eastern part of Europe of an imperturbable and unmistakable character. Mrs. E. T. Maltbie, a returned missionary of high standing, vouches for the young Bulgarian woman by name Mareeka Nedelkova, who is at present studying in Geneva, Switzerland, for the express purpose of going back to her native country, and founding a journal for Bulgarian women. This young woman writes: "As a nation, we in Bulgaria have recently been made independent, but we lack many things, commencing with the need of a stable government, good educational institutions, and a pervading Christian spirit. We have been called Christians for more than a thousand years, but to-day only the form exists in a dying state, which does not content even the mass of the people. Since our emancipation we are in direct communication with Europe. That civilization with all its new ideas and vices is introducing itself among us. Everything that comes from there is received without much criticism or reserve. It is true that we are having missionaries for a long time, but they are few proportionately, and besides they are not understood. At one time there even existed the grotesque idea that Christianity was a political propoganda supported by England. It seems hard for most people to understand how other people can do anything to help the world along without having a personal interest in the outcome. It is my belief that giving a Christian education to the women of the country, means in the long run to educate that country itself. So I have thought it would be the best plan by which I can help, to give my sisters a journal to be published and sent to their homes, to be read by them and to enlighten their outlook and ideas."

WORK AMONG CHILDREN.

To all the Little Men and Women:

For fifteen years my thoughts have been devoted to you. How to make life best and happiest for "the little soldiers newly mustered in" has been my study. It is my work to try to form in every village, town and city of the world, beautiful groups of boys and girls—Miss Willard calls them "Ring-round-roses." They take hold of hands and say, all of them speaking like one voice: "We will not drink the drinks that make men drunk; we will not smoke or chew; we will not use bad language." Then each boy or girl tries to get one more to come and join the circle, so as to make it larger and to make life more healthy and happy for each one. Because if they do not begin to do these evil things when they are little, they will be pretty sure not to do them when they are big.

We call these happy groups of boys and girls our Loyal Temperance Legions. Each has its flag, and this is what we like to have printed on every banner, "Tremble. King Alcohol; we shall grow up." In America we call our flag the "stars and stripes"; in England, it is the Union Jack, and so on in each country. The children love their own country's flag best of all the flags that fly, and so they ought. But we print our motto on each one, so that the boys and girls shall early know and feel that to leave strong drink alone, and every unclean, impure thing, is to help wash from the flag the stains that are now upon it in every land and to make it bright and pure and great.

We are working now for the World's Fair, to be held in Chicago next year. I ask each boy and girl to send me a card with these words:

Pledge.

Trusting in God's help, I solemnly promise to abstain from the use of alcoholic drinks, including wine, beer and cider; from the use of tobacco in any form, and from profanity.

These cards have on them the national colors of the different countries, and they are to be strung like beads in a great necklace which we hope will be more than a mile long, and festooned in pretty shapes and patterns at our exhibit at the headquarters of the World's W. C. T. U., beside the World's Petition, which is going to be used to paper the whole place, and to festoon it with our cards for trimming. Your fathers and mothers can tell you about the wonderful World's Petition, which we think will be ten miles long, and has already been signed in forty different languages, and is to be carried around the world by a commission of white-ribbon women, asking, as the petition asks, the different governments of the world to make laws against the sale of alcoholic drink and opium.

Any boys or girls who would like to do so may send us, with the pledge they sign, ten cents, with which we are going to buy a beautiful fountain, the work of the famous sculptor, Miss Anne Whitney, of Boston. This statue represents a lovely child, who playfully draws a white lily over his head, and out of the lily comes the spray through which his lovely figure is seen. This fountain is to be placed in the center of the W. C. T. U. Temple of which you have heard—the most magnificent building in Chicago, the home of the white-ribbon men, women and children of the world. The fountain is the gift of the children, no one contributing more than ten cents. Would you not like to feel that you had one silver share in all that the fountain and the Temple mean as the world's great object lesson, teaching and pointing all men towards a pure, clean life?

We are doing a great many other things, but I send this message because the World's Fair is coming now so soon, and a great many of you will be present.

Let me earnestly ask you to see if you can organize a group of Loyal Temperance Legion children. Send for "Questions Answered" to the W. C. T. U. Temple; it is a little book that tells just how to begin. Write me about it when you have done so, or write to our editor, Miss Alice Guernsey, who publishes in The Young Crusader everything about our work, besides stories, pictures, poems, puzzles; all for the purpose of helping children to be healthy, happy and good.

Believe me, with true, sisterly love, yours for little heads and hands that shall never know of drink; mouths that shall be always clean from oaths and from tobacco, and sweet, true voices that shall sing the songs of God and Home and Every Land.

Anna A. Gordon.

World's Supt. of Work Among Children.

PRISON, JAIL, POLICE AND ALMSHOUSE WORK.

For years I have carried in my Bible Plackhurst's beautiful picture of "Christ and his mother." The expression on Christ's face as he looks down into his mother's eyes has seemed to say to me, "Yes, dear, I know it all—your mother heart, with its awful capacity for suffering, your love and longing, and I charge you to remember always that fatherhood and motherhood meet in the great heart of the All-Father and that you will never be alone in your joy or sorrow."

In these months of watchful care and nursing I have been drawn nearer to the world's suffering than ever before, and in the midst of the great thankfulness for the privilege of this blessed ministry my heart has gone out to the unnumbered mothers, whose sons are removed from them, and who have not my comfort and hope.

In our "Inasmuch" Department and the efforts put forth in our various lines of preventive and rescue work, we do well to remember that we are not only working for them but for a great army of sufferers, back of the classes we meet in police and prison circles, the innocent ones, who suffer with and for the guilty. It should quicken our steps and strengthen our hands as we realize the double service to which we are called, and as "no one lives to himself," every life which is lifted up may mean the uplifting of many others.

I should like to send my thanks to all who have so kindly coöperated with me, and ask from them a careful statement of what has been done, of the plans made and advance along any of our lines, in short, anything which you would like to have appear in our report to the World's Convention. This should reach me early in '93, that no land may be unrepresented and that I may not be hurried or anxious over it. Let me hear from every country where we have at least one W. C. T. U. worker.

Our department moves slowly, because of a prejudice against woman's work in these lines in most countries, but, dear sisters, God can use you to awaken interest in the hearts of others, which will lead to inquiry and investigation, and while you are praying, He will answer by exposing injustice and oppression, and bringing to light the terrible neglect and abuse which has so long existed. Some of my most interesting correspondence has come through missionaries or English residents, who have been moved by the pleadings of some one who could not be known in the work herself. If this message comes under the eye of friends thus working, will they kindly write again, being assured of their name being withheld if they so desire.

Let us have a superintendent in every land, even if you "cannot see what she could do." These are historic days, over which angels watch and the "Door of Opportunity" may be only waiting for your touch of prayer and faith to "open wide" In His Name." May the Holy Spirit blessedly call and fit our women for this work, which in a very peculiar way gives to the worker "fellowship with the sufferings of Christ." Yours in blessed bonds, World's Superintendent. Mrs. J. K. Barney.

PEACE AND ARBITRATION.

The entire world is equipped for war. The smallest movement may throw all Europe into a state of warfare, and how long or wide-spread such a state may last is an anxious question in every land.

What if our white ribbon which belts the globe should be tinged with the blood of battle! If the principles of peace and arbitration are not conscientiously taught in the next fifty years, who knows but at the end of that time the greater part of the world may be in arms, and all communication between the W. C. T. Unions of different nations be cut off. A World's convention may not be a possibility in every year that awaits us in the future.

Not many countries have yet taken up the work of our peace department, but those which have done so have been greatly blest in their efforts. Mrs. Lucy Coleman, of Mt. Barker, South Australia, is the very efficient superintendent of this department for Australasia. Much literature has been distributed there, drawing-room meetings held, juvenile work vigorously pushed, efforts made to interest ministers and teachers and to induce them to advocate peace principles from pulpit and desk.

In England, France and some parts of Germany, Italy, India, Spain, Palestine and in Mexico the principles of our department have been promulgated by other peace organizations, but have not been indorsed and carried on by the W. C. T. Unions, officially, although urged to do so. Our papers and literature have been received, appreciated and utilized in all these countries, and some of them have been reprinted and sold or freely distributed, with very satisfactory results. Our peace department lecturer, Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, gave eleven addresses in England and Scotland last summer, and attended the Dominion convention in Canada in the interests of the work. More than sixty thousand copies of three of our best peace tracts have been translated into foreign languages and distributed in various countries.

A "Woman's Peace Association" has been formed at Palermo, Sicily. Signorina Mayetta Campo, a member of a patriotic family there, and an author, held a meeting on July 5th, (last year) at the rooms of the "White Cross," and addressed a select company in a brilliant speech upon the mission of women in propagating peace. The result was that a society was formed with the Baroness di Bosco-Grande for president.

Miss Etta H. Johnston, a missionary at Ramallah, Palestine, has been appointed superintendent of the work of our department for that country, and is doing faithful service for the promotion of the peace cause.

At the annual convention this year the department was adopted by the Dominion and Mrs. Mary McDowell, of Toronto, appointed superintendent.

In the United States much has been done and it is hoped that this nation will take the lead in trying to obtain an international court of arbitration for all the world. Since our organization four years ago, our lecturers have addressed more than four hundred audiences; more than a hundred sermons have been preached; more than a hundred thousand tracts distributed; books and papers have been published; "peace day" instituted and observed; Peace Bands organized and other juvenile work done; concert exercises and Bible readings given; petitions circulated and much personal work accomplished that cannot be estimated. Two papers are published monthly at Winthrop Center, Vt., one for this department: The Pacific Banner and The Acorn. The latter is adapted to children.

Courteous and encouraging letters have been received from W. C. T. U. presidents in South America, South Africa, India, Denmark, and other countries, expressing sympathy with the work of the department and regret that it did not appear to be consistently practicable for them to adopt it at present. The chief difficulties seem to be the want of more workers.

The quarrels and battles with the Indians in the United States are a disgrace to the civilization of this age. When courts of arbitration for the settlement of national disputes are established, all wars will soon be a dark, historic record, and the reign of violence o'er in national life, the individual heart will learn to be at peace with God and man.

Hannah J. Bailey,

Supt. World's W. C. T. U. Dept. of Peace and Arbitration.

PRESENT STATUS OF WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

It is often said by persons not acquainted with the facts, that while great progress has been made in the movement to give women higher education, improved property-rights, etc., little or no progress has been made in the direct line of obtaining suffrage. That this is a mistake will be seen by reckoning up the actual gains.

A Southern state was the first to grant school suffrage to women. Kentucky extended that right to them in 1845, limiting it, however, to widows. Kentucky, the earliest state to give women school suffrage, is almost the only state that now maintains this discrimination against women who have living husbands. The next state to give women school suffrage was Kansas, in 1861. In 1869 England extended municipal suffrage to single women and widows, and in the same year Wyoming gave full suffrage to all women. In 1871 municipal suffrage was extended to the single women and widows of Scotland. In 1875 school suffrage was granted to women by Michigan and Minnesota; in 1876, by Colorado; in 1878, by New Hampshire and Oregon; in 1879, by Massachusetts; in 1880, by New York and Vermont; in 1883, by Nebraska; in 1885, by Wisconsin; in 1886, by Washington; in 1887, by New Jersey, North Dakota, South Dakota, Idaho, Montana and Arizona, and in the same year municipal suffrage was granted in Kansas. In 1891 school suffrage was given by Illinois. In a number of other states, including Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Iowa, California, Louisiana, Indiana and Connecticut, women can hold school offices, though they have not school suffrage. In Louisiana and Montana women vote on questions submitted to the taxpayers. Municipal suffrage has also been granted to single women and widows in Canada, British Columbia, and most of the British provinces in Australia; but I am unable to give the dates of the separate enactments.

Thus it will be seen that twenty-five years ago women could not vote anywhere, except on schoool questions in Kansas and Kentucky. To-day they have school suffrage in twenty-one states and territories, full suffrage in Wyoming, municipal suffrage in Kansas, and municipal suffrage (single women and widows) throughout England, Scotland, and most of the British Colonies in America and Australia. All this has been gained during the last quarter of a century. There have been a few halts and rebuffs, occasional eddies in the current; but the direction of the stream is unmistakable. Slowly but surely the common sense of the world is working around to a belief in equal rights for women.

The foregoing summary is compiled from the latest information to which I had access. If there are any mistakes in it, I shall be glad to have them set right; and also to receive the names of any additional states where women can hold school offices.

Boston, Mass. Asso. Nat. Supt. Franchise.

WORLD'S OUTLOOK FOR YOUNG WOMEN'S WORK.

I never thought far-away countries could be brought so near even by the latest inventions of steam and electricity. The life line of the white ribbon has not only reached the remotest nation, but has drawn the women of many nations so closely together that the young women's unions at home and abroad seem the same to me. I think of the superintendents of South Africa, Australia and New Zealand as I do of those in New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. Our objects and principles are alike and the all prevailing evil of intemperance demands our interest and our efforts everywhere. Even though the latest reports are not at hand I do not forget the encouragement that has come to me during the past year by letters from all the foreign superintendents of Y work. These have recently been answered and parcels of literature sent with the request for united work in obtaining signatures to the World's Petition, and for detailed reports to be sent by June, '93, for the World's Temperance Congress in Chicago.

Thus far, young women's work has been taken up in the following countries: Hawaiian Islands, New Zealand, New South Wales, Queensland, Victoria, South Australia, Natal and Cape Colony, and unions have been organized in Rome, Italy, Paris, France, and Asiatic Turkey. At the last hearing there were twelve Y. W. C. T. U. unions in South Africa, and their paper, Y's and Otherwise is a bright little monthly. From its "Round Table" one gathers the latest doings of these bright, energetic circles of girls and learns of their persistence in forming new unions amidst difficulties we scarcely understand. The return of Miss Campbell to Cape Colony will give fresh enthusiasm to the workers there. Indeed, the progress made in South Africa has cheered my heart more than the reports from any other country, not excepting our own United States, and the outlook is most hopeful. Within one year sixteen Y Branches were organized in Great Britain.

Already reports have appeared in THE UNION SIGNAL of Miss Gibson's work in Paris since her return, and although she has been absent in England for a little time, the work has gone on in her absence under the care of Miss Brown, and will be continued with increasing interest during the coming winter. The gathering of many peoples to the great Chicago Exposition will be like the arteries in the circulatory system of the world, they may send out their best, but when the tide flows back it should be with blood purified. Our young women must do their part to make this true, and be alive to their responsibility in the moral conscience that will follow. We must send back temperance leaves for the healing of the nations. We must lift our voices against the gospel and the grog being carried in the same ship from our ports; and we must illustrate by precept and example the better and more healthful life by keeping holy the Sabbath day, by keeping our total abstinence vows, and by using every effort to rule out intoxicants from the great Exposition.

THE TEMPERANCE WORK IN DENMARK.

The state of Denmark has the deplorable reputation of being one of the countries in the world where the most liquor is consumed. Centuries before the birth of Christ, history tells us how the old Danish warriors spent the winter months in drunken revels, old strong mead being the liquor used.

The Scandinavian nations as a whole are inclined to use strong drink, perhaps on account of a cold and changeable climate. But there is the difference, that when the Norwegian or Swede drinks, he drinks heavily for a while, then he stops; but slow and steady drinking is found to a greater extent in Denmark than perhaps in any other country. Norway was the first of the Scandinavian states to embrace the temperance ideas brought to it from the United States; and the earnestness which characterizes this nation, soon showed forth in the temperance work.

About fourteen years ago the temperance army in Norway was strong enough to send troops to Denmark, where they were greeted either with the utmost indifference, or with violent resistance. Meanwhile Sweden had been strongly stirred by the temperance movement in the brotherland. King Gustav the Third had in the beginning of the eighteenth century, out of greed for money, made a nation of drunkards out of the Swedish people; he had made the distilling of whisky a government monopoly, and encouraged in every way the use of liquor. The condition of the nation became through this so bad, that the earnest element was ready to help the Norwegians as soon as they came.

A little while after the Norwegians had commenced work in Denmark, the Swedes came to their assistance. For many years no women took part in the work; it was carried on mainly among the peasantry and the laboring classes of the cities, those being the most afflicted by the scourge of liquor. A farmer and congress member, Claus Johansen, has for years been the leader of temperance work. The educated classes remained in lofty indifference to the whole question.

The temperance people tried to have a law passed to close the saloons on Sundays, but they did not succeed. They are closed by law every evening between ten and eleven. The chief-of-police of Copenhagen attempted to enforce an amendment, that any person seen drunk on the streets was liable to a fine; but it met with strong objection; it was claimed to promote injustice, as the rich men could hire a cab and get home undetected, while the poor man would have to pay the fine. The law is now, that any drunken person shall be conveyed to his home by the saloon-keeper in whose saloon he got drunk; if not, the saloon-keeper, not the drunken man, will be fined. [A capital law.—EDS.] A saloon-keeper pays fifty dollars for a license. There is very small duty on imported wines, and common liquors are so cheap, that three pints of rye-whisky can be bought for ten cents. As a whole the temperance work in Denmark has been carried on under such unfavorable circumstances, that, though hard work has been done, the results are only small. The yearly consumption of liquor amounts to seventy thousand crowns, or as much as the exportation of the renowned Danish horses amounts to—and that is one of the most important resources of the state.

Four years ago the educated classes were stirred up to an understanding of the deplorable condition. The societies of the white ribbon and the blue ribbon were brought to Denmark from the United States. Mrs. Selmer, of Copenhagen, being the one who took the leadership. This gave a new life to the struggling temperance work. As the refined women of the nation (though the aristocracy as a rule is against the temperance movement, and the church is indifferent) took part in the work, the homes got to understand that moderate drinking was the curse of even the best among them, that "moderate drinking" had created a nation, which laughing saw its sons go down towards peril, and then commenced crying, when it was too late.

NICO BECK MEYER.

TEMPERANCE MISSIONARIES FOR INDIA.

In the last ten years great gain has been made in effective planning for temperance work in India, and in systematically laying siege to the "powers that be" through whom success is possible. It is well to convince an army of helpless people that something needs to be done, but a few convinced, who have power to do, count more for the end desired.

Glad tears came when I read the decision of the Boston Convention to send out six foreign missionaries, and one of these to India. Our brave Mrs. Leavitt introduced the work; workers who can stay will prosecute it. Miss Ackerman did well to remain in Australia.

Your decision to send one missionary each to India, China and other countries, was doubtless made with the desire to enter as many countries as possible, and from the thought that six missionaries were all that could now be sent. But should one woman be sent to travel and work alone in countries like India and Africa? Christ's plan of sending workers by twos was not accidental, this place and these times seem to me to be like those, and to demand the same wise provision. Important towns in India are far apart, often entirely away from railroads, and to reach these one must sometimes travel for days where there are no English people.

Your missionary would not be a guest, like Mrs. Leavitt, but soon, all romance and demonstration over, she would be left to work out her own plans, with what courage and confidence she could muster. She must spend a large part of her time traveling alone. Others here will believe with me that this is neither wise nor safe. A few facts to illustrate:

During my first cold season in India, I was traveling, ill, by palky, with a friend. It had been arranged that men should be in waiting at the end of each ten-mile dâk to change. At the end of one dâk our palkies were set down (purposely) far apart, and my men asked for their pay. I was just about to pay them, when my friend shouted, "No, no." There were no men there to take us on, and these men would have taken their pay and left me there ill, in the heat of the day in the midst of rice fields, with no food or proper shelter, and no village within three miles.

Once a messenger came in rapidly from a Santhal village, saying that our teacher there was too ill to feed himself, and was begging for water. They would be glad to help him, they liked him, but they would lose their caste if they fed him or gave him water. Would we not send a Christian quickly or he must die.

Greater than the need of companionship for protection is the need of companionship for counsel and soul communion. There are some temperance people here and some talented Christian workers who will welcome your missionaries and try to help them.

The scattered English and Eurasian population of India need the work of your missionaries here, but for the millions of natives in India, the most effective work can be done in England. Oh, the heart pain and discouragement that comes because we cannot forget that many Christian men in England and America who send missionaries here, and pay preachers there that the souls of fellow-men may be saved, are themselves in cold blood voting for men and measures that must ruin the bodies and the souls of some of those persons for whom their ministers and missionaries are working.

Six missionaries will be sent to foreign lands by the W. C. T. U. Are not six needed to accompany these? Will not some of these send themselves? Will not parents or personal friends send others? Is there not some one or more with wealth who will endow a "companion missionaryship"? God will open the way. The noontide hour of prayer will be the time to ask Him. And may every heart be waiting, ready if need be to reply, "Here am I, send me."

OUR SECOND ROUND-THE-WORLD MISSIONARY IN TASMANIA.

One of my journeys was to a new silver field, where several thousand men, without any home influences, are at work. I had been told the passage was a very rough one at all times, and often storms raged with such fury that the danger was very great. But I remembered I was under the care of One whose will, "even the winds and the waves obey." So I went on fearing nothing, but I never took such a voyage in any part of the earth, not even in the China Sea. The steamer was little, if any, larger than a "canal boat," and a terrible storm came down upon us. The old ship rocked from side to side, everything movable, including myself, was pitched and tossed about. The storm increased in furry; every timber seemed to groan and the wind whistled through the rigging. The captain was lashed to the bridge; the waves washed the ship again and again and the water came into our cabin till not a dry garment of any kind could be found. The storm never abated till we reached the heads of the next harbor, then the heavens opened and the rain just poured down. We reached Strahan many hours late, at three o'clock p.m., and my first meeting was to be at eight the same evening.

A kind lady met me, but as there were no cabs or conveyances of any kind I had to walk about a mile through the rain and mud to the house; perfectly worn out, I threw myself on to the bed to try to think of my evening meeting, and after a few hour's rest started out to the hall. I had to walk a mile in another direction. A young lad was sent to show me my way, but through the darkness he got off the path and went into mud over shoetops, so before I reached the hall my grief seemed to have no end. We had the meeting, however, and there was a large gathering, but to this day I have no idea what I said. The Lord just took charge of the whole affair, so, of course, it went off all right.

The next evening I was to continue my journey to the mines, little knowing what was before me. A committee in Hobart had written to the ministers but they "did not believe in these talking women," so they had not made the first arrangement. I reached this rough, wild mining-camp alone, after dark—no one to meet me, and no place to go, and still worse, no place to speak. I found a place to lodge for the night, and in the morning went out to look up a place to speak in. The owner of the hall charged thirty dollars a night for an old tin building, that I feared every moment would fall down upon me. I told him I did not care to purchase the premises, I only wanted to rent it; but "that was the price," so the trustees of one of the churches gave me the use of it. No one came to help me, so I had bills printed and that afternoon took them to every saloon in the place (some thirty in number) and invited the men to the meetings. This created a perfect sensation, the whole town was talking of it before night. There are scarcely a score of women in the place, and so unusual a thing set every one talking.

I tried to get a band or something to make a noise with; all I could find was a young man who could play a flute, so with this young man I went out about seven o'clock to hold an open air meeting. He played the flute and I tried to sing. The appearance of a lady in the street, with no other woman to be seen, brought hundreds of men out. We marched to the church and had to close the doors for the great press of the people. I never had such a meeting anywhere. It seemed the very heavens opened and showers of blessings descended upon us. Strong men wept like children; hearts were reached and resolutions made that will tell in eternity. The very presence of the Lord was felt by all, and with His own voice of love He spoke to many. The first one to sign the pledge was the man who owned the hall; he then placed his hall at my disposal, free of charge, for as long a time as I could remain. Twenty-seven signed that night and I went back to my lodgings so tired and worn out with the heavy work of the day and the awful sense of being alone, humanly speaking, that I cried myself to sleep.

Each night we went out with the flute and held open air meetings. The interest deepened, attendance increased and above a hundred signed during the mission. Most of the women joined the union, that these might be looked after. I left the place very early in the morning and it was then and there that I received the great ovation of my life. Six of the worst old drunkards of the place, who had signed the pledge, came to tell me they were still keeping it and to thank me for coming to the place; one poor old fellow brought me his photograph, and said, "I started for heaven the other night and I want you to keep this picture. I want you to know me there." My heart was very much touched and I was so thankful that the Lord had ever led me to that place and having led me there, "He neither left or forsook me."

Just beyond this place is another mine, and the difficulties of getting there were even greater than anything yet experienced. The railroad track was laid out, but had not been opened, and only flat cars were running. The only place to sit was "on the floor, and let your feet hang over," but I took an old candle box with me and tried to make myself as comfortable as circumstances would allow. We soon started off, and I found as the train went sweeping around the curves at the base of the mountains my seat began to sway from side to side, and it was only with difficulty I was able to keep my candle box down. Added to this, they fired the engine with light pine wood; the sparks fell in showers, a strong head wind blew smoke and sparks into our faces, almost blinding us, and it was all I could do to keep myself extinguished.

Missions were held on the way back to Melbourne, seven unions being formed during the month, forty-two meetings held and much traveling done.

Reaching Melbourne I found that Mrs. E. W. Andrew and Dr. Kate Bushnell had arrived, and I spent a portion of the day at the headquarters planning for the work. They came upon us very unexpectedly, and quite unknown to the general public, but every one was very glad to see them, and a very warm welcome was accorded them. I was delighted to look into their dear faces. It did my heart good. They are the first of our workers I have seen since I left home. In fact, I believe I have only seen one person beside them whom I ever saw before, so the sight of their faces was a welcome one. We sent letters in every direction, to as many papers as we could, telling of their arrival; they are now working toward South Australia where I shall hope to overtake them on my way to that very distant colony of West Australia. I am sure they will do a grand work here. This country is almost as large as the United States, and travel is slow, so it takes great time to go over it. Every one seems to wish they would remain a year or two.

This is the way I am trying to pioneer the work in some of these far-off lands, and this is a description of traveling and working on the west coast of Tasmania. I have given a detailed account of this mission that you may know we do not come to these lands to be "carried to the skies on flowery beds of ease," but the mission is heavy up-hill work most of the way, and you can all see how much we need the prayers of every white-ribbon woman. My dear sisters, "pray without ceasing," that the way may always be opened for us, and we may lay hold with stronger faith of the eternal promises.

THE TEMPLE

Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, 149 Ashland Boulevard, Chicago, President Building Association.

Call for the Nineteenth Annual Meeting.

Of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, which will be held in the Methodist Episcopal church, of the city of Denver, Colorado, October 28 to November 2, inclusive. The executive, superintendents, and plan-of-work committees will convene as usual before and after the convention, the opening meetings being at ten o'clock a. m. October 26.

Lady Henry Somerset, whose presence at the annual meeting of 1891, brought inspiration to all, has, in the interest of the coming convention, and in loving sympathy with Miss Willard in her affliction, provided for our president complete change and rest from labor, through a trip across the water to her own home in England. There, with the Spirit's comfort, and the comradeship of Lady Henry, Mrs. Hannah Whitall Smith, and her faithful secretary, Miss Anna Gordon, we believe body and soul will be refreshed, and she will return to us in time for the convention (which is her full expectation) with new and uplifting power.

The experience of former years will be utilized in making this the best planned and most systematic convention ever held, while new and better methods of seating the delegates will do away with former difficulties. There will be a DAILY UNION SIGNAL as usual.

We shall find the well known and large-hearted western hospitality fully illustrated, and months of faithful labor and sacrifice for the success of the convention, will, we know, be crowned by numberless heart-offerings through the days of its session.

The autumns, it is said, are lovely in Colorado, and it is expected that excursions will be arranged to various points near the city and perhaps to places further away. There will be in attendance many persons of note, whom we shall delight to honor, and none will be more welcome than William T. Stead, of London, foremost among reformers.

Miss Mary G. Hay, our superintendent of railroad rates, will ere long give, through THE UNION SIGNAL, every particular concerning rates of travel, which she hopes will be the best we have known.

From all accounts, as indicated by usual sources of information, this has been the most successful of our eighteen years of existence.

The momentum of the movement for women's associational activity grows daily greater, which means the steady advance of the cause of temperance as against the saloon, of homes, as against machine politics, of the many against the few, all of which is but a roundabout way of saying, that the coming of the Kingdom, which is of righteousness, peace and perfect liberty, is nearer now than when we first believed. In strengthened faith, therefore, let us observe the memorial days before us.

SEPTEMBER 22,

it will be remembered, is the anniversary of the birth of Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt, our first "round the-world missionary," and honorary president of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union, in the interest of which meetings will be held.

SEPTEMBER 28

is the anniversary of the birth of the beloved President of the World's and National W. C. T. U., and is observed "in memoriam" of the Crusade, and again to extend our vision and our heart to the wide world to which "the Lord hath brought us out from thence."

OCTOBER 22 AND 23

will be our

DAYS OF PRAYER.

Let each union observe Saturday by the gathering of the membership and earnest pleading with God for His blessing upon the coming convention; not alone that we may do all things in His wisdom, but that each member of the vast organization may be so imbued with His spirit that we may realize a one-ness (in one another and in Him) before unknown; that during all the days of the meeting we may truly be "in one place of one accord," and in answer to our united prayer, "God will work in us both to will and to do of His good pleasure." On the Sabbath, let public meetings be held in the interest of temperance, the tenor of all prayer being the opening of the eyes of the people to the iniquity of the liquor traffic, of their ears to its record and of their understanding to God's way for its overthrow, and especially for an out-pouring of the Holy Ghost upon all the people, that men and women will be ready to do "whatsoever He saith unto them," remembering He hath said, "Ye shall not be bound in the bundle with the destroyer."

A PLEDGE IN RHYME.

This little band do with our hand
A pledge now sign to drink no wine;
Nor brandy red to turn our head;
Nor whisky hot that makes the sot;
Nor fiery rum to turn our home
Into a hell where none can dwell.
Whence peace would fly, and love would die,
And hope expire, 'mid such a fire;
Hard cider, too, will never do;
Nor brewers' beer our hearts to cheer;
Tobacco, too, we do abjure;
To quench our thirst we will always bring
Cold water from the well or spring.
Now here we pledge perpetual hate
To all that can intoxicate,
And here we stand, a brave, bold band,
With heart and hand to save our land.

AROUND THE WORLD.

To Aunt Jane's Dear Nieces and Nephews:—While our mothers and fathers, grown up sisters and brothers, are talking about this World's issue of The Union Signal, supposing we have a talk all our own. You have been busy cracking "soft-shelled nuts" and have had merry times over your own special column. Let us run away from the Cozy Corner awhile, and take a trip afar off.

Before we start, there are two verses in the Bible that will help us on our way. In my book they are marked with red ink so I can see them very quickly when I turn to the page. The first verse—or part of a verse—is, "And hath made of one blood all nations of men." St. Paul wrote that, and it was God about whom he was talking. Do you know what the sentence means? Just this: That you and I, the little Indian boys and girls, the Chinese children, the Jews, the black lads and lassies, the Swedes, Italians, Germans, Russians, are all brothers and sisters, "of one blood," and God is our "Father in heaven."

If you had a dear brother who was lost and could not find his way home, or who was very sick and hungry in a strange land, how badly you would want to go to help him or send someone to him! That is just the way Jesus felt when He said to His disciples: "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." Ever since He said that, men and women have been going into the far away countries, and showing their brothers and sisters the way home to Jesus, and feeding them with the gospel, for it is called the "bread of life."

The people who do this work are missionaries. It is about some white ribbon missionaries of whom we will talk a little while,—some of them you may have seen.

Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt, who has worn our dear white ribbon so long, that her name is known and loved everywhere, started out about eight years ago for a journey around the world, to preach the gospel as she went, giving her especial attention to showing people what harm King Alcohol was doing, and teaching them that "no drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God."

Perhaps you think such a trip would be "lots of fun." Maybe it would if taken with father and mother, just for a good time. But Mrs. Leavitt was very often nearly all alone in those strange countries, among people who did not talk our language, hated our God, and lived very differently from the comfortable way we do. She found so many sick and hungry people, so many people who were lost. They were sick of doing wrong, they were hungry to know about Christ, they did not know how to find Him. In one of her letters she said, "I know I shall meet Zulus, Hindus, Americans and English in heaven who accepted Jesus when I held Him up to them." Think of that! I wonder if you and I will meet anyone up There who will be glad to see us because we helped to show them the way?

Mrs. Leavitt tells us that she founded and set to work eighty-five W. C. T. U's. If we just suppose there were ten persons in each union, that would make eight hundred and fifty, nearly a thousand people wearing the white ribbon, and that means every one of them trying to drive beer and wine and whisky out and introduce Jesus Christ instead. Was not that worth going for?

Just one thing more about this dear woman. You all have your "temperance lessons" in school, do you not? Perhaps it was in these lessons you first learned why King Alcohol is such an enemy. In the schools in foreign countries the teachers do not always dare to teach these things, and sometimes—very often, indeed—they do not want to, because they drink themselves. Mrs. Leavitt tells us that by having just one earnest talk with the rulers in one place she "secured temperance instruction to the children of a whole nation." It seems to me if she had done nothing else in all her travels, this would have been great reason for gladness.

Mrs. Leavitt has finished this wonderful journey and is home again, telling her true story to thousands of people and encouraging others to "go and preach the gospel to every creature."

Next after Mrs. Leavitt comes Miss Jessie Ackerman, of California, who follows in Mrs. Leavitt's steps and carries on the work. Haven't you read some of her letters in The Union Signal? They are more interesting than the "Arabian Nights" or "Robinson Crusoe," because they are every word true. One time, while Miss Ackerman was in Shanghai—get your geographies and hunt that up, will you not?—there was a great gathering of missionaries from all over China, nearly five hundred men and women. It had always been the law that no woman should talk at this conference. But Miss Ackerman had a story to tell of the white ribon and what it means. They all wanted to hear her. I think Jesus must have been talking to their hearts, for, do you know, they held a committee meeting and voted to break their custom this once and let Miss Ackerman talk to them in their assembly? And how she must have talked, for afterwards a National Union was organized for China and a committee appointed "to devise means for the suppression of opium and intoxicants among the natives."

Letters often come to The Union Signal from over the seas telling of Miss Ackerman's brave fights against King Alcohol, and of her loving work for men and women and little children. Let us remember her in our prayers sometimes, for she needs all the help she can get in this great undertaking. She is livfng now in Melbourne, Australia, and is president of the Australian W. C. T. U.

I wonder how many of you know Dr. Kate C. Bushnell and Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew? They both lived in Evanston, where our dearly loved Rest Cottage is. Dr. Bushnell studied to be a doctor, and many years ago went to China as a medical missionary, that is she went "about doing good," like Jesus did—only he did not need medicines. She took care of sick bodies and then told the sick souls how to be cured by the Great Physician.

She came back to America, and then in 1890, she and Mrs. Andrew, who used to be one of the editors of The Union Signal, and is one of the dearest little women you ever saw, went together to carry the same dear message around the world. Their special mission is purity, i. e., teaching the people that these beautiful bodies of ours were built by God for temples in which His Holy Spirit was to live. But if we do wrong by our bodies, through drinking or smoking, or in any way, He cannot live there, and we cannot go to be with Him by and by. These two dear friends are in Australia now. I had the honor of talking with Dr. Bushnell's mother a few weeks ago, and when she talked about the daughter so far away, I thought how glad she must be to have her there.

At the National Convention, one year ago, the white-ribboners decided that they would send out, as soon as possible, six missionaries who will go away and live in some country where they will work for God and temperance. The first one chosen to go was Miss Alice R. Palmer, of Indiana. She has left home and friends and gone, wearing her white ribbon, to South Africa. If you will look in The Union Signal of June 30, you will see her picture and can read what Miss Willard has said of her.

And now a word of one you all know, Miss Mary Allen West, or "Captain Mary." She has been in California for some months, resting and working, and now has sailed for Japan and the Sandwich Islands. She is going as a "captain," to drill the temperance armies she will find there that they may fight the better, winning new recruits as she goes along.

God bless them all. Aren't you proud of them? And don't you want to go, too, some day? May be you will—who knows!

Another "Auntie."

DOING THE BEST SHE COULD.

Following is a little story told by Joe Haworth, says the Minneapolis Journal: A little girl, not more than four years old, the only child of some friends whom Haworth used to visit frequently, was always puzzling her little brain about thunderstorms, what they were and what made those loud noises. One day she asked her mamma about it, and her mamma answered, "Why, darling, that loud noise is the voice of God." A few days later the little one was playing on the lawn with her dolls, when a dark mass of clouds rolled up from the west and the muttering of thunder became more frequent and more pronounced. Her mother called to her to come in, and the little one collected her family of dolls in her chubby little arms and started to toddle toward the house. Just as she reached the piazza steps there was a terrific clap of thunder, and she, hastening to get to her mamma, looked up in the sky, and said in a hurt tone, "Oh, Dod, 'oo needn't holler so loud; I'se hurwyin' dest as fast as I tan."

Dear Boys and Girls:—A real little girl in the Buckeye state has written the following good essay:

ALCOHOL.

Alcohol is a very bad poison, and does no good to those who drink it, but makes them intoxicated, and injures their livers. It hardens the liver and the food cannot digest.

Beer, cider, and many other fermented drinks contain alcohol.

Alcohol is made of corn, rye or potatoes. They make rye whisky out of rye, and corn whisky out of corn.

Those people that are under the influence of liquor have a red face, red nose, and a very ugly disposition.

If we commence to drink when we are little, it leads to worse when we are big. Alcohol is a very strong drink, and burns very much.

An intoxicated man's breath smells very strong and disagreeable.

Alcohol is not a natural drink, and it does not please God to have us drink it. Only milk and water are natural drinks.

Every one should shun the terrible alcohol. It causes much insanity and delirium, and makes many a home unhappy. Marguerite VaLois.

And this is all very true, is it not?

A thought occurs to me—would it not be a good idea to have a circle of essay writers in our Cozy Corner? You are all agreed? Then send in your essays on some temperance topic (tobacco, or cider, for instance) and we will all gladly read them and receive the benefit from them.

Ever Yours,

Aunt Jane

COZY CORNER LETTERS.

You asked us to write you a letter, telling about the pleasant times we have had this summer. I have been sick all summer, and did not get to play in the warm sunshine or see the pretty flowers, only as some kind friend brought them to my sick room. I went to the country to stay awhile, and was taken sick while there. I have looked for The Union Signal every week. Mamma read all the stories and the Cozy Corner to me, and it helped to make the time seem less long. I am so sorry that they are going to sell whisky at the World's Fair.

Maryville, Tenn. Carl L. Hackney.

I am so sorry to hear that you were sick, Carl, and hope that you are quite well now. We all send love to you.

I am a little girl eight years old. I like to read the Cozy Corner letters. Grandma takes the The Union Signal; she and I belong to the W. C. T. U. We have no Loyal Temperance Legion here.

New London, Iowa. Edna A. Lyman.

I am glad that you have joined the W. C. T. U., little one. Won't the dear grandma join our Cozy Corner, too?

THE NATIONAL CONVENTION

Is to be held in Denver, Col., October, 28 to November 3. As has been our custom for years, a DAILY UNION SIGNAL will be published there during that time. The daily has become a necessity to many of our readers, and will be of great value this year. Miss Willard is now in England and before her departure expressed her determination to bring with her to the National Convention both Lady Henry Somerset and William Stead. In any event the Convention will be of engrossing interest. When announcing the daily last year, our readers were urged to order early. When this is done it is easy to see that the paper is promptly sent; when orders come in during the Convention, it is very difficult. All causes for complaint last year were due to delay in orders. Only 4,000 orders were received before starting to Boston, and 6,000 after we reached that city. An error in count on the part of the mailer caused much perplexity, which could not have occurred if there had been less hurry. A special trip will be made to Denver this month to provide against any mistake. We will do our part. Please do yours by ordering early.

We will guarantee the prompt delivery of your daily if you will send your order on or before October 15.

To every subscriber to the DAILY UNION SIGNAL who sends orders for the same before the date named—October 15—we will send the World,s Fair Number of The Advance Guard. Price of DAILY UNION SIGNAL for five days named, 25c.

A REMARKABLE OFFER.

It requires no extravagant language to emphasize the offer which we make to-day to our readers in connection with the greatest educational enterprise of the age.

This offer stands without parallel and is an opportunity never before presented anywhere. As announced on another page, 10 cents a day for a very short period will enable our readers to acquire a complete set of that greatest of all Reference Libraries, the Revised Encyclopedia Britannica. This work is beyond question one of the grandest monuments of scholarly research and patient endeavor in the whole realm of literature.

The first edition of this comprehensive work was published more than a century ago, and the last or ninth edition was issued about fifteen years ago. In this revised edition, the Britannica has been condensed, revised and added to with the intention of adapting it especially to the needs of American readers, and at the same time bringing it within reach of the purses of many who could not possibly obtain the original work.

In the process of condensation, superfluous matter has been taken out in order to make room for a large amount of matter not to be found in the first edition, dealing with most important American affairs. This Encyclopedia which we have the pleasure of offering to our readers is the Revised Britannica, complete in 20 octavo volumes of over,7,000 pages; 14,000 columns and 8,000,000 words, printed on a fine quality of paper, from new type, and is strongly bound in heavy manilla paper covers, which with proper care will last a life-time.

The most wonderful fact in connection with our offer is that we send the entire 20 volumes with all charges prepaid, on receipt of only one dollar, and allow you to pay the other $9 at the rate of 10 cents a day for 90 days, payable monthly, thus placing it within easy reach of everyone.

To encourage your children in habits of economy, and for that noblest of all purposes—economy for the sake of an education, we send with each set a dime savings bank wherein a dime can be deposited each day. This is certainly a golden opportunity and one which our readers should take advantage of at once, as the offer will continue for a limited period only.

THAT SHOPPING BAG.

We have a limited number of shopping bags in stock. These are rush bags—substantial and plain. They are excellent for many purposes. They can be used to carry papers; good for picnics; lined and decorated make attractive catch-alls; or will be serviceable as wall pockets for literature. We will dispose of these bags on the following terms: For one bag, 25 cts; per dozen $2.40; THE UNION SIGNAL and one bag for $1.15.

13th. It is safe, simple, cleanly, and effective for beautifying purposes, and never injures the most delicate skin.

14th. While it is intended that the Mask should be Worn During Sleep, it may be applied, with equally good results, at Any Time, to suit the convenience of the wearer.

15th. The Mask has received the testimony of well-known society and professional ladies, who proclaim it to be the greatest discovery for beautifying purposes ever offered to womankind.

A FEW SPECIMEN EXTRACTS FROM TESTIMONIAL LETTERS:

"I am so rejoiced at having found at last an article that will indeed improve the complexion."

"Every lady who desires a faultless complexion should be provided with the Mask."

"My face is as soft and smooth as an infant's."

'I am perfectly delighted with it."

"As a medium for removing discolorations, softening and beautifying the skin, I consider it unequalled."

"It is, indeed, a perfect success—an inestimable treasure."

"I find that it removes freckles, tan, sunburn, and gives the complexion a soft, smooth surface."

"I have worn the Mask but two weeks, and am amazed at the change it has made in my appearance."

"The Mask certainly acts upon the skin with a mild and beneficial result, making it smoother and clearer, and seeming to remove pimples, irritations, etc., with each application."

"For softening and beautifying the skin there is nothing to compare with it."

"Your invention cannot fail to supersede everything that is used for beautifying purposes."

"Those of my sex who desire to secure a pure complexion should have one."

"For bleaching the skin and removing imperfections I know of nothing so good."

"I have worn the Mask but three nights, and the blackheads have all disappeared."

"The Mask should be kept in every lady's toilet case."

"I must tell you how delighted I am with your Toilet Mask; it gives unbounded satisfaction."

"A lady was cured of freckles by eight nights' use of the Mask."

"The improvement in my complexion is truly marvelous."

"After three weeks' use of the Mask the wrinkles have almost disappeared."

"My sister used one for a spotted skin, and her complexion is all that can be desired."

"It does even more than is claimed for it."

"I have been relieved of a muddy, greasy complexion, after trying all kinds of cosmetics without success."

COMPLEXION BLEMISHES

may be hidden imperfectly by cosmetics and powders, but can only be removed permanently by the Toilet Mask. By its use every kind of spots, impurities, roughness, etc., vanish from the skin, leaving it soft, clear, brilliant and beautiful. It is harmless, costs little and saves its user money. It prevents and REMOVES and is both a complexion preserver and beautifier. Famous society ladies, actresses, belles, etc., use it. VALUABLE ILLUSTRATED PAMPHLET, with proofs and full particulars, mailed free by

For our books, which are unexcelled. We have the following list:

THE JUNIOR PARTNERS, by Abel M. Rawson, a new book of wonderful interest and power. Rev. Dr. Thompson writes concerning it: "I am enthused and uplifted." All who read commend it. It is a fascinating story, showing the temptations which come to business men. It also shows the relation of insanity to the drink traffic.

A YOUNG WOMAN JOURNALIST, edited by Frances E. Willard and Lady Henry Somerset, which is rapidly growing in favor. The success of one young life is portrayed in a manner that will stimulate others to like effort.

THE STORY OF A CLASSIC TOWN, by Frances E. Willard. A book for all interested in ascertaining how towns founded on temperance principles become safe places for the homes of intelligent, progressive people.

GLIMPSES OF FIFTY YEARS, the autobiography of Frances E. Willard. It is enough to say that 50,000 copies of this book have already been sold to indicate its popularity.

CHILDHOOD, ITS CARE AND CULTURE, by Mary Allen West. This is a help every mother and every teacher should own. Highly spoken of by all.

THE ADVANCE GUARD

for September is now ready. You, we are sure, will want it. Words of warmest commendation come from all quarters regarding it. The Cheeryvale Law Club continues its discussions. Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson contributes a poem of usual merit; answers to Bible Search Questions for August are given; Effie Jay Bee answers the question, "What's the Matter with Alcohol?" Faye Huntington's story is continued; John G. Woolley contributes an article on "Christian Patriotism," and Alice M. Guernsey describes "The City Wonderful." In "The Way of the World," we are told what the brewers say. We quote from the introductory page: "In this number of the Advance Guard we open a new department with the expressive name, 'Ladies and Gentlemen!' Under it we shall give material for recitations and declamations, dialogues, and other helps for public meetings."

As stated before, you need it. Price, single copy, 5 cents per year, 50 cents.

CHAUTAUQUA LAKE

can be reached in the most comfortable manner over the Erie Lines. This is the only route from the West which does not require a change of cars from Chicago. If you are thinking of visiting Chautauqua, write to F. W. Buskirk, A. G. P. A., Erie Lines, Chicago, Ill., for full information as to route, rates, etc.

THE MOUNTAINS OF COLORADO.

Denver, Manitou, Estes Park, and the numerous resorts of Colorado are directly reached by the Burlington Route. Its fast Vestibuled Express Train leaving Chicago at 1 p. m. daily reaches Denver the next afternoon at 6:15 p.m., only one night on the road. Another fast Vestibuled Train leaves at 10:30 p. m. daily, arriving in Denver at 7 a.m. the second morning, only one day on the road. Both trains are equipped luxuriously with Pullman Sleeping Cars, Reclining Chair Cars (seats free), and Burlington Route Dining Cars.

Call at city ticket office, 211 Clark St., for tickets and further information.

LOW RATE HARVEST EXCURSIONS.

The announcement that the North-Western Line, comprising over 8,000 miles of thoroughly equipped railway, has arranged to run two low rate Harvest Excursions during the months of August and September, will be gladly received by those who are interested in the development of the great West and Northwest, as well as by those who desire to visit this wonderfully productive region at a season of the year when exact demonstration can be made of the merits and advantages it offers to home-seekers and those in search of safe and profitable investments.

These excursions will leave Chicago on August 30th and September 27th, and tickets can be purchased at the very low rate of one fare for the round trip to points in Iowa, Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, Idaho and Montana. They will be strictly first-class in every particular and will be good for return passage at any time within twenty days from date of purchase. Full information concerning rates and arrangements for these excursions can be obtained upon application to any coupon ticket agent, or to W. A. Thrall, G. P. T. A., Chicago & North-Western R'y, Chicago.

CALIFORNIA.

California is the most attractive and delightful section of the United States, if not of the world, and its many beautiful resorts will be crowded with the best families of the East during the entire winter. It offers to the investor the best open opportunity for safe and large returns from its fruit lands. It offers the kindest climate in the world to the feeble and debilitated, and it is reached in the most comfortable manner over the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad.

Pullman Vestibule Sleeping Cars leave Chicago by this line every day in the year, and go without change or transfer through to San Francisco, Los Angeles and San Diego. This is a feature not offered by any other line.

Write to John J. Byrne, 723 Monadnock Building, Chicago, Ill., if you desire any further information as to the country and the accommodations for reaching it.

THREE HARVEST EXCURSIONS.

Half Rates via the Illinois Central.

Aug. 30th, Sept. 27th and Oct. 25, 1892.

The Central Route will sell Excursion tickets to the Agricultural Regions of the West, Southwest and South, at one fare for the Round Trip, from stations on its lines north of Cairo, on August 30th, and September 27th. A third excursion will be run to the South and Southwest on October 25th. Your Local Ticket Agent will give you full particulars in regard to these Harvest Excursions; arrangements can also be made in this connection to visit the desirable Railroad Lands for sale by the Illinois Central in Southern Illinois on obtaining special permission to do so by addressing the Company's Land Commissioner at Chicago, Mr. E. P. Skene. In addition, a few weeks before the first Excursion date, your Local Ticket Agent will be able to furnish you with a special Folder, issued by the Illinois Central, which will give you particulars of these Harvest Excursions in such form as will enable you to plan your journey at home. Should you not be within call of a railroad ticket agent, address A. H. Hanson, G. P. A., Illinois Central R. R., Chicago, Ill.

WHY YOU ..... WANT THE AUTOMATIC FOUNTAIN.

Which is now placed within your reach:

BECAUSE—People will get thirsty, and a cool drink is a necessity.

BECAUSE—With these fountains you can furnish a cool and tasty drink cheaper than ever was known.

BECAUSE—When the thirsty crowd cannot secure a cool, healthful drink, the drift is at once toward the saloon, with all its baneful influence.

BECAUSE—The fountain is offered to you on terms which will not fail to be advantageous to you.

BECAUSE—An opportunity is here given to enable you to make money for your work.

THEREFORE—Every W. C. T. U. should secure one or more of these fountains. Address the WOMAN'S TEMPERANCE PUBLISHING ASSOCIATION, The Temple, Chicago, Ill.

"The World's Best"

WOMAN'S COLUMBIAN LAUNDRY CO.

Incorporated under the Laws of the State of Illinois.
A WOMAN'S COMPANY, OWNED, OPERATED AND MANAGED BY WOMEN.
Capital, - - $300,000.

A GREAT INDUSTRIAL ENTERPRISE.

SHARES ARE TEN ($10.00) DOLLARS EACH, AND ARE

Sold Only to Women.

We propose to enlarge our business, and give women of large or small means an opportunity to become identified in an industrial and exceedingly profitable business enterprise, and establish 100 or more Branch Laundries; for that purpose we have decided to offer 10,000 shares of our Capital Stock to be Sold Only to Women. Present price, $10 per share, par value, payable, if desired, in monthly installments of $2.50 per share. Price of stock will be advanced to $12.50 per share as soon as the 10,000 shares now offered are sold.

A SAFE AND PROFITABLE INVESTMENT.

With the complete operation of our laundries we will have a capacity for turning out 100,000 laundried shirts per week, and as the population of Chicago requires many times this number of shirts a week, and as the profit on each shirt is 5 cents, you can easily see that running our full capacity we would be able to make a profit of $5,000 a week, $20,000 a month, or $240,000 a year on shirts alone, to say nothing about revenues to be derived from our other work and departments, which will be large. Taking this, then, as a basis, and that money is worth 8 per cent, we would be enabled to pay a dividend of $8.00 on every share of stock. We do not believe it will be less and it may be more.

AN IMPORTANT FEATURE.—Our improved method of doing laundry work gives better satisfaction than any other process, as NO CHEMICALS ARE USED, therefore the fiber of the linen is not worn or eaten away. Our business has been established four years; the Company owns it absolutely; it is in daily operation, and, better still, is paying over fifty per cent on the amount invested.

HOW MANY SHARES DO YOU WISH?

SEND FOR YOURS BEFORE You Lay Down This PAPER.

They are only $10 each. Better secure as many as you can, as we have now less than 10,000 shares to offer at this price, and they will be taken very fast. Orders for stock will be filled as received, and all subscriptions received in excess of above amount will be returned to subscribers.

No better investment can be found than our capital stock. Invest now while the Company is new, and reap the benefits paid in dividends perhaps for the balance of your life.

Write to-day and send a small deposit to show us you are in earnest, state how many shares you wish, and we will reserve them for you any reasonable length of time. Full information sent free on application.

The Interior, one of the leading religious papers of Chicago, says: "The energy displayed by the officers of the Woman's Columbian Laundry Co. in pushing their undertaking to success, and broadening the foundations of their business, is truly remarkable. They have just closed a number of large contracts for Hotel, Apartment Building and Railroad Laundry work that will be exceedingly profitable to the fortunate stockholders."

"The work of the Woman's Columbian Laundry Co. is important, and should receive the support of every housewife in the country."—MARION HARLAND.

Signal Notes.

In proportion to her population, it is said that Sweden ranks first in the number of women graduates in medicine.

An association of teachers in Sweden and Finland has been formed to introduce temperance instruction in the public schools.

"Gospel frozen and fed out of a spoon" is the description of a sermon which would also apply to many temperance sermons.

From the report of the chief of police, there is a beer or wine shop in Berlin for every one hundred and eighty-five citizens, including women and children.

Some prominent writer has proved that the ancient Egyptians and Greeks practised vivisection on living beings, using slaves and prisoners of war for the purpose.

The Miner's International Federation of Europe, representing nine hundred thousand men and five nationalities, was created by a woman only three years ago.

Two young men have established a mission at Cape Prince of Wales, Alaska. They give heart-rending accounts of the havoc wrought by liquor among the natives.

Sam Jones believes that the devil does not care how many missionaries we send to the heathen as long as we average thirteen thousand barrels of whisky to each missionary.

Earnest workers in the juvenile temperance work are to be found in almost all the countries of northern Europe, while in Gibraltar and Malta there are successful L. T. L's.

A friend Hindu said once that of all the missionary methods used his people feared none as much as the women missionaries and doctors, who were winning their hearts and their homes.

A recent French election indicated the sentiment of the people in regard to Republicanism, for out of one thousand four hundred and twenty-six councilors chosen, one thousand and sixty-two were Republicans.

A Christian sisterhood in Greece, with the Queen as an active member, devote themselves to visiting prisoners during their incarceration, holding public religious service first and then interviewing each prisoner alone.

The National Temperance Café and Concert Association in London, proposes to establish places of amusement from which all liquor shall be excluded, in the thickly populated part of London as soon as permits are issued.

Out of fifty-seven children in ten families of drinkers, but ten showed a normal constitution, while out of sixty one children of non-drinkers, there were but eleven who were not normally developed. Such figures speak for themselves.

The fact that drunkenness is increasing among the women of Stockholm leads to the inquiry whether the Gothenburg system which has helped to make the public house respectable, is not responsible for the development of the drink evil among the better half of the community.

A league in the interests of women has been organized in Belgium which will establish a publishing association and an agency for working women. They will work for the equality of wages, for higher education and with all other agencies in the war against immorality and intemperance.

Mildura, a town of New South Wales, was founded by the Chaffey Bros. in 1888. By means of irrigation it has been transformed from a desert to a beautiful garden. By the terms of the Mildura Irrigation Act no liquor is allowed to be sold in the settlement and in consequence everyone appears happy and prosperous.

Richard Vaux, for half a century prison-inspector for Pennsylvania, ascribes idleness and the want of knowledge of a trade as the principal causes of crime. Of the ten hundred and fifty-five inmates of one prison, but three had learned a trade. The labor unions composed largely of foreigners are responsible for this condition. They saw that with a supply of skilled young Americans coming forward they could not dictate terms to employers, so they have made it practically impossible for one to enter a trade as apprentice. The trade schools unfortunately do not reach the great body of prospective laborers.

Sickness Among Children,

Especially infants, is prevalent at all times, but is largely avoided by giving proper nourishment and wholesome food. The most successful and reliable is the Gail Borden "Eagle" Brand Condensed Milk. Your grocer and druggist keep it.

The Squire strolled down to the forge one day,
(He wanted a vote, I'm bound to say,)
And blandly chatted of work and wages,
And themes that have baffled mankind for ages.
While the horny-handed son of toil,
Washed from his brawny arms the soil.
"I don't know much about tariff and tin,"
The stalwart voter said with a grin,
"But the man I vote for I demand,
Like that Ivory Soap you've got in your hand,
Shall be sound, clear, pure—the best in the land."

THE WOMAN'S LAND SYNDICATE

Have Moved to "The Temple."

THE SUCCESS OF THIS GREAT ENTERPRISE IS DUE LARGELY TO THE MANAGEMENT AND FORESIGHT OF MRS. R. A. EMMONS.

FACTS ABOUT HERSELF AND THE SYNDICATE.

[From the Chicago Evening Post Sept. 1.]

In the field of finance and investment women in business have not yet ventured very far nor very often. As a rule the great business schemes for legitimate speculation in which large fortunes are made have been wholly managed by men. But Chicago contains one exception in the Woman's Land Syndicate. The plan of the syndicate is the invention of Mrs. R. A. Emmons, who is also its business manager. The syndicate contracted for $500,000 worth of land in South Waukegan and sells to women only profit-sharing investment bonds representing the value of the property. The bonds are each $10 and can be paid for in installments to suit the purchaser, thus allowing women of small means to invest. It was thought that if the sale of bonds reached $50,000 by June 15, 1892, the scheme would be a success, but when that date arrived the sale of bonds had already reached nearly $100,000. The rise in value of the land meanwhile will give a good return on the investment, one-half of which will be divided pro rata among the holders of bonds and the other half go to the land syndicate, which does all the work, manages the sales, etc. The bonds have already reached a phenomenal sale, while the establishing of several factories in South Waukegan and the sale of lands for building sites, etc., immediately contiguous to that owned by the syndicate proves the sagacity of its manager and assures the success of the enterprise.

Mrs. Emmons is a small, slight woman of delicate physique, always attired in plain quaker gray. She was born of quaker parents in Bordentown, N. J. She was educated as a business woman, her parents holding the common belief of their sect that girls as well as boys should have a means of support. She desired to be a physician, but loss of property compelled her to give up her profession, to assume self-support at eighteen years of age. She followed teaching for a few years, then took up journalism, and was for a number of years on the staff of the New York American Reformer, which was afterward merged into the New York Voice. She came to Chicago three years ago to take the management of the Woman's Lecture Bureau. In this work she came into communication with 10,000 unions, and managed the routes of hundreds of lecturers. She is a woman of Christian integrity and staunch temperance principles. Every deed of the land sold by the syndicate contains a prohibition clause, and in all her dealings her influence is in favor of the cause for which she has always had the deepest love. As South Waukegan is to be the future home of thousands of workmen employed in the new factories going up there, the far-reaching effects of her influence for prohibition and temperance cannot be estimated, but both workmen and the capitalists who own the mills and factories there will have reason to be grateful for her work.

In an editorial in the Western Banker, July 15, we note the following:

"The Woman's Land Syndicate is deserving of support and confidence. Its project is legitimate, its prospects are very bright, and its management honest."

The third and last series of bonds are now being offered for sale at par, $10 per bond. Those having money to invest should secure bonds at once, as they are sure to be profitable. All mail should be addressed to the BICHLORIDE OF GOLD STOCK AS AN INVESTMENT.

It pays handsome quarterly dividends. Only a small number of shares remain unsold. Price to be advanced. Next quarterly dividend payable October 1st.

Six months ago the National Bichloride of Gold Institute was opened in Chicago, On the first of July, at the end of the first three months, was declared. The first of next month (October) another dividend will be declared, and quarterly dividends each three months thereafter. To what large dimensions they may grow we cannot predict. We know that our work is established on a permanent basis, and that it is developing grandly.

A QUARTERLY DIVIDEND OF THREE PER CENT.....

CHICAGO, September 14, 1892.

The work of the National Bichloride of Gold Company, as conducted by Dr. Mark M. Thompson, seems to me to surpass all other modern means of reclaiming the drunkard in its approach to the ideal method. On the one side it is eminently scientific and thoroughly professional, performing surely and swiftly that modern miracle of expelling a tyrannical appetite from the body and restoring tranquillity to the mind; on the other side, it has the loftiest purposes of good to the soul, aiming to bring a man to himself by restoring him to God, and this latter it does not offensively, but by humane and brotherly counsel, coupled with all the elevating influence of a beautiful Christian home with its attractive Sabbath worship and its atmosphere of good will and good cheer.

Of all places this is the one to be sought instantly by those in need of its manifold and heavenly blessings.

Read testimonial top of 19th page, this issue.

As will be seen by the above, the Christian Ministers and their people are with us. The leading temperance workers are with us. Every physician who has investigated our work is with us. Every thoughtful business man who has seen what we are doing is with us. A great army of men who have been liberated from the curse of rum through our treatment are with us. Every person who has the good of his fellow man at heart is with us.

With the Church, the Temperance Workers, Medical Science, Business men, our ever increasing army of "Graduates" to back us, with people on every side reaching out their hands to us for help; with our stock already paying a handsome dividend, while we as yet have not fairly entered upon our work, how can we predict what our stock may be worth in the near future?

We are selling it now at par, and not a dollar's worth has been sold at a lower price. Even if it did not yield a larger dividend than its present earning capacity, it would be well worth double the par value.

Remember that our company controls the right of Dr. Thompson's treatment for the entire world, and that while our profits up to the present time have come from the treatment of patients at the National Institute in Chicago, we are now devoting much time to extending our work and Branches are rapidly being established at other points as the following record will show:

Wisconsin sold and branch established at Dartford. Iowa sold and branch established at Oelwein. Others to be established in the state. South Dakota sold and branch established at Watertown. Michigan sold and branch just opened at St. Joseph; others to be established in the state. Boston just sold, and branch soon to be opened. Two prominent cities of New York State will soon each have a branch in full operation. Melbourne, Australia, just sold and branches to be established throughout the colonies. Parties now here from London, England, negotiating for Europe. An offer just received for Ontario, Canada, which will probably be accepted. This last from a prominent physician who has just been cured of morphine and whisky habits at our Chicago Institute. When he came he was taking daily over sixty grains of morphine and drinking daily one quart of whisky, besides using other poisonous drugs. A telegram just received from Duluth, Minn., leads us to believe that Minnesota has been taken, and that a branch will be established there. In addition to the above, negotiations are pending for many other states and cities.

What has this to do with the value of our stock? Simply this: For every patient treated at these branches throughout the world we receive a certain sum, and a large share of this goes to our stockholders, as the expense is but slight. For instance, if only 100 patients per month were treated at all of the branch institutes combined, our net income from this source alone would enable us to pay our stockholders two per cent per month, or

24 Per Cent. Per Annum.

The number stated (100 per month), is only a fraction of what we may reasonably expect. For with only fifty branches, averaging ten each per month, the net income from this source alone to be divided among stockholders would pay a dividend of 10 Per Cent Per Month.

And this is not counting the income from our Chicago Institute, the profits from which enabled us to pay 3 per cent the first quarter.

Now, a word of explanation about our Capital Stock and the stock we have for sale.

We are capitalized for $500,000, but at a meeting of our stockholders held June 28 last it was unanimously decided to retire $400,000 of our stock, only leaving $100,000 ACTIVE OR OPERATIVE. Of this amount less than one-third is owned by Dr. Thompson and the other officers of the company, so that THE ABSOLUTE CONTROL OF THE COMPANY'S AFFAIRS RESTS IN THE HANDS OF SMALL STOCKHOLDERS, AND WITHOUT THEIR CONSENT NOT ONE PENNY BEYOND THE $100,000 CAN EVER BE SOLD OR DRAW DIVIDENDS. The property now owned by the company, its Institute building in Chicago, and the lot it stands on, with furniture, etc., is valued at fully $33,000. The right for Dr. Thompson's (secret) treatment for the world is certainly worth $100,000, and as other investments of a substantial nature will be made, every stockholder is amply secured.

The Amount of Stock for Sale

Is very limited, and is being rapidly taken. If you want shares in this GRAND ENTERPRISE you must act promptly. Shares are $25 each, full paid and non assessable. Parties who cannot pay the full amount at once have the privilege of paying $5 per month on each share of stock subscribed for, but to participate in the payable October 1, 1892, stock must be fully paid for, or letter mailed to us containing payment before that time. If any stock remains unsold after that time, it is subject to advance in price without notice.

Send your order at once. If you cannot send full amount, send a small sum to secure as many as you wish.

MAGAZINES FOR THE MONTH.

The September ARENA will interest all members of the thoughtful families into which this vigorous and progressive review finds its way. James A. Herne furnishes a thoroughly readable paper entitled "Old Stock Days," this being the second series of papers on dramatic themes in the magazine. "The Future of Islam," by "Ibn Ishak," is a strong plea for Mohammedanism. The Bacon vs. Shakespeare case is continued by Edwin Reed. Dr. C. E. Page gives an exceedingly practical paper on the successful treatment of typhoid fever. Other noteworthy papers by Congressman John Davis, Axel Gustafson, Hamlin Garland, Prof. Willis Boughton, John Hudspeth, B. O. Flower, and an interesting symposium on Woman's Dress Reform, complete this magazine whose solid worth is most generally conceded.

The Arena Publishing Co., Boston, Mass.

The FORUM for this month takes its place in the front rank of the best magazines, by reason of its timely presentation of valuable articles. Prof. J. J. McCook discusses in plain terms, assisted by helpful statistical tables, "The Alarming Proportion of Venal Voters." "The Lesson of Homestead: A Remedy for Labor Troubles," is a thoughtful, thought-creating paper, striking at the roots of the recent agitation which has attracted the attention of the whole civilized world. Under "Methods and Morals of Campaign Committees," Herbert Welsh, Hon. M. D. Harter, Prof. R. H. Thurston and David A. Wells contribute worthy papers. "Notable Religious Tendencies," embraces an article by Prof. David Swing on "The Enlarged Church," in which he sets forth the advancement of the church in practical good works as distinguished from mere doctrinal activity. H. K. Carroll, special agent of the Census on Churches, has a contribution on the "Religious Progress of the Negro," that is full of encouragement. Yung Kiung Ken speaks, "having authority," as "A Chinaman on Our Treatment of China," and E. W. Howe has a keen paper on "Provincial Peculiarities of Western Life." Prof. Kendric C. Babcock on "Scandinavians in the Northwest"; Henry Rood on "The Mine Laborers in Pennsylvania," and Prof. Henry C. Adams on "Popular Education at the University of Michigan," complete this full and rich table of contents.

Forum Publishing Co., New York City.

A new claimant for attention has recently come to our library table—THE AMERICAN JOURNAL OF POLITICS, "a magazine for intelligent men and women who read and think on vital questions of the times." The journal has a wide field and a vast audience. Its September issue presents a bill of fare on which the most fastidious must find something suited to his palate. Many a caustic remark has been flung at the newspaper-reading "fiends" who read the dailies on cars, steamboats, railroad trains, at lunch counters, in waiting rooms, at home and abroad. But surely it is the hope of the nation that men and women will know what the world is doing, and doing most of all politically. It must therefore be that under wise editorship, a journal of politics like the above can perform a mission to the reading public not to be measured in a few sentences. The very air we breathe is redolent of politics, and the army of those who are seeking wider breadth of intelligence along these lines, is one of steady and rapid growth.

Published at 114 Nassau St., New York City.

The September CALIFORNIAN is a striking issue. It contains an exposé of spirit photography, from the pen of the well-known scientist, Dr. Elliot Coues, of the Smithsonian Institute. Dr. Coues attacks the bogus spirit photographers without mercy, and makes most entertaining reading—having traced down all the fraudulent pictures. The illustrations to this paper are striking, and will create consternation in the army of frauds who prey upon unsuspecting people. A timely and beautifully illustrated article is on yachting about San Francisco, by Mr. Yale, editor of the Mining Review, a well-known yachtsman, and authority in such matters. The illustrations are racy and numerous, being instantaneous views of every famous yacht on the bay. A remarkable history of a secret society in Honolulu in which superstition ran mad, is found in the illustrated article entitled, "Black Art in Hawaii," by the Rev. Dr. Fisher, a former missionary. Higher education in California is illustrated in a well-written article on Throop University. Auguste Wey continues the series on what California can do at the World's Fair, and a plea for the missions is made in behalf of the Society for the Preservation of the Missions, by Mrs. Powers, the illustrations being by Fenn, showing Pala, San Luis Rey and the old mission of San Diego. Among the articles on foreign subjects is an entertaining one on India, by the author and scientist, Dr. Simms. Richard H. McDonald, Jr., makes an earnest plea for reform in a paper on "How to Secure Good Municipal Government." No question is of more importance to California than that of the Nicaragua Canal, and the third in the series of papers, by W. L. Merry, treats the financial side of the question. Stories by Mrs. Bugeia and Dorothea Lummis, poems, book reviews and discussions of questions of the day by ex-Gov. Lionel A. Sheldon, make up a number of especial interest.

Published in San Francisco.

THE JOURNAL OF INDUSTRIAL EDUCATION, published monthly, has in its September issue matter of suggestive interest. There is something ideal, "like what you read about," to quote a girlish phrase, in the history of "The Ogontz, Ursula and Wildwood Lunch Rooms," as written by Ellen Snyder. May the day speed on when business girls in all large cities shall have just such homelike places in which to take the brief noon-day rest and eat the hasty noon-time lunch. Other timely articles are "Technical Training for Girls," by Lena Eppurdorf, "The Public Schools of Salt Lake City," by Antoinette Brown Kinney, and "The Free Kindergartens of San Francisco," by Joaquin Miller.

The Owens Publishing Co., 243 State St., Chicago.

DEMOREST'S FAMILY MAGAZINE for September is a bright number, with its humorous stories, apt illustrations, and enough of the "solid" to give it good tone. Among articles of the latter class is one that will be read appreciatively by dwellers in large cities who are so dependent upon ice for comfortable living during the heated term,—"How Artificial Ice is made," by Charles L. Hayne. Botanists will be interested in E. M. Hardinge's paper, "The Mushroom's Family Connections" with its illustrations of the beautiful life of the ofttimes despised plant. The household department is full of practical suggestions that will be welcomed by our home-makers.

Office of publication, 15 East 14th St., New York.

The SCRIBNER for this month is rich in illustrated articles, there being seven in all, an unusual number. Every one will read with deep interest "The Tilden Trust Library; What Shall It Be?" written by ex-Minister John Bigelow, one of the trustees, containing Mr. Tilden's wishes as to the details of the plan, together with a proposal for carrying out a part of it by the erection of a great library building in the heart of New York. Pioneers and huntsmen who have been familiar with life on the great plains will be delighted with George Bird Grinnell's article, "The Last of the Buffalo." Particularly fine are the illustrations by Ernest E. Thompson, and Otto H. Bacher. Isabel F. Hapgood writes of the Névsky Prospékt in the sixth article on "The Great Streets of the World," and gives a very clear impression of its characteristic aspects, and the historical and personal associations of Russia's chief city. Artists will receive with pleasure W. C. Brownell's first article in a series of three on French Art. "The Indian who is not Poor," by Charles F. Lummis, is of historic value, and being written by one who has lived at the Pueblo of Isleta, is full of fresh enthusiasm and reality. The "Historic Moment" this month is "The Attainment of the Highest North," by Sergeant, now Lieutenant, D. L. Brainard, of the Greely Expedition, who with Lieutenant Lockwood and the Eskimo Thorlip reached the most northern point ever touched by man. Mrs. Frederic R. Jones contributes a paper on "The Education of the Blind," which with its illustrations is a fine presentation of this invaluable art—teaching the sightless to read.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

THE REVIEW OF REVIEWS for September,—"the busy man's magazine" as it is aptly called, presents a table of contents fully equal to the ever increasing demand for fresh and world-wide news. William T. Stead contributes a sketch of Louise Michel, "'The Red Virgin' heroine of the Commune, convict of New Caledonia, and now exile in London. . . . She is the supreme type of the passion of Compassion, which is so masterful a sentiment of this generation. But Louise is more than the priestess of Pity. She is the Sybil of Wrath, the Judith of the Revolution. . . . She is a Joan of Arc without her victories, a Charlotte Corday without her knife, with all the enthusiasm of the one and all the ruthlessness of the other. Joan, Charlotte and Louise form a trio of female worthies characteristic of France." The article is illustrated with several portraits of Louise Michel taken at different periods of her life and form an interesting study of character as written in the features of the human face.

New York City, 13 Astor Place.

Among the excellent contributions that make up the latest issue of CHRISTIAN THOUGHT may be especially mentioned "The Mistakes of Moses," by Rev. H. L. Hastings, editor of The Christian. When the laws at the close of the enlightened nineteenth century, and at the dawn of the twentieth, to which men are looking with even a wider hopefulness, are measured and weighed by the Mosaic law, the divergencies are startling. A few sentences from this vigorous article may be quoted here: "One of the great occasions of complaint among the skeptics of to-day is the vast accumulation of wealth in the hands of the few, the poor being meanwhile trodden down, oppressed and impoverished . . . The whole law of Moses was opposed to vast accumulations, and the effect of it was to produce a diligent, thrifty, healthful and contented people." "Why are not our prisons crowded with Jewish criminals, our streets thronged with Jewish beggars, our almshouses filled with Jewish drunkards and paupers? Every one knows that they are filled with people from whom the Bible has been withheld or who have never perused and studied the law of Moses and the teachings of the Prophets and Apostles. Surely the thousands of criminals who have no Bibles to read, or who have been unable to read them, have not found their way to prison by following 'the mistakes of Moses.'"

Wilbur B. Ketcham, publisher, 2 Cooper Union, New York City.

THE LAWS OF LIFE, A FAMILY HEALTH JOURNAL, edited by James H. Jackson, M. D., managing physician of the Sanatorium, Dansville, N. Y. This journal has many practical suggestions in its columns that are worthy deeper attention than that given in a mere cursory reading. It is a matter of fact that the ambitious, knowledge-loving, intense-living Americans are perhaps among the most utterly careless of their health. Would that health-literature from the pens of experienced physicians, such as the above, might take the place of much of the "light" reading that loads down library shelves.

The September issue of LIPPINCOTT'S is a Pacific number. Every article in it deals with topics of our western coast—chiefly, of course, Californian—or has been prepared by a native or resident of that favored region. The complete novel, "The Doomswoman," is by Mrs. Gertrude Atherton. It is a vigorous tale of "the grass era" of Spanish occupation, and depicts with vivid brilliancy the manners, amusements, passions and intrigues of those hidalgos and donnas who ruled the land before its cession. The novel is fully illustrated. Hubert Howe Bancroft, the distinguished historian of the Pacific coast, furnishes a most interesting account of "California Eras." Next in importance is a sketch of the history of "California Journalism," by the veteran editor, M. H. de Young. Portraits of these gentlemen accompany their articles. W. C. Morrow describes "The Topography of California," and Helen F. Lowe gives a liberally illustrated account of "A Famous Pebble Beach," that of Pescadero. William S. Walsh discusses "Mrs. Atherton's Novels" in the form of a dialogue between a Whig and a Tory. The department "As it Seems" talks about "A New Country," "The Gospel of Migration," "Literature of the Pacific" and kindred topics. There are short stories by Heine (better known as Joaquin) Miller and Emma B. Kaufman, and poems by Ina H. Coolbrith, Madge Morris, Martha T. Tyler, Flora Macdonald Shearer, Charles Warren Stoddard and Nelly Booth Simmons.

THE LANCE OF KANANA. By Abd El Ardavan (Harry W. French). Boston: D. Lothrop Company.

The author of this vivid romance writes from intimate knowledge of the Arabs, who gave him the name attached to his story. He has made good use of the romantic history of Kanana, the brave Bedouin boy who saved Arabia from being made the slave of her enemies. The young hero moves before us with simple, unconscious grace and dignity; bearing the taunts of the tribe for his supposed cowardice because he refused to lift a lance and take life, except for Allah and Arabia; welcoming the opportunity of at last proving his courage; and showing such bravery and fortitude in the fulfillment of his vow as to thrill the heart with admiration. The story of Kanana's journey across the desert, the difficulties which he so nobly overcomes, the wonderful intelligence of the white camel and the dromedary under his guidance, are recited with a verve and feeling that carry us along breathlessly to the close. The tragic ending comes all too soon, and we realize the nobility of character of the hero whose name has come down through the ages, as the deliverer of Arabia.

JACK BRERETON'S THREE MONTHS' SERVICE. By Mrs. Maria McIntosh Cox. D. Lothrop Co., Boston.

To the young people who have grown up since the civil war, the history of those years of struggle, self-sacrifice and terrible suffering, seems at the most but vague and visionary. Jack's father was a soldier who went into the army purely from his love of country and sense of duty, leaving the little family at home under the "protection" of his oldest, yet tenderly young son. How the boy who had been duly "sworn into home service," developed into a prudent, self-forgetful, watchful guardian over the mother and babies, covering up with the heroism of a grown man his own grief, is woven into a story that is unusually full of pathos and thrilling interest. The visit of the Fire Zouaves to Jack's home is described with realistic vividness, and shows one strange feature of those strange, eventful times. This is a young people's book, but we can fancy many an older reader bending absorbingly over its pages, stirred by the memories it will awaken.

In our issue of August 11, the name of the author of OLD CATO was inadvertently omitted. Although it is supposed to be "Old Cato" himself who tells the story of his life, we are happy to name John Paul Dudley, A. M., M. D., as the "power behind the throne."

After orators have used all their powers, after the zealots in a cause have arrayed themselves against the enemy and the indifferent ones, in parade of numbers, costumes, bands, and banners, after the pens of the ready writers have filled pages with their pleadings, it is somewhat of a comfort and assurance to fall back on cold, calculating, but nevertheless convincing matters of fact. Hence it is that Prohibitionists will welcome to their possession the HANDBOOK ON PROHIBITION FACTS for 1892, compiled and prepared by Wilbur F. Copeland, of The Voice editorial staff. The title page bears the legend, "We give the Facts, you do the Talking," but it cannot be denied that the compact little volume does some forceful "talking" on its own account that cannot fail of results among honest readers. The HANDBOOK is a valuable weapon for all the fighters in this bloodless war.

Funk & Wagnalls Company, New York City.

There are feats in the world of literature that remind one of certain attempts made by men ambitious for notoriety, such as jumping from great heights, or dangerous balloon ascensions. One cannot refrain from a certain admiration of these feats, even while one regrets that such noble force should be turned to a use less noble than its very highest possibilities. There comes to our library table a book entitled THE GODDESS OF ATVATABAR, a piece of fiction that makes the reader catch his breath in his attempts to follow the author's wild flights of imagination. In this age of earnestness, when upon even young shoulders rest burdens of grave responsibility in the rightful discharge of the world's business, the number who can, or ought, to stop and read such books as the above, is growing encouragingly less. True, THE GODDESS OF ATVATABAR is a literary feat, and there is a compelled admiration for the brain that could weave such a fabric. But when woven, what of it? Were the same time and strength and mental brightness applied to the putting before the world matter of profit, how much more admirable the performance!

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto me," are the words recalled by a brochure that finds its way to the Library Table, entitled, HOSPITAL LEAVES AND LYRICS, OR MESSAGES OF COMFORT. Its pages—about one hundred in number—are filled with selections in verse and prose peculiarly fitted for those who are shut in with pain and weakness behind hospital walls. Very gracious and comforting are the messages the little white covered book bears. The compiler, C. G. M'Culloch, of St. Ignace, Mich., is surely one to whom the Master's "Inasmuch" may apply, since for every copy of the book sold, another copy is placed, free of charge, in the hands of some invalid of Hospital or Home. It is to be hoped these MESSAGES OF COMFORT will be circulated by many who have learned the sweet lesson of remembering others.

STOCKHOLDERS' MEETING.

The annual meeting of the W. T. P. A. stockholders will take place on Wednesday, October 12, at 10 a. m., at their office, The Temple, Chicago. It is desirable to have every share of stock which is held represented. So far as possible this should be done by the stockholders themselves, but in the cases in which they cannot be present they should send to some one who will be at the meeting. The following ladies are almost certain to be present: Mesdames Carse, Hagans, Plumb, Hobbs, Rastall, Monroe, Thurston and Woodbridge, and Misses Sudduth and Pugh.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Washington, D. C., is crowded with visitors to the Grand Army encampment.

The past week witnessed a large decrease in the number of deaths from cholera in Hamburg and other European cities.

Six cases of cholera have been reported at New York, and one in New Brunswick, N. J. The pest seems stayed in this country.

Miss Harriet Monroe, the author of the dedicatory ode for the Columbian Exposition, has been awarded one thousand dollars.

The W. C. T. U. of the District of Columbia tendered a reception to the woman's relief corps of the G. A. R. at Hotel Fredonia, Washington, September 24.

Two Chinese boys were admitted to the United States last week, on condition that they be sent by their parents to the University of Michigan, at Ann Arbor.

The latest reports of Mrs. President Harrison's condition are very hopeful, and preparations are now being made for her removal from Loon Lake, N. Y., to Washington.

Mrs. Mary B. Willard and daughter sailed for Berlin, September 17. If, upon careful investigation, Mrs. Willard considers all danger of cholera passed, her pupils will follow her in October.

Acting Secretary of the Interior Chandler has ordered the payment of $200,000, authorized by Congress several years ago, as an indemnity to the Sioux Indians for the loss of five thousand ponies.

The wife of Pere Hyacinthe, the famous French priest, who renounced the Romish church in 1869, and founded the Gallic church, is in Chicago soliciting funds for the support of her husband's mission.

It has been decided to fire one hundred cannon at sunrise on the morning of October 21, the day of the dedication of the World's Fair buildings. The exercises will begin at 12:30 in the Liberal Arts building, where accommodations have been made for one hundred and twenty-five thousand people. The program is four hours long. It is expected that the President, Vice-President and ex-Presidents of the United States, members of the Cabinet, Supreme Court, Senate and House of Representatives, as well as the commissioners and directors of the Exposition will be present.

THE annual meeting of the National Temperance Hospital Association will be held at the hospital, 1619 Diversey Avenue, Monday, September 26, at one o'clock. All members of the association are requested to attend this meeting, and also all friends are most cordially invited to be present. A full account of the year's work will be given.

A WRITER in the Voice urges that we first secure prohibition, "and then attend to such household affairs as woman's suffrage, tariff reform, etc." This is just what we women set out to do originally, but we had not worked long before the great majority of us became convinced that the short cut if not the only "cut" to prohibition was by way of woman's suffrage.

THE recent brutal prize fight in New Orleans contains a vital temperance principle. A daily paper in commenting on the defeat of Sullivan says: "Why was Sullivan dethroned? He, himself, had contributed to the cause of his own downfall. Had his life had no excess Sullivan would have been able to fight the struggle more effectively to retain his prestige. He is not relatively so good a man at thirty-four as hundreds of other men at that age. His face is furrowed not alone by years but by the methods of his living. His ponderous body, too, bore the trace not alone of time, but of easy living. His condition was not comparable with that of his foe. It could not be. There was the accumulation of age and wide freedom, which could not be trained away without impairing the man." The "sporting world" has thus unwittingly given the public a total abstinence lesson that has been heard "far as the curse is found." The trainers and backers of the "world's champion," previous to the gladitorial spectacle at New Orleans—which discounted our civilization—let fears leak out that their hero "was not in condition through heavy drinking." In his defeat, John L. Sullivan confessed with tears that wine was the cause of it. When the schools of the nation train the future citizen in manly athletics, he will know the value of a wineless life for physical perfection, and with a perfect body will dawn the knowledge that a perfect citizen cannot prostitute the glory of his strength to the service of gamblers in the prize ring.

WE doubt if any personage in American history has ever been more tenderly loved and honestly respected by his countrymen than John Greenleaf Whittier, the "Quaker Poet," who passed away September 7. His was a rare spirit, firm, yet gentle, keenly conscious of the evil about him, yet full of faith and hope. He was born December 17, 1807, in Haverhill, Mass. His early life was passed upon a farm, and that part of his education which was derived from school was obtained by attendance twelve weeks each year upon the country district school until he was twenty years of age, and one year's attendance upon Haverhill Academy. His poetic talent showed itself early. As a farmer's boy he wrote poems for Wm. Lloyd Garrison's paper, The Free Press. For five years after the death of his father, in 1830, he carried on his literary work in connection with that of farming. The last fifty years he has resided at Amesbury, Mass. He died at the home of a friend at Hampton Falls, N. H. As a reformer, Whittier was ideal. Fearless and fiery in his denunciation of evil, he had no harsh, vindictive words for men, nor could evil, however strongly entrenched, shake for one moment his faith in the ultimate triumph of right. Where others saw a future full of the blackness of darkness, he beheld the clouds spanned by the bow of promise. When others despaired and gave up, he lost faith in neither God nor man. The secret of the power of his poetry is the secret of his pure and noble life. One cannot read his poems without a thrilling sense of nearness to the living, loving Christ. Whittier's writings are inspired, not by personal ambition, not even by mere love of his art, but by love and consecration to Christ. Had he never written one word upon the subject we should yet know that he wrote for God and humanity. In these later years, his feebleness has limited his work, but not his love and devotion to God and his fellows. In his death the temperance army sustains a great loss, and the cause of woman's advancement is deprived of a royal champion. The W. T. P. A. ever found a true friend in the translated poet. He was the only man who held stock in our association, a complimentary share having been presented him in return for a poem for which he refused payment. In a letter, bearing date October 11, 1890, he writes. "The W. T. P. A. has done a noble work, and is duly honored for it by all who deplore the evil of intemperance. Its paper, THE UNION SIGNAL, has found its way into all parts of the country, and is doing great good." So many kind words has he sent us and so many good deeds has he done us that we are truly among the real mourners, yet rejoicing for his great gain.

MISS WILLARD'S voyage to England was wonderfully calm and enjoyable, contrary to her fears. She has suffered so greatly on the ocean that she dreaded this journey exceedingly. An extract from a personal letter, written just before landing at Liverpool, September 2, will interest our readers who have followed her with such anxious, loving thoughts. "We have had a wonderful voyage. It has been cloudy and rainy, but no storms, and last night as I promenaded the deck with Mr. Pollen (the tutor to Lady Henry Somerset's son), who has been like a brother to us, the sunset's lingering ray and the water's white sheen made the world beautiful. We have felt that God was on the deep and this was His own safe ferry." Miss Willard was invited by the captain to address the passengers at the Sunday services, but her physical prostration was too great to admit of it. She writes that the presence of her dear, translated mother is growing very real. The condition of her health demands absolute rest, even from letter-writing, so her many friends will exercise the patient forbearance that has so seldom been required towards our leader, strong and true.

THE dreaded national pest of Asia, cholera, has crossed Europe and the Atlantic Ocean and planted its blighting presence upon our shores. Six isolated cases have been reported from New York City, and scores of deaths have occurred on ships lying in and near our great harbor. The near approach of frost renders improbable an epidemic in this country this year, but there are grounds for the gravest apprehension for next summer, with the influx of visitors to the Columbian Exposition. Cholera is a native of Hindostan. There it originates, and thence it takes its devastating course around the world. Extreme filth, reënforced by intense heat, is the condition which make India the breeding ground of the disease. It seems to be beyond reasonable doubt that all of the epidemics of cholera known to Europeans have been engendered by the use of drinking water made foul by human excreta. Every three, six, nine and twelve years pilgrimages are made to the various shrines of India. The number of pilgrims is very great, mounting up to the millions at the great twelve-year festivals. In the absence of drainage or of any care to prevent the accumulation of filth in proximity to the water supplies, it is said that the drinking water at these shrines becomes so vile that a European would scarcely touch it, even in the last extremities of thrist. Yet it is constantly used by the millions of pilgrims. Swift and sure, as the penalty of broken law, the cholera descends upon the wretched hordes. Their return home spreads the disease over Asia, then commerce and emigration complete the work, and the fearful scourge is transported over the world. It was not until 1832 that the cholera raged in Europe, then it also reached this country, and since that time has been an occasional and most dreaded visitor. Chicago suffered terribly from the disease in 1866, and again in 1873. But "an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure." The preventatives of cholera are cleanliness and care in diet. Only good, wholesome food (from which fresh fruit need not be excluded) and pure, boiled water should be used. A few years ago, when Chaplain McCabe was stirring the Methodist church to enthusiasm by his cry, "a million for missions," many people denounced his efforts as "robbery of the needy at home." Now that the terrible Indian pest is at our ports, does not every thinking person see that misery, ignorance and filth may concern us quite as much in India as in America? We could have well afforded to send many millions of dollars to India, if thereby we might have kept the cholera from our shores. And this is one of the things that Christianity will do. Christian civilization involves cleanliness, knowledge of and obedience to hygienic laws. Heathen India will forever continue to send out this deadly scourge to devastate the earth. Christian India would at once greatly modify it and ultimately destroy the plague forever.

SEPTEMBER.

BY LINDA SCHERMERHORN HIBNER.

An amber earth, an azure sky,
A wealth of golden grain heaped high,
  Its sheaves in mountains measured,
Thick clustering stacks in every field,
That witness to the full year's yield,
  All safely reaped and treasured.

A field where lavish golden-rod,
Victorious o'er the dying sod,
  Shoots skyward living spires;
Where gentians gem the yellow wold,
As sapphires might the streets of gold
  Where angels tune their lyres.

Around, above, but blue and gold,
Save where the red rose-berries hold
  June's burned out fires in ember;
Like love that kindled long ago,
Still brightens with its steadier glow,
  The heart's serene September.

A settled calm, a dreamy hush,
The rest of nature from the rush
  Of all the season's growing.
Pause we awhile from wearing toil,
To lift our hearts above the soil,
  In silent psalms out-flowing.

SOME PASSAGES IN THE PRACTICE OF DR. MARTHA SCARBOROUGH.

BY HELEN CAMPBELL.

CHAPTER VI.

Two months later Dr. Scarborough, coming cross lots from a patient in the Hollow, paused on the other side of the orchard fence and turned with a smile to his companion, a man of his own age, but with the more alert expression and movement born of city life. A murmur of voices came to them and looking upward two heads were plain, far up in the great Spitzenberg tree, where a seat had been made, and where most of their summer reading was done.

"It is the Arabian Nights," he said. "What would you give to be back there for a day, Byington, just to revive the sensation? Johnny, there, is certain the neighborhood will afford him a roc's egg if he looks long enough, and the girl, though a trifle skeptical, follows, with a vague notion there may be something in it after all."

"Good stuff for an artist there," Dr. Byington said, as he eyed both children critically for a moment. "Delicate still, but can be made sound enough I should say unless there is inherent weakness in the background somewhere."

"Plenty of it, but I don't propose it shall have its way in this case," Dr. Scarborough answered as they passed on. "We make too much of heredity. It has been the chief bugbear in dealing with all sorts of evils. Nothing on the face of the earth is absolutely hopeless."

"That is an optimistic view of the idiot asylums, and our other demonstrations of what civilization is still capable of. Your notions of hope and mine differ, Scarborough. I am inclined to think if you faced some of the problems that the city doctor encounters, you would sing a different song."

"Like the rest of the guild you fancy it is only the city that has problems. City and country each has its own, and in some points we fare more hardly than you, since the country is less open to experiment and reaps only indirectly the fruit of research."

Dr. Scarborough had seated himself as he spoke, on the curved seat of the great elm near the orchard, and Dr. Martha, who looked up suddenly, slipped from the bough where Johnny and she sat enthroned.

"Keep the place," she said. "I promised to remind father of something and I will come back just as soon as I have done it;" and dropping from the lowest bough, she ran toward the house, finding the pair too engrossed in talk to notice her coming. But, as she turned back half uncertain of what to do, she paused, and her eyes opened wide.

"Drunkards?" her father was saying. "I find quite as many difficulties in dealing with a tea drunkard as with one of your whisky soaked candidates, and so far as I can see, both are pretty nearly on a par when it is a question of consequences. Take the case I have just come from. A woman who periodically asks the prayers of the church for her daughter, a growing girl of fifteen, to whom I am called, generally in the middle of the night, once a week or so. 'The hand of God is heavy upon her,' is the accepted formula in the prayer-meeting. I go to find her bent into a bow and shrieking in hysteria, from which she emerges faster under my hands than those of anybody else, because she has a wholesome terror of some of my methods of treatment. She has never been taught a moment's self control. From her infancy she has been fed on pork, pie and cake. What sunshine and free air and bathing and exercise might do, is an unsealed book. The mother taught school before she married, but who shall teach the teacher? Nobody knew the laws of life when she was coming up, and how can she give what she has never learned? She is counted the smartest woman in Linborough, and she keeps up to her reputation by means of tea that would float an egg, boiled in a tin teapot, to insure the greatest amount of deviltry of which tea is capable. Go into that kitchen and you would suppose a carnival of demons was going on. There are minutes, Byington, when I shrink and would like to run from these voices sharp as the sound of a rusty file, and as comforting and reassuring. This excellent woman, who would sit up nights, a week running, with any one in trouble, and who drives her family before her like dry leaves before a November wind, keys up her nerves till each one sounds an independent note, and is as crazy with tea as her brother across the way with hard cider. This child with her hysteria, is the concentrated product of this insanity."

"Write your dietary and order it carried out," said Dr. Byington, and then broke into a laugh as his companion turned upon him with a suddenness that threatened to dislodge him from the place.

"The fact is, Scarborough, you have too much time for mooning as you drive around. A year or two in the city would end much worry over individuals. It would be lost in the general worry over people in general. There is just one spot where orders can be carried out and that is in the hospital. Even there one has doubts at times. What you want is an absolute despotism, and that doesn't go down in New England."

"What I want is a little hospital of my own," Dr. Scarborough answered, "where I could deal with these special cases as seemed best. In fact, there is no other way of saving them so long as the mothers are born idiots. This pretty little Dolly Robinson must grow up into a creature all spinal column and with no stomach, because in spite of my best efforts she subsists on fruit cake and mince pie and hugs an air-tight stove six months of the year. The whole system of living is wrong, and if it were not for the missionary work the summer boarder is doing in New England, there wouldn't be a chance for half of these hill people."

"The fact is, Scarborough, you have come to the point where most of our guild are to-day, and see that medicine is useless save in some sudden emergency, and new methods of living the only road to health. But you can't reconstruct fools or make your patients spend time on a sun-bath, or an hour out-doors, when it is so much easier to swallow a pill or drink something from a bottle. The next generation will be wiser. Let this alone and keep your mind on the children. That is what philanthropy and every other modern means of handling the masses has to come to."

"I have all I can do in handling this one," said Dr. Scarborough, for Dr. Martha had crept up and leaned against his shoulder, with the intent look she always had for every word of speculation or perplexity. "I am educating a partner, and she has already settled what line she will take."

"If she were a boy, now," Dr. Byington said reflectively. "It's a pity to put such notions into the head of a woman child, you know."

"Is it?" Dr. Scarborough said, with a quick look at the speaker. "What are you here for, Dr. Martha?"

"Only because Miss Serena's pills are not made yet, and you wanted me to tell you so that you could take them when you went over the hill."

Dr. Scarborough rose with a groan.

"Another case of tea-tippling," he said. "I'd like to knock every tea-pot in Linborough into a cocked hat; every tin one certainly. I think I'll set Johnny at it and he may begin with the Widow Robinson's and end with Miss Serena's."

"What did he say?" said Johnny, who, getting tired of waiting, had made his way slowly to the spot from which the pair were now walking away.

"He wants all the tin tea-pots knocked into cocked hats," said Dr. Martha. "What are they? We might do it to ours for I know there is one that Dilly has on the back of the stove, only I don't see how I could get it without her making a fuss."

"There is always somebody to make a fuss when you want anything that would be real fun," said Johnny. "We can't do what we want to till we grow up. Let's hurry and be big. I'm a great mind to be a doctor too. Don't doctors always have their own way?"

"Will you?" said Dr. Martha. Her eyes were shining and she caught Johnny's hand. "Will you? Oh, then we can go to college together and everything! Johnny if you will promise to be a doctor I'll teach you everything I know so that you'll understand all that father says, and when we are all through college and everything, we can have a hospital and make everybody eat right things and do right things all the time."

"The child is crazy," said Miss Malvina who had come up behind. "Not in the spelling-book yet and talking about college!"

"Promise me?" Dr. Martha said, still holding Johnny's hand, and looking straight into his eyes, and Johnny with the prompt obedience which he had always yielded said "All right!" and followed Miss Malvina into the house.

MASTERS OF THE MAIL.

BY AMOS R. WELLS.

I do not mean masters of the male. That is not a disputed matter, if you consider "master" of common gender. Nor do I mean postmasters. They are slaves of the mail. But are they the only slaves? Far from it. I shudder when I read the glowing reports of the post office department. These increasing millions of stamps sold and letters carried, these cheapened rates and wider facilities, over which governmental authorities are so cheerful and party orators so exultant—what are they all but added chains about the necks of hundreds of thousands of my fellow creatures, whose uneasy lives are more and more confined to the conscience pigeon-holes of their secretaries!

Slaves of the mail? Why, I wonder whether all the sighs that ascended from plantation bondmen ever equaled in bulk of unrest the groans of letter-galled humanity! I wonder if all the bricks ever made without straw, heaped in one monster pyramid, would overtop the world's pile of letters, written when one had nothing to say! Slaves of the plantation, you must remember, did useful work. But our slaves of the post office—what time-wasting, nerve-shredding, life-desolating efforts are most of theirs!

"The heartless wretch!" shrieks Miss Sukey Sentiment. "How could I exist without my weekly letter from Clarinda? I should not know what she is wearing, or making over to wear, or how her headaches are, or what calls she is making or receiving. Life would be a blank!"

"The uncouth boor!" exclaims Mrs. Solomon Littletodo. "Doesn't he know that letters cement and perpetuate friendships, that they enrich us with the thoughts and experiences of others, that they develop powers of expression, and by the emulation of friendly example incite us to culture?"

"How he exaggerates!" cries Mr. Ralph Readypen. "In half a day I can write up my correspondence for a month and spend the rest of my time in the delight of reading the answers. He is evidently one of these lazy empty-heads who spend two hours in thinking how to begin."

Pardon me, my dear ladies and gentlemen, but I was not referring to you. Enjoy, if you can, your luxuriant inanities, your prolix sentiments, your light-weight missives of lighter-weight brains. You are not slaves of the mail, but its fools. You do not know what it means to have an epistolary conscience.

An epistolary conscience! that wakes us up in the night with a start, in order that accusing bands of unanswered letters may flap their ghostly sheets at us out of the dark! That hangs on our necks like an old man of the sea—of the seal, I should have said in the days of wax—and weighs down our spirits after our work is done with thought of other work to be done,—work that friendship and fashion and ethics bid us call enjoyment.

An epistolary conscience! that will not rest ignobly satisfied with postal cards or even with a double sheet of personal gossip! that scorns the fashionable device of inch-high script! that counts procrastination a treason to friendship! that sees ever floating before it the ideal letter-writers of the world—men and women whose epistolary wit and wisdom have added all ages to their list of correspondents and made Time himself their postman.

To such people the post-office presents this problem. Here am I, a man who delights in making friends and keeping them; a man who needs the help that friendships give, and loves to repay, if possible, the blessed boon. But in the uneasy state of our American population, of which it may with certainty be said that if a man is here this year it is because he was elsewhere last year, I find my friends continually exchanging the friendship of the eye, ear and hand for the friendship of the United States mails.

Not many years pass by before, with this yearly transformation working always outward and never backward, the accumulation becomes appalling. I review the throng of them. Were these post-office friends of mine to return, how many hours a week would it require to maintain a fair acquaintance with them? More than any toiler could spare. It takes longer to write a letter than to make the most informal call, and yet I am expected to maintain an epistolary acquaintance with all these people.

They are noble men and charming women. Yes, indeed. The world would be a dismal place without their friendship. But in the days before that meddlesome Ben Franklin set on foot his pernicious letter-hotbed schemes, did friends forget each other then, I wonder, though sundered fifty stages? That twenty-six cent letter once a year, when it came, did it not do more to rekindle the fires of love and kindly interest than all our thirteen two cent missives? I trow so.

In its best estate, the letter is a bald substitute for the living voice, the flashing eye, the eloquent features. Men can help each other little by correspondence. What do I care if my friend has just bought a new encyclopedia, or had his house freshly shingled? I want to know that he has thoughts of me, that he will turn to me for advice and consolation, will share with me his greater joys, and give me the same companionship when I ask it. But this comes not by way of a monthly eight-page diary. We lived together once, and spoke in no dead language to each other. A letter a year will paint the cable that binds us, will ward off the rust of time, and I ask no more.

Think, too, of the injustice these importunate letters do to our present friends. Why, if every one lived up to his mail duties, my friends and I would be obliged to fix on some time to walk to the post-office together. We should have no other time for intercourse. "Better is a neighbor that is near than a brother far off." Thus spoke the wisest of men. Better is the hearty eye-to eye of the present than the penned narration of the past. While I can talk with my wise neighbor over the fence, I shall not write up my journal for my friend over the Rockies.

"This is selfish," you cry in horror, forgetting that my friend over the Rockies has, or should have, his own fence-comrade, also. Should have, I say, for I have small sympathy with those past-tense natures which think any second set of friendships rank treason to the first. They are ceaselessly "dreaming of old friends far o'er the sea." Old friends may be best, together with the proverbial old wine and old books, but if a man has not brotherly kindness enough to be making new friends ever, he has not enough brotherly kindness to deserve to retain an old friend. Hold to the old friendships, I preach and I practice, but hold to them by something stronger than the thread which surrounds a packet of trivial letters.

Oh, fie! indignant lover! I am not talking to you. Her letters are not trivial, though they contain nothing more weighty than reports of the weather. The most aimless scribbling of that dear hand is worth its weight in diamonds, I agree with you. Mail-trains should run with extra speed, and mail-clerks give heavy bonds for the safe transmission of such precious freight. There cannot be too much of it, though the big earth be filled with the letters that should be writ.

And oh, fie! homesick boy! I am not talking to you either. You may sit up two hours a day, after work is done, and jerk your eager, yearning pen over more space than separates you from father and mother, sister and home. It will be good for you, and good for them. What a terrible thing homesickness must have been before Ben Franklin's couriers and our express train furnished swift alleviation.

My voice is raised for those, and those alone, who, with brain and body wearied by long hours of service, approach that pigeon-hole crammed with unanswered letters as a worn-out slave falters toward a tread-mill. Friends, let us be slaves no longer, but masters of the mail! There is no greater treason to friendship than allowing its joys to become duties. Far better a postal card where zest is, than twenty pages interlined with groans. Far better a circular letter (would they were fashionable!) with good-will, than a dozen special letters with halting will. Far better the impersonal type-writer, if it means love, than the most characteristic chirography, spun by indifferent fingers.

Let us say frankly to our correspondents, "Friends, as when you were in my town you did not gauge my love to you by the number of hours I spent at your houses, or the number of words I spoke to you, so let us not adopt such mean standards now that we are parted. When you were here we passed far beyond that uncomfortable stage of formal calls, primly alternating, far beyond the time when width of smile must match width of smile and each took jealous note of the pressure of hands. As in that happy time, let us speak only when the heart moves us, and for the rest be silent, understood."

Then, the writing of true letters will begin. Then, no bank-messenger will carry loads as valuable as the postman's. Then, letters will be prized for their rarity as now they are dreaded for their frequency. They will be handed down as precious heirlooms. All slave-work degenerates, but free work grows nobler. Then, epistolary giants will appear again on earth, for we shall be masters of the mail.

Auburndale, Mass.

"An old lady's aphorism: 'Time is the heart's blood of folks that can do things.'"

HOMELY MR. GLADSTONE.

WHY THE PEOPLE LOOK UPON HIM AS ONE OF THEMSELVES.

Mr. W. H. Lucy, the Parliamentary journalist, who knows more, probably, about members of the House than any one else, has three pages of interesting matter concerning Mr. Gladstone in the English Illustrated Magazine, for September, from which our English editor extracts the following:

In addition to a phenomenal physical constitution, nature has been lavish to Mr. Gladstone in other ways. Education, association and instinct early led him into the political arena, where he immediately made his mark, but there are half a dozen other professions he might have embarked upon with certainty of success. Had he followed the line one of his brothers took he would have become a prince among the merchants of Liverpool. Had he taken to the legal profession he would have filled the courts with his fame. Had he entered the church its highest honors would have been within his grasp. If the stage had allured him the world would have been richer by another great actor—an opportunity some of his critics say, not altogether lost in existing circumstances. To the personal gifts of a mobile countenance, a voice sonorous and flexible, and a fine presence, Mr. Gladstone possesses dramatic instincts frequently brought into play in House of Commons debates or in his platform speeches. In both his tendency is rather towards comedy than tragedy. It is the fashion to deny him a sense of humor, a judgment that could be passed only by a superficial observer. In private conversation his marvelous memory gives forth from its apparently illimitable store an appropriate and frequently humorous illustration of the current topic. If his fame had not been established on a loftier line, he would be known as one of the most delightful conversationalists of the day.

It is amongst the masses that the fascination of Mr. Gladstone's personality works its way with fullest witchery. In the front rank of statesmen, a great orator, a ripe scholar, he is, they are glad to think, actually one of them. His homely domestic life is worth untold votes at a general election. The people like to think of him with his plain prefix of "Mr.," his daughters who marry curates or work in schools, his sons who are "something in the city" and do not marry duchesses. They like his stripping to the shirt to fell a tree, his going to church on Sundays and to the theatre or concert on Wednesdays or Saturdays. It is what they do themselves, or would do if they had the chance. I happened to see a good deal of this in the last Midlothian campaign. There was no cottager too poor to decorate his house on the day "Mester Gladstane" was to honor it by passing by. An old lady, housekeeper at a lodge in Haddingtonshire, told me in her musically spoken Doric a little story which better than pages of narrative or analysis illustrates the hold Mr. Gladstone has on the common people.

"An auld man, Geordie Paul," she said, "lived all alone in a wee cot up there," pointing to a hill close by. "He used to sit at his door reading the paper spread on his knee, and many's the time when he thought naebody was looking, I've seen him greeting, and the tears drapt down on the paper, and he often muttered to himself, 'To think they'd use Gladstane sae ill, and he sic a man!' The nicht afore Geordie deed I went in to see what I could dae for him. There he was, so weak he could not get on more than one arm of his jacket, but he had the paper propped up against the other (upside down), and the last words he said to me were: 'There's wan thing, Liz; if I could only see that Irish question settled!'"

This, of course, will sound very ridiculous in Mayfair. The poor man knew nothing about the Irish question, the intricacies of which have baffled more fully cultured persons. But he knew that "Mester Gladstane" had made the question his own, had devoted the closing days of his life to its settlement. That was enough for the Scottish cotter, and his dimmed eyes turned upon his newspaper, searching in its blurred columns if peradventure, before they finally closed, they might alight upon some indication of the accomplishment of Mr. Gladstone's heart's desire.

Mr. Gladstone's tirelessness habitually amazes those who come in contact with him. Ordinary men of half his age, having spent themselves on oratorial effort, are glad to benefit by a brief period of seclusion and rest. Mr. Gladstone, like all great workers, finds recreation in change of employment. One night at the beginning of last session he had before the dinner hour delivered an important and critical speech which compelled the admiration of the House of Commons. It was one of those, of late not infrequent crises in which he has, to borrow an Episcopal simile, endeavored to walk on both sides of the road at the same time. Ministers were attacked on a question of policy from below the gangway on the opposition side. Mr. Gladstone believed the attack was undeserved and impolitic. The task he had set for himself on interposing in debate was to justify ministers without affronting an important section of his own party. This he did with a skill, a dexterity, and an exact niceness of proportion that won the applause of both sides.

His speech, exceeding an hour in delivery, was concluded at half-past seven, and the most natural thing expected in such circumstance, from a gentleman over eighty, was that he would straightway drive home, dispose of a judiciously selected meal, and go early to bed. What actually happened was that half an hour later, punctual to the appointed time, Mr. Gladstone turned up to keep a dinner engagement, having in the meantime changed his dress and driven some distance. Throughout the dinner he talked as freshly and as brilliantly as if he had spent the afternoon lolling on the lawn at Dollis Hill, and had leisurely made his way into town. Nor was this all. The Clergy Discipline Bill stood on the Orders, and might or might not be reached before the House rose. The strong probability realized in the event, was that it would not. But Mr. Gladstone, much interested in the question, would not miss opportunity to take part in the debate, and returned to the House at eleven o'clock, prepared to contribute a second important speech to the proceedings of the sitting.

EXPOSITION ART NOTES.

BY B. V. CUSHMAN, M. D.

It seems probable that there will be in Chicago next year the finest collection of modern art ever gathered. This ought to make "the windy city" the Mecca of artists all the world round. The Fine Arts building is a "cross," architecturally, between the White House and the Temple of Neptune, developed in thoroughly fire-proof material. It is believed that all Europe will be represented in its galleries, for the artists of the old world are enthusiastic There is a mile and a half of wall space, but foreign exhibitors have applied for 130,000 square feet in excess of the total amount provided for them.

The original plan contemplated a building five hundred feet long by three hundred and fifty feet wide. This proved all too small for the demands, and as now going up it is 1,152 feet in length by 504 feet depth. Professor La Farge, one of the best stained-glass artists in America, furnishes four memorial windows, one of which will be borrowed from the Church of the Ascension, of New York, and another from the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. It is for the time being a bonded warehouse, and all works of art will be received and sent out in bond.

Seventy-four galleries will be devoted to the exhibition of paintings. Eighty alcoves will be hung with engravings and architectural designs, while the grand rotunda of the central pavilion, a rotunda in each of the other pavilions, and four large courts will be occupied by sculpture and models of the world's most famous architecture.

France requests 88,000 feet of wall, and M. Antonin Proust, director of the French exhibit, thinks a finer collection will be sent here than was displayed at the Paris Exposition. It is a hopeful fact that some of the choicest pieces of modern work are in the possession of Americans residing in Paris. The French section of the Art Building adjoins that of the United States, and between the two is a space which will be hung with French masterpieces owned in America.

Leading painters in Holland promise that Dutch art shall be seen at its best here, while the fact that Professor Stingener, the historical painter, is commissioner of fine arts for the Fair, insures a rare display from Belgium The society of Munich has applied for more space than can be granted, and the Scandinavian and Russian artists are not asleep, while those of Rome are wide awake.

Negotiations with Greece have been made through Dr. Waldstein, director of the American school for classic studies in Athens. He says, "The Greek government has agreed to send to Chicago a representative exhibit of the great part of its classic life, organizing specially for this purpose the government manufacture of casts, and will at once take casts of the principal works of ancient art, now to be found in Greece. . . . We shall be the first in the world to have compiled a set of these most interesting monuments, of many of which casts have never been made." Later advices from Dr. Waldstein express the hope that some famous originals from the Greek galleries of antiquities may be sent. Chicago will not be slow to retain as many as possible of these treasures for the great Art Institute, to occupy the site of the unsightly old Exposition building on the lake front—now a thing of weather-beaten timbers and broken bricks—which will remain a permanent treasure-house in the World's Fair city.

Moldings are now being made in the Parthenon of its finest sculpture, the models to be sent to America as soon as completed.

Pope Leo has consented to loan some of the rare treasures of the Vatican—generosity never equaled by any previous pontiff. With so fair a suppliant as Mrs. Palmer, backed by that great son of the church, Bishop Ireland, how could the Holy Father refuse?

Chicagoans of Norwegian birth are negotiating with an artist in the mother-land to paint a portrait of Lief Erickson in his ship embarking on his voyage of discovery. Christofo Columbo may not have it all his own way at his own celebration, if the brave Norseman is here in sea-worthy craft. Plans are maturing for replicas of some of Thorwaldsen's masterpieces, especially his greatest, "The Christ with the Apostles," in the church of Our Lady at Copenhagen.

Chief Ives, of the art department, is zealous for the fame of his countrymen. In a circular addressed to American artists he urges that "the position held in this Exposition by our artists, as compared with the artists of other nationalities, will have much to do with determining the general estimation of our art by our own countrymen as well as by our foreign visitors, for many years to come. It is, therefore, of the highest importance to every American engaged in artistic pursuits that the exhibit of American art work be of the highest quality obtainable; that each example shown represent the highest achievement of the artist, and that the collection, as a whole, present in a dignified manner the best productions of our native art."

Unless our knights of the brush fail woefully—and Americans do not fail—American art will be greatly advanced by the Columbian Exposition. Let the new masters come forward and by their merit prove themselves worthy of rank with the old. Then let our picture-loving nabobs encourage home production by their patronage. We have the money to establish the world's art center in the United States; only taste is lacking. Foreign connoisseurs dread the awakening of that instinct. The London Times, commenting editorially upon the art sales of the year in the British metropolis, congratulates England upon retaining, of the late Lord Dudley's famous gallery, the early Raphael—the last undoubted large work of that prince of painters which is at all likely to come into the market. The Times adds: "Perhaps it would not have remained if the Americans had begun to compete seriously for the works of the old painters. They will begin before long, and, if the passion once seizes a number of them, European buyers will have no chance." May the "Thunderer's" fears be realized at no distant date.

The pictures are not by any means confined to the Art Building. Many of rare artistic and historic interest are to be found elsewhere, as, for example, the famous Ramage portrait of Washington, executed in 1789, which is offered to the Woman's Building. It is a miniature in a locket, with hair and monogram at the back.

Speaking of portraits, the artists are in travail to produce a creditable head of Columbus. Be it known that the "only original" of the great discoverer is a pen picture. A metropolitan daily has a cartoon, showing Kenyon Cox, who has just arrived with his bride and the inspiration of the wedding day, F. D. Millet and half a dozen lesser lights, in various poses of despair, before their easels, trying to paint Columbus." The Duke of Veragua, sole descendant of the fearless navigator, certainly "takes a handsome picture," but since Prof. Milnes Marshall, the heredity Fellow of the British Association, has called attention to the fact that going back only four generations, we draw our blood and good looks from sixteen different sources, we shall hardly rely upon this scion of the thirteenth generation for a likeness of his famous progenitor.

In another issue I hope to speak of decorative art at the Fair—a most delightful topic.

SCOTLAND AND THE TEMPERANCE QUESTION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Signs are not wanting that the various sections of the Christian church in Scotland are awaking to the enormous evils which flow from the consumption of intoxicating drinks. The Scottish churches appear to be on the threshold of grappling more decisively with a source of widespread mischief which has so lamentably retarded religious activity and progress. For years it has been an anomaly that the people of Scotland, in particular the Christian portion, admittedly to the fore in education and religion, should have permitted the arch-enemy to assert its sway in the home, in the church and in civic life. To-day a striking change is visible. The conscience of the church has been stirred, her members are increasingly ranging themselves beneath the flag of sobriety, the weapons of the temperance warfare are being polished, and methods of attack devised for the rout of the terrible adversary.

One bright indication of this is the position which the church of Scotland is beginning to take on the question. Less forward than the Free church, or the United Presbyterians, she is urging the attention of her members to the magnitude of the evil and marshaling her forces for combat. Of this the formation of the Manse Ladies' Temperance Society and the Woman's Guild may be cited, and the returns which show that twenty-nine thousand of her members are connected with church temperance organizations, and some twenty-four thousand children pledged to promote temperance work. Bands of Hope are august features of the crusade, and the strong endeavors to save the young from the besetting danger in every part of the land. This was more needful when the effects of continued drinking habits were concentrating themselves in the form of hereditary development, a phase of peril which would require special study to overcome. The church of Scotland never had a better record of temperance service, or one which was more hopeful for the good time coming than in 1891. In no previous year had so many presbyteries been visited, or such sympathetic interest evinced. At the Church of Scotland Temperance Conference in Edinburgh last May, the attendance of the public gathering was the largest known, a circumstance fittingly consummated by the first abstaining Moderator of the Assembly occupying the chair. It may be safely predicted that he will not be the last abstaining Moderator in that position. As in other ecclesiastical bodies the church of Scotland has to face the perplexity of not a few of her adherents making use of the intoxicating cup, and in regard to it this one observation only need be made, "more's the pity," a remark elicited when a speaker declared that some of the holiest and best men he had ever known were not total abstainers. More deplorable is the fact that members of the church are engaged in the manufacture of drink, an inconsistency which is simply appalling. On this unhallowed alliance the words of John Ruskin, in no spirit of uncharitableness, may be quoted, that "if any encourage drunkenness for the sake of profit derived from the sale of drink, they are guilty of a form of moral assassination as criminal as any that has ever been practiced by the bravoes of any country or of any age." It is not surprising that when disclosures of this character were made to Mr. Moody in his recent Scottish revival campaign, that he vigorously condemned Christians having any part or lot in the drink trade.

At the General Assembly's discussion upon the "Religious Condition of the People" in Scotland, Dr. Marshall Lang, a leading divine of Glasgow, spoke of the drink as a tremendous obstacle to the amelioration of the masses, and urged that instead of their "gingerly" way of dealing with the traffic they should, in future, attack it on all points and in every direction, unmercifully, as well as its two satellites, betting and gambling. A prime cause of the popularity of public houses was the wretched condition of the people's dwellings in Glasgow, Dundee, and other large centers of population. Dr. Lang alluded to tenements in which the poor were hoveled and hustled like swine, and in these abodes infamy and immorality, intensified by the drink passion, prevailed. In Glasgow alone there were 36,000 one-roomed houses, and in Dundee worse evils existed. From this condition of things with all that it implied, proceeded a sum of misery fearful to contemplate. Dr. Lang's hope that such a reflection upon a so-called civilization will be impossible a few years hence, every friend of humanity must heartily cherish.

Another eminent preacher, Professor Story, pleaded that inasmuch as the artisan classes of Scotland were toilers in a peculiar climate it was desirable to provide them with a stimulus of a wholesome character as distinguished from a stimulant which left a man enervated. It was contended that suitable refreshments in accessible places and at reasonable charges would be formidable competitors of the public houses, and offer an alternative to the uninviting homes of multitudes of working people. The club system was as strongly denounced in the subsequent discussion. In presenting a report of visitations to the Presbyteries, the testimony was unanimous that until the ministers coöperated in the work, little progress could be anticipated.

The Free Church of Scotland is more pronounced on temperance and embraces a wider sphere for her operations. In an especial degree, the Free Church has supported legislative measures, which will give Scotland the power to deal with licensing facilities. Meanwhile, it is evident in municipal affairs and in national life that a healthier opinion is growing upon the question. There was pleasure in noting that in Scotland temperance teaching was gaining a distinct place in the educational work of the country. The committee had also been encouraged in learning that their successful agitations to close public houses in Glasgow, Edinburgh, Aberdeen and similar important centers were producing beneficial results. It was shown universally that where licensed houses were closed there was less drunkenness and disorder than in past years. A greater number of Presbyteries in the Free Church were espousing the good cause and doing effective service. In the ensuing year more extended efforts were about to be made to bring the church face to face with the national danger of liquor drinking. Gratifying as it was to know that the temperance sentiment was stronger and that licenses in Scotland were decreasing, a powerful forward movement was imperative. The drink, it was observed, would not leave them alone, which bound them to face and tackle it. Earnest support had been given by the committee of the Free Church temperance organizations to the agitation bearing on the opium traffic, liquor legislation in India, and likewise the "Native Races and the Liquor Traffic!" In a genuinely patriotic manner the United Presbyterians have long advocated the temperance ticket. Ministers and office-bearers have taken high ground on the subject, which strengthens the assurance that amid the conflicts incident to a campaign of far-reaching magnitude, thousands of loyal souls cling to the justly cherished hope:

"Though beaten back in many a fray,
Yet fresh'ning strength we borrow,
Where the vanguard halts to-day,
The rear shall camp to-morrow."

THE INTERSTATE CONFERENCE AT PROHIBITION PARK.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The Interstate W. C. T. U. Conference and school of methods held at National Prohibition Park, Staten Island, N. Y., on August 9, 10 and 11 was a decided success. The conductors, Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap, state president of Michigan, and Mrs. Ella A. Boole, first vice-president of New York, were untiring in their efforts to have the program full of interest. Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt, honorary president of the World's W. C. T. U. and the presidents of New Jersey and Massachusetts were also in attendance.

The especial feature of the occasion was the free parliament held each day, opened by well prepared addresses and the chosen topic then discussed generally. Mrs. Dr. Tomlinson, of Plainfield, introduced "The W. C. T. U., its needs and its opportunities," and the discussion brought out the following, among many other helpful things, viz.: that we need to make an effort to hold the boys and girls after they begin to feel too big for the Bands of Hope and L. T. L's. The few lessons they receive in these organizations are gone before they are voters, and the old parties gain the boys from us. Mrs. Leavitt suggested the English plan. Mrs. Bourne thought one need was more advertising of the regular meetings by our unions, the usual time and place of meeting should find space among the regular advertisements in the daily papers, and should be put on a bulletin board in railroad stations and other public places.

Mrs. Boole said our women needed a holy boldness that would make them fearless in wearing the white ribbon, in praying for temperance reform in church prayer-meetings, and in patronizing those tradesmen that stand for prohibition. These men do not stand without sacrifice, and we women ought to help them all we can. The Fresh Air Fund was spoken of as an opportunity, and a lady from Elizabeth, N. J., told how their fund had risen from one dollar to enough money to send out twelve hundred women and children last year.

The second Parliament had for its subject, "New York Women and the Public Schools—Woman's Responsibility in her new role as citizen." This topic was introduced by Mrs. Lillie Devereaux-Blake, president New York City Woman's Suffrage League, who gave an account of the way in which suffrage was first secured for New York women. The bill allowing women to vote for the first time in this state at the general elections, but only for school commissioner, was discussed. The last free parliament was opened by Mrs. Susan Fessenden, president of Massachusetts W. C. T. U. The subject was "Woman in Politics—How shall the Woman with Radical Convictions best help the cause of Political Prohibition?" The discussion brought up the feasibility of the White Rose League as a separate organization, Mrs. Fessenden believing it to be best that the strong women should go into them for the next three months, others advocating as strongly the opposite, and holding it best that our women stay in the W. C. T. U. and work there for political prohibition, by getting voters to sign for the million votes asked by the Voice, and in every other right and practical way.

Another pleasant feature of the conference was the "Bird's-eye views of the W. C. T. U.," given by the state presidents, each speaking for her state, and Mrs. Leavitt speaking for the world outside the United States. Among practical things said of the Michigan W. C. T. U. was that it was out of debt, and better still, had never been in debt, that when last year a bank failure took one thousand dollars from their treasury the women made it up in six weeks from private contributions.

From New Jersey one union of fifty members was reported as doing restaurant work. The town has many hat manufactories, and runners go from the restaurant among the hands, taking and serving lunch orders. Another union has a coffee wagon that runs to fires, and another a gospel wagon, from which evangelistic work is done. New York state was represented by Mrs. Boole.

who said the outlook was bright and that seventy-five thousand dollars had been raised in this state for work last year. Mrs. Leavitt said that, hard as it was to do temperance work here, it was harder in every other country in the world; that not one native lady whom she met in Germany was a total abstainer. In Italy and South America almost every one drinks wine, even the members of the Methodist Episcopal church in those countries, converts of our missionaries, are drinkers, and the problem is becoming a very serious one with those people.

Mrs. Bourne gave a delightful talk on mothers' meetings, that was particularly helpful. The keynote of the consecration meeting, led by Mrs. Leavitt, was to be and to do as Jesus did.

The last morning of the conference was given to the children of the Loyal Temperance Legions of Staten Island, and many of the little folks sung or spoke. Mrs. Leavitt closed the entertainment by telling them how she had addressed large concourses of Dutch children in Holland, of English children in New Zealand and of black children in Sierra Leone. Then came the big basket picnic in the woods.

In the afternoon the last thing on the program was a talk by Miss Annie Thomas, of the Thomas Psycho-Physical Culture School, of New York City, and the showing of some of her exercises. The school of methods closed with an address by Mrs. Fessenden, on "The Responsibility of the Government for the Liquor Traffic." Each evening of the session concluded with an address, the first given by Mrs. Lathrap and the second by Mrs. Leavitt. The attendance was good, and a number of noted visitors were present. TEN DAYS AT BAY VIEW.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The school of methods at Bay View, this year, began the 20th of July and continued to the 30th, inclusive.

The hours each morning from nine to ten and from three to four each afternoon were given to the W. C. T. U., the meetings being held in Evelyn Hall. A larger number of states were represented this summer than last, and the school proved very satisfactory to all who attended, at least the large audiences at each session proved the interest in the topics discussed. These topics of necessity were of quite a general character, not being confined entirely to mere methods of work, but they involved, to a great extent, principles, or such methods of temperance work as touch all classes of people, especially Christians.

Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap, president of the state, was with us most of the time, and added much to the profit as well as to the pleasure of the occasion.

After the opening of the school the first morning Mrs. Lathrap discussed the topic, "Benefits to be Derived from the School of Methods." It would be impossible, in a short report, to give any idea of her address upon this subject, but the bell rang long before the audience wished. Mr. George W. Bain had been invited to give "An Outside View of the W. C. T. U.," but was glad to be excused from a long talk as he had just arrived upon the ground and was weary with travel. He however spoke for a moment, and as usual delighted the audience.

Dr. J. H. Kellogg, of Battle Creek, who is at the head of the sanitarium at that place, gave three talks upon the following topics: "The Ethics of Hygiene," "The Rational Cure of Inebriety" and "The Household Foes of Temperance."

Dr. Kellogg had a manikin and impressed the truths he uttered by illustrations of the most interesting character. "The Medical Aspect of the Question" was discussed by Dr. Mary A. Greene, of Charlotte, Mich., a physician having quite an extensive practice.

The symposium upon the topic, "Why do I Wear the White Ribbon?" proved a very interesting feature of the school.

Mrs. L. M. Boise, of Grand Rapids, well known by those of our membership in other states who came early into the W. C. T. U. ranks, read a thoughtful paper upon "What Shall the W. C. T. U. do Next?" It seemed to be the unanimous opinion of the school that while all our departments should receive attention, and while total abstinence for the individual should be more and more preached, yet the organization should be aggressive, especially in the political field and during this coming Presidential campaign.

Mrs. A. T. Barrett, of Niles, president of the fourth district, discussed "W. C. T. U. Organization, its Need and its Limit." Mrs. Cornelia Moots, superintendent of the evangelistic department, talked of "Evangelistic Work; What we are Doing, and what we Ought to do."

Mrs. Kinney, National superintendent of prison and jail work, talked of her work under the topic, "Our Duty to the Criminal Classes and how to Perform it." "Michigan Laws as Related to Women," were set forth by Mrs. Belle M. Perry, of the W. C. T. U., and also president of the Michigan Woman's Press Association. The discussion of this topic brought out some startling facts, and many persons went from that meeting wiser and more thoughtful on the subject of woman's rights and wrongs than they had ever been before. The "Free Lunch"; "Industrial Training for Girls; Its Value in the Prevention of Vice," were also discussed. Upon this latter topic Mrs. Lathrap spoke with great earnestness, setting forth the difference between the methods of the old and new fashioned mother in a most telling manner. The question-box, the last morning, brought a long list of questions suggested in some cases by the topics, and in others by the status of the cause.

Friday, the 29th, was W. C. T. U. day at the great auditorium and Mrs. Lathrap was the speaker of the occasion. She said in substance: "There are two forces in civilization, one which works for righteousness and the other for evil. History tells what these forces are. In our land and times the liquor traffic is the greatest problem before us. The country is governed by forces which are in turn controlled by the liquor traffic." She traced the history of ancient Israel to illustrate that when God gives to a nation a revelation of Himself and a pure religion, if it rejects Him by condoning the sin of the individual, disaster is sure to follow. She then showed the present situation and prophesied only ruin if the liquor traffic is perpetuated. The address was enthusiastically received and the truths uttered must have done great good.

One word as to the assembly proper. Mr. George W. Bain delivered three temperance addresses at the auditorium which were much enjoyed by the great audiences which greeted him. Rev. Thomas Dixon, of New York, gave two addresses in which he struck telling blows against the saloon and the liquor traffic. Altogether, temperance was no inconsiderable part of the general program which augurs good for the cause as well as for the Bay View Assembly. CAROLINE B. BUELL.

LAKE BLUFF SCHOOL OF METHODS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The session of the school of methods this year was more helpful and inspiring than ever. White-ribbon pilgrims from many states came up to this Mecca of their hopes, and, after ten days spent in the very presence of the Master, went down from that "mount of privilege" with new zeal and knowledge and skill to carry on the hard year's work awaiting them at home. Their work will long bear the impress of the helpfulness which came to them here, while tired body and brain reveled in the beauty and restfulness of this favored spot. Perfect weather, the grand old trees, beautiful Lake Michigan, and some of the best talent the W. C. T. U. affords, conspired to make the gathering a rare one.

Our women were here from Illinois, Indiana, Wisconsin, Missouri, Ohio, Maine, Colorado, Michigan, Alabama, Massachusetts and Pennsylvania. Nor was the representation confined to our own country; we had Miss Helen Richardson who has been doing a labor of love among the abandoned women of Bombay; and China, Japan and India were each represented by a returned woman missionary.

Miss Esther Pugh is president of Lake Bluff school of methods. Every one knows she is practical and "dependable," and the spirit expressed in those two substantial adjectives was manifest all through the meeting. There were daily children's meetings under the efficient management of Mrs. Addie Northam Fields. There were Y conferences which had the inspiration and help of Miss Margaret Dickson, state superintendent of Indiana, Mrs. Maude R. Barkey, state secretary of Y branch of Wisconsin, Miss Jennie Stewart, editor of Oak and Ivy Leaf, and others. There were daily Bible readings by Mrs. Esther Tuttle Pritchard, National superintendent systematic giving, which drew all hearts nearer the Infinite Heart of love and helpfulness, and brought some into a clearer, higher Christian life. There were Mrs. Benjamin's parliamentary drills, which each year grow more interesting and helpful. A Demorest contest for gold medal, arranged by Mrs. Regan, of Englewood, an address by Dr. Alice B. Stockham concerning her recent trip around the world, an elocutionary entertainment by Mrs. Hessie H. Hurlbert, of Englewood, a pleasant reception at Hotel Irving, and a lecture by Miss Frances Griffin, of Alabama, furnished recreation and decided helpfulness for the evenings not occupied with parliamentary drills.

The thought of the daily program seemed to be, "What can I say to these women that will be a practical suggestion for their note books—that will result in better, truer, more systematic work by them and the many women whose work they will influence."

The practical discussions were of "The Intoxication of Evil Literature," "How to Make a Local Meeting Interesting, How to Learn How, The Place and Power of the W. C. T. U. in the Campaign, How to Increase our Membership, Do we Study the Situation? Penal and Reformatory Institutions, and Franchise," all under the guidance of such experts as Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, Mrs. Carrie Grout, Mrs. F. H. Rastall, Mrs. A. S. Benjamin, Miss Mollie Hay, Miss Lodie Reed, Mrs. J. B. Hobbs, Dr. Annette J. Shaw and others.

Mrs. Woodbridge preached the first Sunday morning, gave an excellent address on "Peace and Arbitration" in the evening, and added much to the interest and pleasure throughout the session. It was an unexpected pleasure to have her with us so long. Miss Willard and Anna Gordon brought their usual inspiration and help for one Saturday and Sunday—an absence from home which we could not have asked had we known in how short a time the Angel of Rest would come for their dear "Saint Courageous." Misses Lenore Ayers and Lulu Jones took charge of the music to the evident pleasure and satisfaction of all.

At a business meeting of the association it was decided to ask the National W. C. T. U. to assist in making this school of methods next year very largely national and world-wide in its character and scope. Situated within thirty miles of Chicago, its session to be held soon after that of the World's W. C. T. U. Convention in that city, the Lake Bluff school of methods will have unusual advantages and attractions to offer white-ribboners from all sections. W. C. T. U. workers from foreign lands and from distant parts of our own country who will be in attendance upon the World's W. C. T. U. Convention and the Columbian Exposition, will, it is hoped, be at Lake Bluff as speakers and workers, and the school of methods of 1893 will be a lighthouse for the white-ribboner who is fortunate enough to be present. TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

But when he (Peter) saw the wind boisterous, he was afraid, and beginning to sink, he cried, saying, Lord, save me. And immediately Jesus stretched forth his hand, and caught him, and said unto him, O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?—Matt. 14:30, 31.

The late George William Curtis, celebrated in every land, after visiting Chicago, in a letter to the Woman's Illustrated World of New York, speaking of the notable points in that city, had this to say of our "House Beautiful": "The Woman's Temple, the National building of the W. C. T. U., is considered by many well-qualified judges, the most complete structure in Chicago. Not the highest, nor the largest on the ground, but exteriorly and interiorly it is a model of architectural symmetry and artistic finish. . . . The hope is cherished that with a membership of 200,000 among its women, and 350,000 in its Loyal Temperance Legion, the entire amount which the building cost may soon be raised, possibly, even probably, within the next five years. This outcome must surely be looked at as the most truly Christian and magnanimous achievement of American women."

One of the youngest and most faithful helpers of the Temple is our dear little nine year-old Ethel Stout, editor of The Midget, the cute little child's temperance paper that only costs ten cents a year. Ethel has moved with her parents to Melbourne, Florida. This dear child this summer has passed through her first great sorrow, in the loss of her only little sister, Angela May, who had a brief, sweet life of thirteen and one-half months. Little Ethel was full of glee when her little sister came. The sweet baby seemed to be the center of attraction and joy to the young readers of The Midget, as well as to the happy little sister. But a change came, and the grieved young heart writes amid her tears: "My dear little sister, Angela May, is dead. She is an angel of the May in heaven. Her little casket was lined with white water lilies, mamma put a white ribbon on her shoulder. We had gone to Juno, Fla., a cool trip on the Indian river, to visit a friend and gather rare shells for The Midget. We had to bury her there, a hundred miles from home. We have only got back; her little playthings are just as she left them. I will try harder than ever to be like Jesus so as to meet her in heaven." Cheer up, little Ethel, your angel of the May has only passed on a few steps in advance. She will be more to you there than she could ever have been here. She had her mission on earth, and it is finished, or she would not have been so soon translated. The Midget raised $100 for the Mother Stewart tablet. Now its young editor is at work raising $100 for the Mrs. Trego tablet, which lacks but $10 of completion. The young subscribers to the paper were allowed to vote who should be honored with the third memorial tablet in Willard Hall paid for by them. "The vote sent in," says The Midget, "shows nearly one hundred majority for Miss Jennie Casseday, of Louisville, Ky. A few of her many friends have already begun a fund for a tablet for her, as you have seen by THE UNION SIGNAL, but the midgets will all be happy to lend a hand until the $100 is raised." We are delighted at the discernment of the midgets in selecting our treasured invalid superintendent of the flower mission work as the recipient of the next memorial tablet from them; still, this need not hinder other friends from sending toward it.

The work of the little children for the Temple is the sweetest thing about it. A mist comes before my eyes as I read such letters as the following from Mrs. L. A. Squier, Pomona, Fla.: "Please find enclosed $3.65, the contents of the mite-box sent to my two little boys by their auntie. I wish I could tell you how their money has been earned, but it would be too long a story to trouble you with. The most of it has come by hard work for two small boys with no papa to help them. I have learned a lesson of faith from them, that I trust not soon to forget, for they have said all the time they knew they could fill it, when I could see no way myself, and now they are jubilant to think they have helped pay for the Temple." Mrs. M. I. Templeton, Mt. Pleasant, Pa., writes: "Enclosed find $3.65, contents of Temple mite-box of Robert Templeton and Mary Warden, collected by them in the past year under many difficulties. They are seven and five years old, and have denied themselves some candy for sake of the Temple."

Nobly are the unions falling into line in sending $100 gifts to the Temple. We have only room at present to mention a few of those who have lately made payment on $100 pledges. Next week we will give a more extended account. The magnanimity that induces a union to give even more than asked well illustrates the spirit of the Master which should animate every white ribboner. The following is a worthy example of this spirit. Mrs. L. H. Moore, president of the Moorestown, N. J., W. C. T. U., was one of the first to stir up her union to work for the Temple; as far back as 1889 this union sent $100. Seeing so many unions fail to do anything, the noble Moorestown W. C. T. U. has come to the rescue, and has paid $47 on a second pledge of $100. The Moorestown, N. J., Colored W. C. T U. sends $1.81, and the Morristown, N. J., union sends $9.64. Union, Me., W. C. T. U. sends $15 on its pledge; $5 of this amount was sent by a former member, Mrs. Azelia Pike, now living in Connecticut.

A two-cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, the Temple, Chicago, will secure a mite-box, descriptive card and bulletin; remember, all who fill a mite box ($3.65) before next April will receive a photographic group consisting of Lady Henry Somerset, Miss Willard and the founder of the Temple. All drafts should be made out in the name of Miss Esther Pugh. All matters pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Carse.

A KNOCK AT THE DOOR.

BY AUNT RACHEL.

Hark, and listen! Don't I hear
Little footsteps drawing near?
Then a gentle little knock—
"Tant I tum an' hab a talk
Wid papa?

"P'ease, now, papa, tant I tum?
'Ou tan talk to baby some.
Den I'll be all dood an' 'till,
Now, dear papa, torse 'ou 'ill,
Now, papa."

Of course the little pleadings win,
And papa lets the pleader in.
And ceasing study for awhile
Takes up baby with a smile
—"Yes, papa,

"Mamma ted I might tum in,"
And she knows such pleadings win
With her papa every time,
In the scramble and the climb,
Over papa.

"Tome day when oo dit some money
Won't 'ou buy a doll, a funny
Doll dat talks an' sometimes kies,
An' when it seeps it suts its eyes—
Say, papa?

"Torse 'ou 'ill now, papa, dear,
Tause 'ou let me tum in here,
I'll do out an' be all dood
If 'ou'd only say 'ou 'ould.
Now, papa?"

Again poor papa has to yield,
For, indeed, there is no shield
That would turn those tender pleadings
Woven in with such proceedings
With papa.

"Yes, the doll, my little pet,
You shall have; and don't forget
But remember to be good;
Don't you know, you said you would,
For papa?"

"Torse I 'ill," and down she goes,
But before the door could close,
Toddled back the little miss—
"Most fordot to dive 'ou tiss,
My papa."

What, think you, could papa do,
But to hug and kiss her, too?
Just a moment, then she's gone
And at last he's left alone—
Her papa.

UNCLE JOHN'S TALKS.

I.

WORKSHOPS.

Now, Jimmy, we'll see about a workshop for you. And while I talk to you, all these other nieces and nephews can listen too, so that they can make the same kind of shops for themselves. Good thing we can have this UNION SIGNAL space, isn't it? What is that? Yes, Iwant the girls to learn the use of tools as well as boys—and I want the boys to learn sewing and cooking, too!

Here, this looks right, a northeast corner of the wagon-shed. Yes, I know it is too dark, but we can soon fix that. First, we want a wide, solid shelf for a bench along the east wall, any length from six to twelve feet, and stopping about eight inches short of the north wall. The height—how tall are you? Four feet four, fifty-two inches; half of that is twenty-six; add two and we have twenty-eight. There's John—named after me, I suppose—like a pair of tongs, five feet; bisect him and we have thirty, plus two, gives thirty-two for him. So you must build the bench to the man. Make it level and solid and be sure to have the best support about two feet from the end, so as to come near where you work and furnish a support for the vise.

Next a front board—look here, boys, let's be carpenters and drop such words as boards and scantlings and timbers, and speak of lumber by its dimensions—next a 1x8, for a front, flush with the edge of the shelf. Use nails with small heads—finishing nails they are called—and set them in half an inch, so they will be out of the way of planes and chisels. Let this front piece run to the north wall and it will make the shelf perfectly solid as to end-wise motion, while you have the open span at the end for sawdust and shavings.

Now for light. Cut a window to the east, about three feet from the corner, starting from the bench and running up as high as we can find space or sash for. It is important to have light high up; and for perfection one needs a skylight right over the vise.

Another window to the north, this one starting eight inches higher than the bench. Now a 1x8 shelf from the corner across the north window forming a wide sill. Now another along the east side, at same height, and running right across the east window.

No sash, do you say? Well, work for somebody and earn two or three dimes and with that money you can buy some second-hand sash. If not, hang the boards you cut out, with hinges, swinging outward, and held shut by buttons. I'll tell you about buttons after we get this shop ready for work.

Now, you say the light dazzles your eyes? Can't work in that way? Yes, I know that is the way large factories are arranged, but I know also that machinists and bench workers become near-sighted from facing the light, just as school children did before they were seated so as not to face the light.

Remedy? Simple as a, b, c. The other day I was in a tin-shop, and saw a window some two feet above the bench, with tools on a shelf under the window. Every time the man wanted a tool he had to shade his eyes with his hand in order to see on the little shelf. I hung up a newspaper, like a shade to the window, only I put it out over the middle of the bench, the lower edge just high enough to let him see under when standing straight. Then his eyes were comfortable, and the shelf was as bright as day by the reflection.

Yes, our plan is like that, only different. Make frames of lath, an inch each way larger than the window openings. Then run and ask Aunt Mary for a piece of old sheet, large enough to cover the frames on the window side. And then tell her you want the skirt of an old black bombazine, alpaca, diagonal dress, and with this we will cover the room side of the frames. Let the covers project at the top, so we can put a few tacks through; and then we have our white-black shades hung at the upper end. Yes, dark as Egypt when they are down. Now fasten a piece of twine to the lower end, run it through a staple in the ceiling or that old rafter, through another staple near the top of the window, then straight down, and have a loop with several nails to catch it over. Now, as you pull the string, the shades will swing out toward you, and light up your work like the Fourth of July, while your eyes are as comfortable as can be. Big thing, do you say? Yes, big with convenience, and very important to those with sensitive eyes.

Yes, John, I know that shelf across the east window will be in the way. These shades will apply to shop windows generally; and now I will tell you how to fix this bench window. Put up a two-inch strip at the back of the shelf where it crosses the window, to keep tools from hitting the glass, and then let the frame come down so as to touch this strip, with a loose end of cloth to make a tight joint, and shut out every ray of light.

Now make another frame for the short space under the shelf, driving the staples for the twine into the under side of the shelf. When this much is done you can begin to enjoy yourself. For small work, like the inside of the baby's tin alligator, you close the large shades, sit up to the bench like a watchmaker, and open the little shade. Better to treat your eyes well. You cannot strengthen them by straining them.

Now you want a box to stand bottom up, two or three feet in front of the bench. Get a big one, and it will serve for sawhorses, besides furnishing a good place for your wagons or sleds when undergoing repairs.

No, we are not ready for tools yet. Get the cage before the bird. One more lot of shelves and a few nails and you will be ready to put your hand on any one of two hundred things in the dark. What we want next is a lot of little drawers like those in a hardware store. No, they won't cost too much either. Clap up some 1x6 shelves over the main shelf from the corner along the east wall, say thirty inches. Make them two and one-half inches apart, clear; and then get a lot of small boxes, and there you are. Or, you might get the boxes first, say thirty, all alike, and then put the shelves just far enough apart to let them slide easily. If they run close, the boxes will stand out like drawers, when opened, so you will not need to take them down.

Yes, it will take five or six of these short shelves, but the arrangement will give twenty pounds of satisfaction to the square inch, as you will see when we come to tools and supplies. No, carpenters do not often have such a shop, but those who keep their things in order do the best work and the most of it.

[The next talk will appear in three weeks.]

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—There is a new arrival in our midst this week. Are you not pleased? Isn't this a nice practical talk that good Uncle John has given us? I have been listening intently and what pleases me as much as anything is, that he has taken the girls as well as the boys for his auditors. There is a time-honored joke that a girl cannot use a hammer without hitting her thumb. Now I think, and so must Uncle John, that girls and women often hit the nail on the head! At any rate they, too, can learn useful things.

We'll be on the lookout for Uncle John's next appearance, for he has promised to come now and then; not forgetting the new auntie, who took us around the world with the temperance missionaries last week. Our temperance family is getting to be a pretty big one, isn't it?

Yours, for our temperance workshop,

Aunt Jane

COZY CORNER LETTERS.

I am president of a Band of Hope. It is in the country, but we have about thirty members. I hope all my cousins will wear their temperance badges when they go to the World's Fair. AN IOWA NIECE.

That is a good suggestion, little niece. If you write to the address given with Rosa's letter yours will reach her safely

---

I would like to be one of you in the Cozy Corner if you will have me. Mamma has taken THE UNION SIGNAL a long time, and we love the paper. I am but a little girl. I am trying to help the cause of temperance. I am nine years old. LOUISE FISHER.

Olathe, Kan.

"Trying to help the cause of temperance" is the countersign (do you know what that means?) to our corner, dear little friend. You belong.

I am one of your nieces and am a temperance girl out and out. I like to crack the soft shelled nuts and send the answers. MYRTLE BAILEY.

Findlay, O.

The answers were correct, Myrtle, although a little late for publication.

We like to read THE UNION SIGNAL and find out the puzzles. I am twelve years old and Charlie is ten. Mamma is the superintendent of the L. T. L. here. Papa is the hospital surgeon. The L. T. L. take flowers and reading to the hospital and county jail. We tie Miss Jennie Casseday's verses on the flowers.

ANNIE E. FLOYD.

THE TONE OF VOICE.

It is not so much what you say,
As the manner in which you say it;
It is not so much the language you use,
As the tone in which you convey it.

"Come here!" I sharply said,
And the baby cowered and wept;
"Come here!" I cooed, and he looked and smiled
And straight to my lap he crept.

The words may be mild and fair,
And the tones may pierce like a dart;
The words may be soft as the summer air,
And the tones may break the heart.

For words but come from the mind,
And grow by study and art;
But the tones leap forth from the inner self,
And reveal the state of the heart.

Whether you know it or not—
Whether you mean or care,
Gentleness, kindness, love and hate,
Envy and anger are there.

Then would you quarrels avoid,
And in peace and love rejoice,
Keep anger not only out of your words,
But keep it out of your voice.

BY MRS. O. W. SCOTT.

Chapter IV.

"Papa, shall we 'luminate?" cried Ted and Dorothy in concert as they rushed into the study one September afternoon. The first street parade of the campaign, so far as Chesport was concerned, was to take place that night, and the school children had caught the prevailing enthusiasm.

"Please, papa, shall we 'luminate?" repeated Ted, anxiously.

Mr. Douglas looked into the two glowing faces with a smile. "Perhaps so—a little. You know I couldn't afford to spend much money for it."

"Willie Pettigrew's going to have Chinese lanterns hung all over his house, and flags, and red lights and everything!" continued Ted.

"And torpedoes, and a lovely tin horn!" exclaimed Dot, clasping her hands and hopping up and down on one foot.

"And the men have got their new suits, and there's going to be three or four brass bands, Harry Pettigrew said so, and they're going to march right straight by this house," concluded Ted, who was never disconcerted by his sister's interruptions.

"Well, bring on your Fourth-of-July flags, children, and we'll hang them over the door, and then if we light the gas in every room that will do very nicely for us. Mr. Pettigrew will furnish fireworks enough for both families, I presume."

The children trotted away perfectly satisfied since they were to have a share in the glorification, and spent the intervening hours in marching and countermarching like restless little Americans, as they were, until far-away music announced that the procession had started.

There is something within all of us which responds to strains of martial music and the tread of many feet, especially when the demonstration is supposed to embody a patriotic principle. No wonder, then, that men, women and children followed the long column of citizens in their campaign suits, nor that red fires flashed and rockets flew upward in wild applause! The minister's family gathered in the piazza, shared the generous "'lumination" which kept their neighbors' lawn in a lurid glow while the procession passed, and drew cheer after cheer from the marching men. Ted and Dot cried " 'Rah! 'Rah! 'Rah!" to their hearts' content as banners and transparencies came and went, not only borne by Chesportians, but by those representing suburbs for miles around whose mills employed hundreds of men.

As the music died away down the street, Hugh rushed in to say, "If you go to the chamber windows you can see it all over again when it passes along High Street!"

Surely here was a chance to prolong the evening's enjoyment, and capturing their father, Ted and Dorothy climbed the stairs followed by the other members of the family.

Beyond the parsonage garden was a parallel street largely occupied by the homes of German citizens, and directly opposite the windows where they gathered was a well-known saloon, now brilliantly illuminated and decorated with lanterns and flags.

"Do you see how that saloon identifies itself with the party demonstration, David?" asked his wife. Mr. Douglas bowed his head in answer. He was thinking. Up the street swept the procession, the band playing what the children recognized at once and began to sing:

"Hurrah! hurrah! we sing the jubilee,
Hurrah! hurrah! the flag that makes us free."

The saloon was reached, when lo! instead of marching past, the procession halted before its door! "What's happened, I wonder!" exclaimed the minister. With every heart-throb he urged it on. It seemed that moment as if he would give his life to be able to force that body of men to resume their march. But no! They stood in a compact mass, and on the steps of the saloon appeared a man who was evidently addressing them, for cheer after cheer rent the air at appropriate intervals. Then the door swung open and one, two, three—

"You may as well stop counting, David, they are going in by threes and fours," whispered his wife.

"Papa, seems to me that don't look much like a temperance party; I'll bet old Voigt is giving 'em free drinks," said Hugh from his window.

Then Dorothy looked up with one of her sudden inspirations; "Papa, that isn't your party, is it? 'Cause you preached 'bout people not drinking. Say, papa, is it your party?"

With one hand resting lightly upon Dot's head, the father replied in a tone so full of pain that his children will never forget it: "It has been my party, darling, but it never will be again."

The child patted his knees sympathetically and whispered: "Is it 'cause they cheered the s'loon, and went in to drink rum, that you won't have it for yours any more?"

"Yes, Dorothy." After a few moments' silence he added: "You little folks can't understand how hard it is to break away from the party I learned to love when I was a boy; but it isn't what it was then."

"I have counted forty-five going in, papa, and I think I didn't get them all. Now they're marching along," said Hugh.

The great political demonstration was indeed over, for sober people and the children hurried away to bed.

"Did you hear what I said to Ted and Dorothy?" asked Mr. Douglas, as he brought in the flags.

"Yes, David, and somehow I was not very much surprised; but I've been wondering ever since if you were feeling like 'a man without a country.'"

"Not I! I feel like a man who has just discovered one," her husband replied, as he sat down upon the sofa and drew her to his side. "I think I know how old Pilgrim felt when he lost his burden. I'm wonderfully relieved, but it may take a little time to straighten my back! I have been under conviction a long while, Mary, but to-night I was converted, not only from the Republican but to the Prohibition party. Why, just think of it! In that procession were some of our best business men, clerks, overseers and employés from the mills and members of every church and temperance society in town; but so far as I could see, not a man left the ranks except those who went into Voigt's after drinks. There were enough good men—men who talk temperance three years out of four—to have compelled that procession to pass the saloon without a pause if they had chosen to, but they didn't! They didn't dare to ignore old Voigt for fear of losing the German vote, which they know is canvassed in that very saloon! I tell you, Mary, I saw in that hurrahing procession a microscopic view of the entire party. It is halting to-day in front of the American saloon, kept by foreigners and protected by the old flag I fought under in '63. It breaks my heart to think of it, but I can't stand there with them. After the vision of this night it would be both sin and treason."

"I know it; I have felt sure you would see it sometime," and then in silence, and with the moonlight filling the room, they sat for many moments in deep thought; and there, all unknown to her husband, Mary Douglas passed through a kind of spiritual struggle which I will try to explain. Much as she had desired to see him reach his present standpoint, the change seemed sudden and startling. Heretofore she had looked at the question from a high moral plane, and not as a present, practical issue. Her own mind was unalterably fixed in its relation to politics, and she wished, yes, and prayed, for David's concurrence, but now, wonder at it, ye who will! she found it had been easier for her to be radical as a woman, than to accept the new phase of the question which his radicalism as a man must develop. We sometimes forget where the weight of temptation falls in politics.

Women have intended to be fair, but doubtless it is easier for some of us to be brave and outspoken against corruption than if we were voters. Our very worthlessness as citizens has given us a certain vantage ground—I dare not say compensation. Thus, outside the smoke of the battle-field, we have seen things in a clearer light, and "like fools and children," have dared to speak the truth because we could. We have "cried aloud and spared not," because, like the old prophets, we have been set apart for the mission. Mary Douglas had done this very thing but this night, with the answer to her hopes and prayers, came her temptation. She was very proud of her husband. That he should be honored by the church, and advanced to positions of responsibility, was a very dear ambition. Do you know what it means to lay aside such ambitions?

This is not a free country, in many respects, and she knew that in changing his political relations he would be misunderstood and maligned. What would Mr. Sloan say? What would become of their pleasant friendship with the Pettigrews? What criticisms would fall from the Rev. Simeon Snow's cynical lips? What would her own brothers—comrades of old war times—think? Other ministers had been thrust from their pastorates, their salaries reduced, their lives endangered and even lost, for daring to join a party which opposed the saloon. For a few dreadful moments she shrank like Peter before the maid-servant's extended finger, sorely tempted to deny the faith. Then, like a frightened and fainting traveler among the mountains, she felt the grasp of her Guide's strong hand, and was lifted to a higher level. Did she think the trials would not come? No, but there was given to her something of that spirit which once came to a young man named Moses, who "chose to suffer affliction," when he might have had a very comfortable time if he had stayed with the oppressors of his brethren and kept quiet.

Do you believe she is the only woman who has been tempted in like manner? Nay, many have passed through this very crisis, in one way and another, and have come forth stronger, better and braver women. But scores of others as thoroughly convinced that nothing but a party committed to political prohibition can save the country, sit in silence, counting the cost in position, income or influence, and murmuring, "It is too great! I cannot sacrifice so much!"

Verily, there are more fagots than martyrs these days! Perhaps Mr. Douglas had had his questionings and conflicts also during the long quiet, for when he arose as the clock was striking twelve, he said, "Well, Mary, we've burned the bridges behind us, haven't we?"

The next morning the minister met Mr. Matthews on the street. "Good-morning," said he, "I hope you are not having a holiday on account of sickness."

The old Englishman shook his head. "No, a good many men in my room are 'aving a 'oliday because of the boss and all celebrating. H'it takes time to get h'over marching, you know."

"I conclude you did not join them last evening."

Mr. Matthews laughed. "No, you see, pastor, I'm not that kind. They did want me to, and the boss, 'e came along a few days ago, and says 'e, 'I got a good suit of clothes for you.' Says I, 'What's the price?' Then 'e says, 'Nothing.' 'Who pays for it?' I asks. 'Mr. Sloan,' says 'e. 'Let Mr. Sloan wear it then,' I says. Then 'e urges me to take h'it and march, but I says, 'No, I've found a better party.' But most of the men took the suits—they was all free, every one."

"Oh, that's the way they got them, is it?"

"Yes, pastor, that's the way. But my heart is sore this morning, for they got John Terry drunk last night, and I've just now been to see 'im."

The minister stopped short upon the sidewalk. "Terry drinking again? you don't mean it! I must go to him at once," he exclaimed.

"Don't you go near, pastor, for you can do no good at present. 'E's not 'imself at all. There's two men with 'im now, and 'e's taking on dreadful. We've been 'olding on to 'im and watching all these weeks, but 'e's quite a politician, is John, and the boss flattered 'im up to wear a suit and march last night, so when Voigt opened 'is saloon poor John went in, and once started 'e drank 'eavily."

"I saw the procession halting before the saloon; and Brother Matthews, I bade the old party good-bye, then and there."

It was now Mr. Matthews' turn to stop and face his pastor with a curious expression of surprise and doubt. He also removed his hat, as he said: "May I 'ope you'll come into the party that fights the saloon?"

"I think you may," replied the minister with a smile. "I'm not a man to stand on the fence a great while. I have been under conviction for months, reading and studying somewhat so I feel like any new convert, quite ready to work."

"Thank the Lord! thank the Lord!" ejaculated Mr. Matthews, devoutly. "I've been praying for this very thing since you preached that great sermon. May you be the h'instrument of much good in the 'ands of the Lord."

Their ways separated at the street corner and as Mr. Douglas walked homeward his mind ran out with a kind of indignant pity toward poor Terry. The man had been doing wonderfully well since his conversion. His face had bleached to its natural color, his slouching gait had become a brisk walk, and his entire physical being was rejuvenated. His home had shared in the pleasant reform, and his wife—a capable, ambitious woman—had changed her church relations for his sake, and with their two bright little girls accompanied him to every Sabbath service. Even the most skeptical had been forced to admit that "thus far he had run well." But now!—It is not strange that the minister clenched his hands involuntarily and cried out: "How long! Oh, Lord, how long!"

Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my Redeemer.—Ps. 19: 14.

OUR BILL OF FARE

is more homelike this week, after the World's banquet presented in our last issue. It is needless to enumerate all the points of excellence, and we will simply occupy space enough to introduce a new contributor, Dr. Amos R. Wells, managing editor of The Golden Rule, whose article, "Masters of the Mail," will find a ready response in the minds of many weary pen men and women. The children will be delighted to find a new and helpful friend in "Uncle John," and the brave workers on the wide "Field" will be pleased to see that the News department has extended its boundaries to admit the great pressure of valuable reports.

THE COMING CIVILIZATION.

It may be treason, but we believe the day is near when every human being will be born to an inheritance of board, clothes and shelter. Just now human beings, whether living or dead, are the cheapest things on earth. They stand round by millions and no man hires them. When one dies, if it be in the slums or the poorhouse, he is of far less value than a cab horse, out of whose "remains" one can make glue, phosphates, knife handles, combs, and a variety of useful objects; but when a human creature dies he is carted off to the potter's field, and the only good the world gets out of him is that in the course of time he must, in the nature of the case, become to some extent a fertilizer of the soil, though on the other hand he may become a danger to the health or lives of those who remain. No more damning commentary could possibly be made on the present order of things than the simple statement we have just penned. That it could ever be so is as unnatural as for a pyramid to stand upon its apex. First of all, the life and wellbeing of man should have been the central purpose of society and law. It will doubtless be claimed that this is true, but the consequences prove the contrary. Possibly in the evolution of the world, for the hardness of men's hearts, things had to be as they have been, but happily every evil tends toward its own cure. It becomes so outrageously and flagrantly unendurable that a revolution turns it out of doors. Men will not endure it longer. They make a football of some special evil and kick it into atoms. They are now engaged in this process to a degree, and fortunately they can, for their own best interests, administer their kicks most effectively through the ballot-box. Whenever they try dynamite they only hurt themselves, so that evil tends to its own cure. The greatest number's greatest good is the only object of being that is conformable to reason. Hence, it is absolutely certain to survive. It will not be a hundred years, very likely it will not be fifty, until in every civilized land every human being born will be born to an assured inheritance, as we have said, of board, clothes and shelter, and, we will add, of education for hand, head and heart. No end of symptoms indicate this. They are far too many to mention. We will cite a couple that have come under our observation within a week, and, let it be understood, we are not "running amuck" against capital, for we find that men of wealth are earnestly and kindly studying the problem, for which they are no more responsible than others, but it has been forced on their, and our, attention by the enormous development of commerce in our nation since the civil war. The largest flour mills in the world, located in Minneapolis, Minn., share their profits with their employés. We wrote the management and received a most interesting reply, which we insert:

"The system of profit sharing as adopted by this company is very simple. After paying the fixed charges on the investment, if any profits are left a certain percentage is set aside to be divided among those of the employés who have been in the employ of the company at least two years. This percentage is divided pro rata according to amount of the salary of each employé—that is, as the same may bear to the whole. The amount of this percentage has never been given out, but I can say that if the company has a good year it makes a very liberal and satisfactory increase in the pay of the employés. This system has always been very satisfactory to the employés, and when the company fails to make profit enough to reach the point where a dividend would accrue, there is never any fault-finding or discontent whatever. From the company's standpoint we would say that the system is looked upon very favorably, the effect being to make the employés more contented, and removing to a very great extent liabilities of strikes. It is also considered as causing a greater care on part of the employés in the handling of the company's property. An important point is that the employés, especially in the responsible positions, remain with the company for a much longer term, and thus the company has the benefit of their training and experience, removing thus the chances of loss liable to occur by taking on new and inexperienced men. In short there are no criticisms made on either side."

There is a whole gospel of deliverance in this letter from a "bloated capitalist," bloated with a beautiful, expansive desire and purpose to bless his fellow men at the same time that he blesses himself, which is really a wise, economic act on his part, for thus, as that great heart of Coleridge said, he is "twice blest."

Another straw is the announcement that one of the brightest and most influential among our railroad magnates urges profit-sharing as one of the ways out of the present difficulties. Of course, this is on the same principle as that set forth by the mill company. It makes the employé an integral part of the business, according to his power, as truly as is the employer. It gives stability and solidity to the greatest business enterprise as yet evolved in the republic. It makes good feeling between capital and labor, and looks toward that better time when solidarity shall be not only the watchword, but the work accomplished in every nation under the sun through universal suffrage for men and women, combination, coöperation, arbitration, the great glowing watchword of that truly Christian civilization that the world has not seen and yet in which it begins to believe. We have not seen this great hope better stated than in the language of the celebrated American historian, Prof. John Clark Ridpath, whom in conclusion we will quote:

"Let me say that the coöperative system of industry is demonstrably successful. I cite the whole world to the greatest and most successful flour manufactory in the world. Persuade the employers, if you can; persuade their coöperatives, if you can, to go back to the industrial system which they have abandoned. They will not do it. Ex uno disce omne—out of one instance learn the possibility of everything. If the laborer is to come up it is by this road. If any industry be so vast and varied that coöperation is not applicable thereto, then the industry is too vast and varied for either private or corporate management. It belongs to society as a whole, to the government, if you will, to be managed in the interest of all. I repeat that, according to my judgment, the new era is at the door, and that the wage system of labor, inherently vicious as it is, must give way to some form of coöperation more generous and ennobling. There is in this world one thing to be considered, and that is the people. There is one kind of interest and right to be consulted, and that is the interest and right of the masses. There is one kind of monarchy to be established throughout the earth, and that is the monarchy of man."

THE DISCOVERY OF YOUNG FOLKS.

The history of a few hundred years from now will read: "In the nineteenth century, and well toward the close thereof, young folks were discovered by their elders." Not that people did not, indefinitely B. C., discover the youngsters as impedimenta, hostages to fortune, tickets in the lottery of life, quite useless till the drawing day; but the world has waited these ages to learn the power of organized youth. Heretofore, while all other forces of civilization have been massed into compact tools, the tremendous and joyous power of young enthusiasm has been left at large, scattered in primitive uselessness. Hardly otherwise, we thought, could we preserve the freedom of youth, its gay and fresh activity. But now we know better. We know that service is not slavery, nor coöperation imprisonment. Youthful vigor and lightness of heart become all the more vigorous and buoyant under the proud consciousness that they are of use in the big world. God never made anything that was better for idleness.

And so there have arisen within the last decade a number of exceedingly powerful and marvelous organizations of young people. There are the beautiful bands of Y's. There are the stalwart hosts of the Y. M. C. A., with their noble sisters of the Y. W. C. A. There are those sweet, still Samaritans, the King's Daughters, with their brothers, the King's Sons. There are the vigorous Boys' Brigades. There are Lend a Hand clubs and Lookout Legions and Ten Times One clubs and Loyal Temperance Legions. There is the earnest Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip. There is the Students' Volunteer Movement, with its six thousand young missionaries of the next decade. There are denominational young people's societies, like the great Epworth League and the Baptist Young People's Union, with their hundreds of thousands of members. And there is the greatest army of them all, the founder of many of them, the fresh inspiration of every one of them, that army, one million, four hundred thousand strong, the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor.

To this last especially is due our nineteenth century discovery of the young. Before its rise the capacity of young people for organized effort on a large scale was scarcely guessed, now, no one doubts it. At the great New York Christian Endeavor Convention, Dr. Philip Schaff, our most eminent church historian and religious scholar, said that the introduction of the young into the wide activities of the churches through the Christian Endeavor movement marked the beginning of a new era in church history. Those who looked into the faces of those thirty-five thousand young Christians believed the words of the venerable scholar. And a new era in church history means a new era in secular history as well.

The young are the great discoverers. Every generation they discover the universe anew. And so the discovery of the young means the discovery, through them, of many things beside. What are some of these things already discovered by the Christian Endeavor movement?

In the first place, it has settled, so far as its influence has extended, and that is very far, the vastly important question of the solidarity of Protestant Christendom. Thirty evangelical denominations are warmly engaged in this Christian Endeavor work. In the conventions where these young people and their pastors meet for consultation and fresh inspiration—conventions unparalleled heretofore by secular or religious assemblies, either in numbers or enthusiasm—in these great meetings so diversely constituted is never a clash of creed, or selfish, sectarian squabbling. These young people and their pastoral leaders and sympathizers are seeking the weightier matters of the law, and finding therein harmony and brotherly goodwill. With unsurpassed loyalty to their own denominations these young people have learned to combine zeal for the cause universal and love for all Christ's children, have become e pluribus unum, for Christ and His church, thus happily solving the problem of church union. That is their first discovery.

The second discovery of the Christian Endeavor movement is that of the power of pledges. Young folks delight in definite doing. Tell them to be good, and they sulk. Bid them be good in a certain way and they are radiant. These young people promise to read the Bible every day, to pray daily, to do definite work in their prayer-meetings and for their church. They are agreeing by the thousand to give two cents each week for missions. They are now attempting by the thousand to master ten books on missions during the year. They have promised, by the hundred thousand, with uplifted hand, to try to bring one soul to Christ each year,—a vow which last year brought from these societies some one hundred and twenty thousand souls into the Kingdom. The strategy of attacking duty in detail, the power of specific pledges—that is the second discovery of these young people.

The third discovery of the Christian Endeavor movement is the value of the committee in religious work. Its motto is, "All at it and always at it." It believes in division of labor. There has never existed a better organized body of Christians than a model society of Christian Endeavor. It has a full supply of officers, each with a definite duty. Every member is on a committee, with something of spiritual import committed to his charge. There is the prayer-meeting committee, the lookout committee, the missionary committee, the temperance committee, the social committee, the music committee, the flower committee, the executive committee, the calling committee, the good literature committee, the usher committee, the vestibule committee, the program committee, the evangelistic committee, the pastor's aid committee—halt! the list is endless. To faithful duty on his committee the young Endeavorer is pledged. He makes monthly reports, he keeps careful records, he believes in blanks and printer's ink. The mere enumeration of the novel and valuable forms of Christian activity that have been invented—discovered—by these busy committees would require many a column of THE UNION SIGNAL. Enough to say that the plan is a demonstrated, glorious success, and that the practical development of such a plan of definite, individual responsibility for definite, special lines of work is a third triumph of these young discoverers.

Much, very much more has been done, and the Christian Endeavor movement is yet in its infancy. If the young people in this new relationship are like a newfound world to the older people of this Columbian decade, so to the young folks themselves a wide, fresh continent is opening out, and they are almost intoxicated with delight. God's blessing on His young men and young women! God's leading guide their progress, and His blessed Spirit dwell in their hearts!

"LIQUOR" AND "STRIKES."

We have been slow and cautious in speaking of strikes as related to the drinking habits of workingmen. It is so easy to do injustice by broad generalizations and sweeping conclusions from narrow premises. It is quite customary to say that if workingmen would let alcohol alone there would be no difficulty, and that drunkenness is characteristic of them as a class, and other wholesale statements of similar import. We have no admiration for such statements. They may be true, but even then we are in no haste to believe them. If we must accept the painful and disgraceful condition of things we do it reluctantly and because we must.

We noticed in the first reports of the Homestead troubles that the saloons were closed on the day of the conflict, but since then we have seen little reference to them. It is only within a few days we have come upon a narrative conveying definite information. It seems the New York Tribune sent a reporter to Homestead, who writes as follows, viz.: "There are saloons on, or near, almost every corner in Homestead, perhaps forty in all, and their owners are growing rich. One of the saloon-keepers wears diamonds, is regarded as a 'high roller' in one of Pittsburg's expensive sporting clubs and owns much property. He is a brawny fellow, and I asked him if he ever worked in the mills. 'Not I,' said he; 'why should I? I have over three thousand of Carnegie's men working for me.' His meaning was plain. The hard working men contributed from their earnings to this sporting gent's hoard every month of their lives."

To close these saloons for one day was but a trifling matter in itself. With forty men growing rich out of the employés of this one mill (granting that this statement is true), it is impossible to believe that cool and wise judgment could dominate action at Homestead. Knowing, as we do, the inevitable effects of alcohol, we can reach but one conclusion, that the proprietors were dealing with reckless, unreasonable men. So much alcohol means so much of a spirit of recklessness, insubordination, brutality and selfish disregard of all rights. It is in vain that our sympathy is asked for men whose families starve on from $1 to $12 per day wages, and forty saloons thriving and growing rich out of those wages.

For the "proprietors" of Homestead we have no apology to make. We do not believe that they do their duty by the men in their employ in a great many particulars. It is "glorious to have a giant's strength, but brutal to use it like a giant." They have great opportunities. They could banish the saloon from their premises. They could establish coöperative features, as many others have done, both in Europe and America. They could abate their pride sufficiently to submit to arbitration. Of course we understand they are fighting for their "rights." Every ambitious leader from Nimrod down has been claiming "rights." King George and his advisers had their "rights" clearly invaded by the "Rebels," under Washington. In the electric light of our times "rights" can be studied to better advantage and with results not hitherto suspected by many.

We see it stated in an exchange that at Spring Valley, to which the attention of the country was directed a few years ago and contributions made to the starving families, there were thirty six saloons, taking in an average of $10,000 each, or $360,000 a year.

Bearing on this question is the testimony of Mr. John Jarrett, ex-president of the Amalgamated Association. In reply to the inquiry, "Is it a fact that in a large number of cases the men receiving the largest wages save the least?" he says: "In my experience as a labor leader for many years, having given very close attention to the matter, I regret very much to say that, as a rule, I have always found that the men receiving the largest wages were those who saved the least . . . The drink habit is the curse of the iron and steel workers." We recall that the trouble at Homestead was with some seventy five of the best paid men, or, according to the above testimony, the best supporters of the saloons. The rest joined in the strike from sympathy.

How can we resist the conviction that it is the drink and not to any appreciable extent attacks on "rights" which is to be held responsible? Eliminate the saloon, put the money going to the saloon into home comforts or savings banks, and the demand for something, and the almost insane idea that it can be secured by brute force, will both pass away. The "something" is often a figment of the imagination, born of inflamed brains. If the money paid in five years to seventy-five of the best paid employés at Homestead instead of supporting the "high rollers'" club and diamonds had been saved to form the capital of a company consisting of these seventy-five workmen who could bring all the skill requisite for a first-class concern, they could buy Homestead in a short time. What hinders such coöperation? More than anything else the suspicion, perturbed temper and distorted judgment caused by drink.

We share Mr. Jarrett's regrets to be obliged, in the interests of truth and humanity, to call attention to this vast evil. All too prone are the political journals to ignore this topic, and even the religious papers are mortally afraid of being considered hobbyists. But if this sort of thing is to go on, if workingmen are to be the supporters of the saloons, we predict that the sympathy felt for workingmen will not exhibit a healthy growth. It is not in the nature of things that the enlightened judgment of mankind can be other than condemnation for the practice of spending money for poisoned drinks which unfit men for the proper exercise of their faculties.

The relations between employer and employé are sufficiently burdened with difficulty; the questions inherent in the contention are sufficiently perplexing to the clearest brains without interpolating this useless and disturbing element, this infernal "mocker" into the case.

HINTS FOR A GOOD CONVENTION.

Some conventions are works of art as well as of grace. Others are conspicuous for the lack of both. Some are thrown together with a pitchfork, so to speak. Others have as many strokes of daring delicacy as are displayed in an oil painting. What we want is one of the latter kind, and the experience of all these years ought to make us ashamed if we fail.

In the first place, there must be a method in our madness. Everybody's business is nobody's. The business of the committee is not as well carried out as when an individual is made responsible for a specific work.

In asking entertainment for the convention great tact should be used as to those who are sent into the homes, for they will do everything to make or break the reputation of the local union. A haphazard method never succeeds in any department of life. Heaven favors the brainy as well as the brave, therefore, be systematic first of all and tactful, but the trouble is tact is something you cannot buy at the store. The word carries with it its own definition, and it a contraction of contact. Persons who have enough delicacy of feeling to reach out the tentacles of their spirit, learn the moral and mental temperature of those with whom they come in actual contact and are therefore tactful. Put your most tactful woman at the head of your executive committee for the convention. Do not call her a "policy woman," and if she is one do not tolerate her. For tact and policy are quite unlike. Indeed, the word policy has fallen into bad associations. Political men have made it odious, but tact is the word we want.

In respect to the place of meeting. Don't let pride outrank all other considerations, as it is so likely to do. I mean a just pride in finding attractive surroundings for the convention, but first of all we should consider the roominess of the hall, for we wish to have as many people attend as possible. That is the main point. Next we should study the acoustic properties of the hall and then its adaptation to our discussions. We should go to no hall or church in which we are hampered as to our utterances. In 1884, when it was a question of securing an auditorium in St. Louis for the convention, and we were told that we could have very handsome churches if we would promise not to stir up matters politically, we replied asking if a tent could be secured and pitched in one of the parks, for we would not be hampered in the slightest degree. This action we commend to all unions at all times.

The next thing is to enlist the press. Send one of your wisest women to the editors, asking them to make the preliminary announcements, and put in sketches of those who are coming, making a statement of why we meet, how many conventions the same society has held, what work it has done, and what it proposes to do at the convention now being provided for. When the time comes every attention should be shown by the lady or the ladies appointed for the purpose, to the journalists, furnishing them with tables and comfortable chairs at the front, providing badges; if the delegates lunch together invite these gentlemen to be guests.

The ministers should be seen and enlisted by every wise utterance possible, and on the Sabbath before the convention a neat slip should be sent to each one, asking them to announce the dates, etc. And if they are not willing to do this let the slips be handed by young men selected for the purpose to each auditor as he leaves the church.

Brother voter, say at the polls what you said in the prayer meeting. Do as a Christian what you have done as a patriot. Register your vote against the great iniquity. Stand up and be counted. Protest in the presence of the enemy. He does not hear you at the prayer meeting or at the fireside altar. He does not heed your statement that you are just as good a temperance man as lives in your town, but he must both hear and heed when you speak out at the polls.

There are fifty-nine young colored women employed in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in Washington D. C.

Miss Kate A. Jackson, who took Miss Willard abroad in '68, and has been her lifelong friend, is furnishing a room in the Woman's Temperance Hospital, which she insists shall not be named for her but shall be called the Willard Room. That is just like Miss Jackson, who does no end of work for the W. C. T. U. in Evanston and the Anchorage in Chicago. Would there were more people after this order.

Miss West spent a day in Vancouver, British Columbia, before sailing August 31, in the Empress of Japan. Miss Bowes, president of the union, and many of the ladies, called on her and saw her off on the steamer. All expressed regret that she did not remain long enough for a public meeting. There are two unions and a Y in Vancouver, all doing good work. The Provincial union sustains a Rescue Home for white girls and a Refuge Home for Chinese girls. There are three juvenile temperance organizations in Vancouver, started by the W. C. T. U., but now in charge of different churches. Much good work is being accomplished in various lines.

Mrs. Mary B. Palmer, superintendent of scientific temperance instruction for Cape Colony, South Africa, writes cheeringly: "You will rejoice with all the white ribboners in South Africa that a small gain, not all that we wish, has been made this year at the teachers' conference. Last year, for the first time, we gained a hearing and I read a paper on 'Scientific temperance instruction in schools.' Though a discussion was not permitted, a committee was appointed to report this year. I was lately asked by that committee to frame the report. After presenting them several drafts, which were pronounced 'too strong,' or 'going too far,' at last, a very mild and temperate one met their approval and was presented by the committee to the association, which adopted it unanimously. We will thank God for this much, and pray and work for more next year."

A bright New Jersey woman praises the cleverness of Anna Gordon's poem concerning mosquitoes in The Union Signal for August 4, but adds regretfully: "I feel compelled to say that its personal pronouns are not correct, for alas! it is the female mosquito that bites and sings." It is hard to concede this, but I fear the pronoun must be changed throughout that poem if Miss Gordon cares to be in accord with the belief of New Jersey entomologists who think they know something about "skeeters." On Miss Gordon's behalf I will explain that, inasmuch as the personal pronoun "he" has been declared generic through many generations, and in almost every sermon we ever heard is the only one used, although it is plainly to be inferred that "she" is also meant, it doubtless occurred to our bright author of the "skeeter" poem that a turn about is fair play. Thus she made the ample mantle of the pronoun "he" cover the specific case which she was not enthusiastic to claim as belonging to that half of the human race which it is the special mission of The Union Signal to lift aloft on the point of pen and pencil to better altitudes.

A foreign missionary lady recently told me of a lady who, on a school teacher's salary of a thousand a year, lived on five hundred dollars and supported a substitute for five hundred dollars in China. She then felt that she was really two persons and carried out her lifelong devoted desire to be a foreign missionary. She received a letter every week from her substitute, prayed for her by name every day, and realized the truth of what a friend of hers had said, namely: "This school teacher serves the Lord twenty four hours a day, and thus practically lives the life of the angels who serve Him day and night, the Bible says, for at the antipodes her substitute missionary is working while she sleeps." The same lady told me of fifty working girls in a local branch of the Y. W. C. A. who had decided that they would have a substitute in foreign lands. Each took a collection card, each gave two cents a Sunday and got nine friends to do the same, when behold! they had five hundred dollars. We wonder what hinders bright, wide awake girls from doing something after this fashion for the W. C. T. U.? They could put a substitute into the world's work for five hundred dollars, or into the equally needy fields at home. William Carey said it was his business to serve the Lord and he cobbled shoes to pay the expenses. When we get to that pitch we shall have no trouble concerning the finances of the white ribbon movement.

On Duty.

[It has been necessary, in this issue, to considerably condense our state reports in order to "catch up." Many interesting local items are thus eliminated for which our readers will blame, not the state reporter, but our frequent special numbers of late and the consequent pressure of matter upon these pages. –ED.]

NEW YORK.

ABUNDANT BLESSINGS.

My first report this month comes from Onondaga county and gives a glowing account of the annual convention held in the historic town of Pompey. Mrs. Wiseman, first vice-president, presided, and two days were crowded full of earnest work, bringing "Results," "Methods," and "Good cheer." A large delegation was present, beside many visitors. The county has largely increased in membership. The convention was a decided success in every way, from the opening words of welcome to the closing benediction. Strong resolutions were passed, and a rising vote was taken on the suffrage question. Nearly every woman voted in favor and only one against equal suffrage. Syracuse union No. 2 won the prize banner, having trebled its membership during the year. Mrs. Leavitt was expected to address them the first evening, but failed to come, so the time was well taken up by the clergy and delegates, closing with exercises by the L. T. L. The second evening was devoted to a medal contest, interspersed with Silver Lake songs rendered by the Pompey Quartette.

The fifth annual meeting of Yates county was held at Benton Center. The reports of the corresponding secretary and treasurer were encouraging, and were followed by short reports of the department superintendents. Special mention is made of the interest manifested in mothers' meetings and social purity. Excellent papers were read and fine music rendered, while the president's address was replete with good suggestions, and was received with close attention. Mrs. Telford, of Denver, delivered an address at the evening meeting.

Fulton county met at Perth, where they were lovingly welcomed and bountifully entertained. The president, Mrs. Frances Bentley, opened the convention, and the first morning was filled with reports, showing that good work had been done during the year. Mrs. Jump, of Albany, was present, and gave a stirring address at the evening meeting, and assisted in various ways during the day, in answering questions, and in conducting a parliamentary drill. Several young people who had won silver medals on previous occasions, gave recitations, and a paper on "Influence" was read which was highly appreciated. The meeting was considered one of the best ever held. An invitation to meet at Gloversville next time was accepted.

Albany county held a most enthusiastic convention at Albany which occupied two days and two evenings, the second evening being for young people, who listened with pleasure to an address by Dr. Geo. E. Hite, of Albany, on the subject, "The Liquor Saloon, the Remorseless Enemy of our Young People." The address of the first evening was delivered by Rev. Dr. Ecob, of Albany, on "Temperance and Politics." The reports of the various superintendents were heard. A great deal of literature has been distributed, and the triple pledge has been thoroughly circulated in the Sunday-schools. Hundreds of children have signed it. Excellent papers were read; one on "Coffee Houses" created quite a discussion, and a plan was formed for a coffee house in Albany, $5,000 to be raised for it by the local unions. Twenty-nine unions and twenty-three departments of work were reported. Many of the city pastors were present and rendered valuable aid.

The fifteenth convention of Clinton county was held at Chazy. Forty delegates were in themselves an inspiration. The convention resulted in thirty-five new members being added to the Chazy union. Mrs. Frances D. Hall, the efficient county president, was in the chair. Many papers were read, one on "The License Question in Clinton County," showing how strong a hold the traffic has there. An excellent review of the Wine and Spirit Gazette was read, and proved a unique way of finding the true relation existing between the liquor traffic and politics. The cider question came in for a share of discussion. Young woman's work is being taken up with great interest. Mrs. Helen L. Bullock, state superintendent of schools of method, gave a strong and telling address in the evening, giving some points and figures on Kansas, showing that prohibition does prohibit there.

Essex county followed Clinton in an interesting convention held at Bloomingdale. Work is advancing along all lines and the county is in a healthy and prosperous condition. The L. T. L., in song and recitation, did excellent service, and the papers and discussions during the meeting added to the general instruction.

Chenango county met in the M. E. church at New Berlin this summer. After the devotional exercises the convention was called to order, and the regular routine work taken up and carried out to the satisfaction of all present, interspersed with recitations and music, including an original poem by Miss Aggie Bristol. Mrs. Mary J. Weaver, state superintendent of evangelistic work, gave a grand address in the evening, and on the following day a plain talk on the existing social evils of the day, causing many to see, as never before, the need of work along the line of social purity. The old officers were all reëlected, and the convention adjourned with most happy memories of the hearts and homes of New Berlin.

Chemung county has done grand work during the year. It has spent $3,000 in gospel temperance work, including the services of Mr. Burdick in Elmira, which resulted in a strong temperance league meeting weekly at W. C. T. U. headquarters, and the Silver Lake Quartette, which was in the county a month, Horseheads holding them a week, at a cost of $200. The work created temperance sentiment among the best people. Mrs. M. M. Allen, of Bellona, was also an acceptable speaker. The new union now numbers twenty-five members. A number of temperance class meetings have been held by the county president, resulting greatly in renewing the unions and increasing the membership. Millport union is preparing to open headquarters, Wellsburg, a coffee house, and Horseheads, a public drinking fountain. The Congregational church to be built in the Ninth ward will have a "W. C. T. U. Room" directly off the auditorium, with folding doors between. Pine Valley has closed a cider saloon by petition work, and so the work goes on.

A school of methods has been conducted by the Oneida county W. C. T. U. Acting with a general committee of county temperance workers, the W. C. T. U. has carried on a summer campaign in a series of picnics, in the hope of presenting the cause through music and addresses to many whom it would be difficult to reach otherwise.

In Buffalo, Erie county, a good work is going on. Some time ago a large number of the brethren of Grace M. E. church organized for rescue and mission work. They found themselves at once face to face with the drink evil, and felt obliged to battle with that one thing until they have become a genuine and powerful temperance organization of more than one hundred members. Their experience has taught them that the only solution of the question is the total prohibition of the traffic by legal enactments, and they are very free to express their convictions on all occasions. Recently a woman's auxiliary has been formed, and the two branches number over two hundred. The pastor of the church gives his most cordial support, and the lecture room has been filled on every Thursday evening for months past, men and women taking charge alternately. During the past six months they have secured one thousand signatures to the triple pledge among the children.

Five new unions have lately been organized in Lewis county and five in Tompkins county. God is blessing us abundantly, and to Him we give praise and thanksgiving.

State Reporter, Lockport.

INDIANA NOTES.

The Hoosier State has not taken a vacation during the summer's heat; picnics, grove and basket meetings have been the order of the day. The state is ablaze with enthusiasm and the soil is fairly honeycombed by prohibition. I am glad our leaders recognize the necessity for concentration of forces in Indiana. There is widespread discontent in Republican camps and apathy in the Democratic, while the "People's,"—and I say it in kindness—offers no solution of the vexed problems before the country.

When shall we sufficiently appreciate the great unselfishness of Mary Balch? When she has gone home to heaven. The Frances Willard union is determined that her name shall adorn the walls of our Mecca, the Temple. In this we shall have the loving coöperation of all white-ribboners of the state. Island Park Assembly school of methods at Rome City, and Spring Fountain Park assembly school at Warsaw, honored themselves and the cause by securing the services of our state president for their work. Mrs. Nichols is a leader who moves at the head of her women, and our hearts are rejoicing in the fact. Whither she leads us we will follow. The coal miners are organizing into Prohibition clubs in a number of places. Rosedale, Roseville, Coxeville, and Fontanet have flourishing clubs, which greatly rejoices the writer, for she knows men are in earnest when they plant the dynamite of a white ballot under their enemy, the saloon. Then, too, it is a great reward, better than gold or jewels to know that the sturdy sons of toil are rewarding honest effort at the ballot-box where it counts. Give me one hundred dollars and I will set a sturdy coal digger to work among his fellows for fifty days, and the result in Indiana will be a largely increased vote among the coal miners.

Mrs. Trish's visit to the mining people resulted in much good. She will begin work again after the state convention. Your correspondent had a trip to Greene county. Mrs. Hoffman spoke for the Central union, at the Centenary church of this city. The Terre Haute Y gave a social for the bichloride patients and their families. The West Side union is conducting a mission meeting near the river in the city. The Frances Willard union hopes soon to open up a nightly gospel meeting at their rooms.

Vigo county union is expecting a grand meeting at the Frances Willard Hall in September. Gov. Aaron Worth, or perhaps it is better to say, Dr. Aaron Worth, prohibition candidate for governor, spoke in Terre Haute. He was accompanied by the Merom Quartette, who sing well.

The Organizer is now publishing the minutes of the first state W. C. T. U. convention ever held in Indiana. Greensburg Y reports their numbers increasing. The Dickson Y of Xenia report earnest work done. Colfax union, organized by Mrs. Balch, in May, seem determined to persevere. Plymouth union gave their twelfth Demorest contest. At a musicale recently held they netted fifty-five dollars for their work. Mr. Simmons gave them one hundred and fifty dollars to complete their fountain fund. The U. B. church has been opened for their public meetings. Miss Farley lately visited Millgrove union and L. T. L. Seventeen women of the Shelbyville union recently pledged themselves to earn one dollar each for their union. They did so, and held a meeting to relate their experiences. The W. C. T. U., of Mitchell, had a pretty, homelike booth on the picnic grounds at the celebration of the Fourth. Twenty-five signed the pledge. The Y's served dinner, free to all persons over seventy years of age on the grounds. They had about fifty guests. Mrs. Nichols addressed the people at Eaton at the celebration given by that union. This was a red-letter day for them.

Dr. Tracy, temperance evangelist, with his quartette and tent, has lately visited Union City. Mrs. Nichols spoke for them recently. This union supports a temperance Sunday-school. A carnival held by them furnished the necessary funds. Hamilton and Dubois counties have recently held good conventions. Miss Farley has lately organized a union at Moorefield, in Switzerland. The Broad Ripple L. T. L. had a Fourth of July picnic. Rev. Baird addressed them. The games and plays were followed by a surprise treat of ice cream and cake. This band gave an entertainment the sixteenth. Wabash L. T. L. county union gave a picnic the eighteenth. One hundred children were in line and a grand time was had. Grant county L. T. L. convention, the third held recently, proves the children very enthusiastic. There were present five companies, one hundred and seventeen members, five superintendents and eight teachers, with Mrs. Straw, state superintendent.

Rosedale and Bicknell write of work accomplished. Mrs. Field has been doing heroic work in the southern part of the state. Our state convention will be held at Marion from October 7 to 11 inclusive. We are glad to note increased contributions to the Temple fund from Indiana. May they grow and grow. By being generous to the National and World's work we shall have all the more for our home enterprise, the Hadley Industrial Home. We shall soon see the corner-stone of this structure laid, and then it will be rapidly pushed to completion.

NEW JERSEY.

SUMMER NOTES.

Situated as we are between two large cities, with a long stretch of seaboard upon the east and the grand old mountains upon the north, our base of supplies must necessarily change, as the thermometer creeps up in the nineties, even though the saloon door keeps ever swinging both ways.

The summer meetings at our various seaside and mountain resorts are most carefully planned to arouse the people to thinking if they are indifferent, to educate them if ignorant, to strike a nail for prohibition whenever opportunity offers. 'Tis true, sometimes the nail strikes a snag and fails to penetrate the gnarled wood of prejudice, but whether it hits or not we keep right on, leaving results to Him who has bidden us "Go forward."

Atlantic City has been termed, "Babel let loose," yet every Sabbath, right amid the carousal of the baser sort in the rink by the sea, our women conduct a temperance meeting, which is largely attended. Ocean City (situated on an island seven miles long, with no liquor sold within its territory) is a strong base of supplies—as was illustrated during this summer's meeting. Saturday and Sunday of the opening of camp was given to temperance. The Rev. L. G. Jorden spoke Saturday evening, and also took the place of Mrs. Burt, the president of New York, Sabbath morning. Mrs. Horner, president of Camden county, held the vast audience as if she were inspired at the six o'clock surf meeting, and with Mrs. Sparks, of Gloucester county, conducted the evening service.

Seaville camp, still farther down the coast, had a largely attended and most successful meeting last month.

The National Temperance Society held its usual five days' meeting at Ocean Grove, with its grand array of talent, both oratorical and musical. The Silver Lake Quartette draw everywhere, and the Gro vemost highly appreciates their telling points in song. On the last Sabbath of this meeting, Dr. Cuyler preached in the morning and Col. Bain in the evening to an audience of over 6,000.

Vineland is in the throes of anguish, because the county excise commission is trying to encroach on their territory, and because some of their prominent citizens, yea even among them a minister, are afraid to be aggressive but advise caution.

Paterson city council have given a hearing to the W. C. T. U., who, through their president, presented a petition signed by eight hundred persons living near the West Side Park, against the granting of license within one thousand five hundred feet of the park. Although the motion was lost, this receiving of the W. C. T. U. by the "city fathers," and allowing them the privilege of the floor, is in marked contrast with the situation at Trenton, where the baser sort congregated and successfully blocked the passageway to the council chamber, to "prevent the better element from getting in to present their protests." "No officer could be found who could disperse the crowd." Give us good laws, then officials who are in sympathy with the law and all the riff-raff in the city cannot hold the situation long.

However, we are not all given over to lawlessness. Hudson county has a judge who has dared to send "ballot-box stuffers," to the number of fifty, to the penitentiary notwithstanding intimidations and threats of his position and life. The Prohibitionists of Mercer have at last dared to be bold, and have now headquarters in the very heart of the city, and their banner has been flung out right across the street from the county Democracy. The state convention, held not long ago in Trenton, was full of enthusiasm, and judging from its respectability and numbers, deserving of success.

IOWA.

A THREE MONTHS' REVIEW.

The meetings of the clans in district and county conventions have been full of interest and enthusiasm. The third district convention was held in Hopkinton and was favored with the inspiring presence of our round-the-world missionary, Mrs. Leavitt, who gave addresses on "Woman in Different Countries," and "The Drink Traffic around the World." Among the resolutions adopted was one regretting the "silence of the Republican state convention on the question of prohibition, declaring such silence to be significant and deplorable in the present critical condition of temperance affairs in Iowa." Mrs. R. L. Wallace, the devoted district president, felt compelled to resign her office on account of its rapidly increasing requirements and her inability to discharge the duties in connection with other pressing work. But her mantle has fallen upon able and willing shoulders. Mrs. Alice Lawrey was elected president, and Miss Cecelia Probert, secretary.

Every county was represented at the fifth district convention at Marion. The Presbyterian church was handsomely decorated for the occasion with flowers, flags and banners. In the absence of the president, Miss E. J. Hyndman, of Cornell College, Miss Jennie Fitch read her address. Reports were given by the county presidents. Prof. Charles A. Cummings, who has recently visited France, gave an address on "The Drink Habit in France." Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt gave two grand addresses. Mrs. L. D. Carhart spoke for the scarf fund. A strong suffrage sentiment was manifested. The following officers were reëlected: President, Miss Eliza J. Hyndman; secretary, Miss Jennie Fitch, both of Mt. Vernon.

The first district convention was held at Washington in the Baptist church. Beautiful decorations abounded. The roll-call of officers and superintendents showed double the attendance of last year. Excellent reports were given and several fine papers were read. An experience meeting on the subject of "How I was led into the W. C. T. U." was of deep interest. Our state president addressed the convention on one evening; a lively gold medal contest was held the second evening. Mrs. C. D. Trumbull was reëlected president.

The eighth district convention was held in Creston. Owing to the enforced absence of the district president, Mrs. A. M. Warren, on account of illness, the meeting was called to order by Mrs. R. A. McClanahan. Reports of vice-presidents and district secretary showed the work to be in a prosperous condition, membership increasing, and public sentiment growing in our favor. A gold medal contest filled one evening. Mrs. Dunham spoke on "National Prohibition," on the second evening. The following officers were elected: Mrs. R. A. McClanahan, Corydon, president; Miss Hittie Lancaster, Corydon, secretary.

The eleventh district convention was held in Sioux City in the First M. E. church, made doubly sacred by memories of its martyred pastor, Rev. Geo. E. Haddock. Miss Clara A. Stephens, of Des Moines, was in attendance, in the interests of the W. T. P. A., THE UNION SIGNAL and The Iowa Signal. Several pulpits were occupied on the Sabbath by W. C. T. U. women. A gold medal contest was held, and a Y union, with eleven members, was organized. Mrs. Dunham gave an address on "The Reasons Why." Nine new W's and two Y's were reported, making this the banner district in increase of unions. Sioux City and Leeds unions presented the purse of twenty dollars to the convention. Faithful Mrs. Joanna B. Shesler was reëlected president. She has served as district president without any intermission since 1884.

Linn county held its annual meeting at Cedar Rapids, with a force of capable county workers, among whom was Mrs. L. D. Carhart, one of our ex-state presidents. Nearly every union in the county was represented by delegates. Mrs. Dunham gave a model address. Mrs. Anna M. Palmer has been holding evangelistic meetings in Oelwein, where she organized a union with twenty-three members. Mrs. Palmer has now a fine helper in the person of her niece, Miss Anna Miller, of Des Moines, who accompanies her as gospel singer. Calls have been so strong and earnest that Mrs. Palmer has decided to devote two months to Iowa work. Our state president and evangelist will make some campaign speeches during the fall. For terms and dates address Isaac T. Gibson, 215 Chestnut Street, Des Moines.

Our state president has recently organized four new unions in the fourth district, as follows: At St. Ansgar, McIntire, Brownsville and Rockwell. Our state convention will be held in Burlington, October 4–8.

NORTH DAKOTA.

SUMMER COUNTY CONVENTIONS.

The season of county conventions opened with good news from Walsh county when eleven delegates assembled at Ardoch and five unions reported. The state president, Miss Kinnear, lectured on the workings of prohibition in North Dakota and also spoke in the Presbyterian church the Sunday evening following. Everybody went home strengthened and enthused for the work.

Less than four years ago Mrs. L. M. Wylie, county president, organized Hamilton county with twelve members. It now has in convention forty delegates, and she exclaims, "Behold what God hath wrought!" The state president was there, also Miss Preston. The Temple, the Temperance Hospital and the North Dakota home at Fargo were all indorsed as worthy of aid. Excellent papers were read and discussed. Miss Kinnear organized a Y which has grown greatly since. This makes eight W's and four Y's in the county. Drayton, the banner Y, has thirty active and fifty-five honorary members, triple pledged. Petitions have been circulated on Sunday closing and exclusion of liquor at the Columbian Exposition. This petition, three yards long, was sent to Congress.

Cass county held its fourth annual convention at Casselton. Mrs. Hoffman, of Missouri, was there, and stirred us up to such enthusiasm that we were ready to make the world over entirely instead of patching it up a little. Excellent papers were read on purity by Mrs. Chaffee, on suffrage by Miss Goodrich, followed by animated discussion. Hopeful and gratifying reports were heard from the nineteen unions, three Y's and four L. T. L's. There were some finely rendered recitations by the members of the L. T. L. The state president added grace to the occasion. All the old officers were reëlected by acclamation.

In La Moure county, Miss Sanderson in the chair and Miss Struble at the secretary's desk, aided by the state president, opened the third annual convention. The county secretary's interesting report showed growth during the year, and the finances to be in excellent condition. Eleven superintendents in as many lines of work were appointed. At the evening session a poem, written for the occasion by Mrs. Mary Temple, was read, and the state president gave an address. Rev. Boyd, of the Presbyterian church, assisted in all the exercises.

August was ushered in by the fifth annual convention of Grand Forks county. At Larimore thirty-one delegates assembled. County president Mrs. Caswell, of Grand Forks, called the convention to order, and work began at once. Mrs. Kenney, of Larimore, gave the address of welcome, which was responded to by the state president. The second day opened with the president's address, followed by a paper on Social Purity, by Mrs. Van Wormer, superintendent of that department in the state work. Mrs. Stevens, of Northwood, read a paper on suffrage. Eleven superintendents were appointed. A touching memorial service was conducted by the state president for the sisters who have been during the past year elected to heavenly offices.

Every county thus far heard from has indorsed resolutions favoring equal suffrage, enforcement of law, Sunday closing of the Exposition, besides the usual ones. Surely with such a praying, resolute band backed by men as good and true, and not a few, the unprincipled politicians and scum cannot, will not dare, repeal our constitutional law.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

The Wahpeton union which numbers sixteen, has a public meeting once in three months, with lectures by Miss Preston, and by our faithful helper, I. M. Adams. Would that more traveling men, they who have such fine opportunity to reach the people, had temperance, purity and suffrage at heart.

The Richland County Enforcement League look after the "blind pig" and the women earn their mite and turn it over to them to help. Several keepers of "pigs" acquired an appetite for obeying the law while boarding at the county jail, and now they keep one eye partly open for Enforcement Leaguers.

The Sanborn W's are ever on the skirmish line for cash, and use it wisely for the cause of humanity.

Durbin union reports victory over the "whiskyites."

Grafton had a rare treat and an uplift in work, through Mrs. Hoffman, of the National W. C. T. U., who lectured on suffrage and purity to very large audiences.

Walsh county has three new large unions since convention, due to the efforts of the state president.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

"PROHIBITION DOES PROHIBIT."

Eleven white-ribbon women of Hill City, the metropolis of the Black Hills tin mines, are holding aloft the white banner of the W. C. T. U. One of their successes is a public meeting "which surprised themselves"—and it takes a good deal to surprise a woman who is devoted to consecrated effort. Their house was prettily adorned with flags, plants, evergreens, and wild roses. There was such a throng that many could not get into the church, but went away.

Two pastors added their manly notes to the sweet treble of the meeting; an essay, a reading, several recitations and music were presided over by a president just past her sixtieth year, whose comprehensive explanation of our work and aims interested all.

Social purity is not a popular theme in the Black Hills (is it anywhere?) yet Miss Ross gave an essay that pleased all, handling the topic delicately. Miss Shephard's reading also elicited pleasant comment. Hill City has an L. T. L. of forty-eight members. Three wall pockets are supplied with literature there.

The state Republican convention met under most favorable auspices this year, if it is true (and it is true) that environments mould sentiment. The convention occupied the Chautauqua auditorium the day after W. C. T. U. day; above the manly multitude beamed Miss Willard's fine portrait from the front center of the rostrum. Everywhere were the mottoes and emblems of the W. C. T. U. The first speech was made by a distinguished prohibition lawyer, A. B. Melville, whose keen logic assisted in preparing our matchless prohibitory law. It was a contest case between two rival delegations; there were warm feelings and conflicting accusations. The orator pointed to the motto above his head, "For God and Home and Native Land," and said, "That motto expresses the interests for which I am pleading, and as I believe in those interests so do I believe my clients are in the right." There was conviction in his words, every eye went to the motto as his words appealed to their judgment.

Another orator, in making a nominating speech, pointed to our motto :

"Under God the people rule.
Women are people."

And said, "Up there they have put that motto. I believe my candidate will rule justly, that he is in accord with the people, that he believes the people should rule." But they have put in the motto that "women are people." This seemed to be a poser to the politician and he changed the subject, but all eyes were lifted to the motto and we trust that it will be one of the memory photographs which those six hundred delegates will carry with them until the justice of our claim "soaks in" to their very souls. We were well satisfied that the plan to leave our decorations for the convention had been agreed to by the management.

Seven representative W. C. T. U. women visited the resolutions committee and presented a resolution asking the "endorsement of prohibition and its enforcement." We were received kindly but no allusion was made to our subject in the report of the committee. Mrs. R. J. Smart made an earnest, graceful speech in presenting the resolution. The delegates learned that the women were coming in with "some temperance palaver," as one of them styled it, and none of the one hundred delegates which the women happened to interview would tell us where the resolution committee were in session; except for the aid of a temperance candidate for Congress we should not have found out their rendezvous. Not so are the voters treated when they desire to call attention to a grievous wrong against the people.

W. C. T. U. day at the Madison Chautauqua was a pleasant occasion. The exercises were entirely by women until the last hour, in which about a dozen prominent clergymen and politicians made brief, forceful addresses. Elizabeth U. Yates lectured in her logical, charming manner. State president, Mrs. Cramner, gave her comprehensive lecture upon the "Woman Question." There were short speeches by Mesdames Johnson, Hassell, Simmons; recitations by little girls; an original poem by Mrs. Adams, entitled "The Modern Hagar;" solos, by the noted Swedish singer, Mrs. Behrens; Scripture reading and devotional exercises by many of our state workers. Mrs. Woodward, of Nebraska, conducted a school of methods during two weeks of the assembly session.

Hyde county convention elected Mrs. Sarvis, president, and Mrs. L. E. Winans, corresponding secretary. Capt. Van Etten, "The Dakota Cyclone," called out an immense audience to hear his speech in the evening. The battle-cry of the convention was Miss Pugh's words: "Leave the saloons and move onward to the legislatures." The following papers were enjoyed: "Resubmission," by Mrs. Foster, and "Enforcement of the Law," by Mrs. Sarvis. Judge Van Camp discussed the enforcement of the law for the instruction of the women.

Ways and means of creating public sentiment for enforcement called out Mrs. Parker, Mrs. Hammer, Capt. Van Etten and others. The resolutions favored all lines of reform, including equal suffrage and the election of officials who will pledge their aid in the enforcement of the prohibitory law and not to favor resubmission. The convention pledged its influence toward the defeat of any candidate favoring the repeal of our law. It was one of the most enthusiastic meetings of the season.

Day county annual convention was characterized by the intense earnestness of every delegate. From the scholarly address of welcome by Mrs. Norris, to the last note of the doxology at the close of Mrs. Cramner's address in the evening, each woman seemed to have given her whole thought to the work. The reports of officers and superintendents showed that their thought had followed the lines through the whole year. The dry document which treasurers present annually for approval, was so embellished and festooned with gems of sentiment and loving testimony by Mrs. Herpel, county treasurer, that the women nearly lost sight of the financial aspect. Some of the women drove their own teams twenty miles to attend this convention. Mrs. Franc C. Dunton was elected president, and Miss Stella Haskell secretary. Mrs. Adams declined to accept the presidency again, having served in that office since the county was first organized. Resolutions passed favoring enforcement of all moral laws, equal suffrage, and indorsing the action of the Andover union in hunting up and bringing before the grand jury, where he was indicted, a railroad employé of their town, who sought the ruin, by strategy, of a young girl just arrived from Norway, without knowledge of our language, or friends; her muscular strength was her only safeguard against him. The men of Andover, moved by that sympathy which so often prompts men to ignore wickedness in each other, paid the young man's fine of $200 or a part of it, and are now subjects of criticism.

Satan has turned his horns upon his own, in Kimball. Some men got into a fight at a "blind piggery" there, the proprietor expelled them forcibly, which incensed them to expose the pen, and it was closed; the "pig" and his "litter" now declare that no other hog shall keep a pen in that town. Result: Prohibition DOES prohibit.

Mrs. Clare Williams, organizer for the sixth district, has added one hundred members by organizing locals at Hazel, Goodwin, Gary, Twin Brooks, Bradley, Castlewood and Revillo.

Mrs. Cramner and Mrs. Simmons are giving almost their entire time to public meetings in the state. Your reporter spoke at the mass-meeting at Webster, Sunday evening; unions have been reorganized at Lake, Preston and Frederick.

MASSACHUSETTS.

BY THE WILD WAVES.

Do you remember the Indian legend (immortalized in verse by our Maria Mitchell) of the mighty sachem who, in the far-away days, when wandering along our Massachusetts coast, took off his moccasins to rid them of the superfluous sand? Flinging their contents far out to sea, there immediately appeared the islands of Martha's Vineyard and Nantucket. Blessings on that sachem, cry all who have fled from life's busy rush into the ideal quiet and rest of those two dainty isles.

It was your reporter's privilege to visit Nantucket recently. We have long had a union there, numbering at the present time sixty-five members. It is doing excellent work, though necessarily limited almost entirely to the island. Nantucket is very progressive in its ideas, especially as regards woman's work, which fact must be largely due to the influence of its woman minister, Rev. Louise S. Baker. It was pleasant to be prayed for in the Sabbath service by a woman's voice. More pleasant still to call upon Miss Baker in her delightful home where, with Drs. Mann of Brooklyn, she continually proves how thoroughly homelike and dainty three professional women can make all their surroundings.

Our eyes have long been turned towards Edgartown with true W. C. T. U. greed, which was satisfied on Thursday, August 4, when a union of twenty-four members was organized. A public service was held in the evening, also, with an address on "The Temperance Chain." These meetings were but preliminary to the grand coup du guerre at Cottage City, August 5, 6 and 7. On the first afternoon busy hands decorated with flags and banners the platform in the grand tabernacle, and at 7:30 precisely, Mrs. Fessenden took her place there, flanked by her helpers, with Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt as honored guest and speaker of the evening. Earnest words of welcome were spoken by Dr. Morrison in behalf of the Cottage City Camp-meeting Association, with a brief response by Mrs. Stevenson.

Mrs. Leavitt spoke with great feeling upon the introduction of New England rum into Africa, and urged that the attitude of England and America towards this trade should be the same as toward slave ships.

On Saturday, August 6, Mrs. Rice gave an excellent address on best methods for juvenile work, also one of her own breezy talks to the children. Mrs. Purington followed with a very thoughtful paper on heredity. A question-box, talks on department work and county conventions, and an address by Mrs. S. A. McClees, National superintendent of work among soldiers and sailors, were followed by one of Mrs. Fessenden's delightful parliamentary drills.

In the evening Mrs. Harris' vesper service was rendered with great acceptation. Although you may not all have Mrs. Harris herself to lead the singing, yet this service can be made a delight anywhere. On this occasion the five-minute speeches were made by Mr. Harris, Dr. Webb, of Providence, Hon. Elijah Morse, Mrs. Stevenson and Mrs. Walker, the latter making the brightest kind of a collection speech.

Sunday morning Rev. W. T. Perrin, of South Boston, gave a truly admirable address on "Our Country's Open Door." We are sure his entire audience realized, as never before, what God expects of America. In the afternoon, Mrs. Walker, of Providence, one of our National evangelists, led a sweet and helpful evangelistic service, in which many others took part. In the evening Mrs. Stevenson preached from Ephesians 4:13, which service closed our three days' meeting. We are sure all who attended this year will hope for its repetition next. Mrs. Fessenden presided at each session, which is only another way of saying that all were conducted with grace and dignity. The officers of the association and the ministers present were both kind and helpful, and altogether we feel very well pleased with the summer meeting of 1892.

Unions have been organized at East Cummington, Plainfield and Byfield, the latter by Mrs. Fessenden, the two former by Miss Gordon. Each county in our state save Worcester, Norfolk and Nantucket, has formed at least one new union during the year; several have added two, three or four to their number.

Our superintendent in railroad work, Mrs. E. M. Allen, has been carrying on her work the past year under trying circumstances. Quite recently she addressed, by special request, a newly organized division of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. Massachusetts, by the way, is the first state in which these organizations have invited the W. C. T. U. superintendent to address their meetings.

There has been a scattering of our forces this summer; our leading workers are all away on vacation journeys. We are greatly rejoicing over the trip of Miss Willard and Anna Gordon to Eastnor Castle. We are praying that it may be a castle of delight and a place of perfect rest to both.

PREPARING FOR STATE CONVENTION.

Only one union, the East Nashville, sends in a report this month. They are very busy getting ready to entertain the state convention, which meets October 6, 7 and 8. But with all this they do not neglect their regular work. About fifty of the members met recently for an "experience" meeting; $17.50 were added to the treasury and a number of hearty laughs were enjoyed at the experience of the ladies who tried to earn dollars by nickels and dimes during the torrid weather.

Committees are arranging for good speakers at the state convention, hoping to have that knight of ours, Col. Geo. W. Bain, to "set the ball rolling" for them the night before convention opens with one of his rousing speeches. Mrs. Meriwether is in correspondence with other good speakers, and we hope to have a general good time.

MAINE.

SUMMER JOTTINGS.

The readers of THE UNION SIGNAL have doubtless all heard that "more liquor is drunk in Maine than in any other state in the Union." Of course such a statement sounds most foolish and random to those who know the facts in the case, and especially so to your correspondent whose home is in a manufacturing city of 12,000 inhabitants which contains not a single dram-shop, unless the city liquor agency should come under that name.

But an incident occurred a few weeks ago, soon after the great liquor seizures at the Maine Central station mentioned in my last letter, which may shed some light on this calumny. A gentleman says that while walking one evening on the shore of a frog-pond near the house of the deputy sheriff who had made most of the seizures, he noticed something peculiar in the appearance of the frogs. They could not sit erect on the logs, and even their attempts at croaking had a strange, unfroglike sound. At length it dawned upon their observer that this frog-pond was the receptacle of the confiscated ardent, and that the poor little froggies were actually tipsy! So, dear comrades in other states, when you hear this ridiculous argument advanced by those who oppose the legal prohibition of the liquor traffic, please explain that if more liquor is drunk in Maine than in any other state it is drunk by the frogs.

The white-ribboners of Augusta, Hallowell, and Gardiner have long felt that they ought to arrange temperance meetings at the Soldiers' Home, at Togus. There are about 1,700 old soldiers in this home from all parts of New England, and it was estimated a few years ago that 1,400 of them were practically drunkards. The home being the property of the national government, has not been affected by our state liquor laws, and Congress, though earnestly appealed to, has not seen fit to remedy this disgraceful state of things. At the first meeting held in the chapel, sixteen ladies were present, and at the close the pledge received a good number of signatures, and temperance literature was distributed. The chapel was well filled with the inmates of the home who seemed to be much interested in all the exercises.

All our county conventions have been successful. The Aroostook Democrat gives a particularly glowing account of the gathering of the clans in that county. The convention opened with a reception tendered the delegates and visitors by the Houlton union. The decorations of Music Hall were most beautiful and suggestive. Ninety-seven delegates representing twenty-one towns and a membership of 686 were present; the amount of money raised during the year was $1,398.12; nineteen departments were reported in charge of competent superintendents. Fraternal delegates were present from several towns in New Brunswick, as were also Mrs. Stevens, her daughter, Mrs. Leavitt, and Mrs. Gleason, of Boston. One pleasant episode was the presentation to the county of a banner representing the dove of peace over a globe belted with a white ribbon and partly surrounded by the words, "Christ for the World," and "The World for Christ."

Franklin county also rejoices in a beautiful new banner of blue silk, with silver trimmings, and bearing the outline of Mt. Blue.

Prison day was generally observed by our local unions, though in some cases the tardiness of the season and the scarcity of flowers necessitated the selection of a later date than Miss Casseday's birthday. The union at Westbrook recently offered a purse of ten dollars to be distributed among the three young ladies who should write the best essays on the use of narcotics. The little union at Corinna is in the midst of a series of Demorest medal contests, as a result of its president's attendance on the Boston convention.

Since our state convention last October fourteen new unions have been formed, and Mrs. Stevens has organizing engagements ahead of her all the time. It would be embarrassing, wouldn't it, if our modest president should be compelled to present that New England prize banner to herself again at Denver? But as we now have state headquarters of our own, we could in an emergency give it storage a third year!

TEXAS.

ACTIVELY AT WORK.

The long, hot summer months do not seem to have the power to quench the zeal of our white-ribboners. The sixty-four unions all over our state are actively at work. The state headquarters have been removed from Fort Worth to Dallas. Mrs. Stoddard has gone here and there during these trying days organizing, addressing meetings, securing subscribers for our state paper, talking to the L. T. L's, writing an encouraging letter here, sending needed literature there—a prodigious worker.

Mrs. Stoddard accompanied Mrs. Woodward, of Nebraska, to Waco and Fort Worth immediately after the state convention. Arrangements had been made for many meetings among the hundreds of girls who are employed in the factories, stores and offices, at this place. At Corpus Christian L. T. L. was organized with Miss Vira English as president.

San Antonia reports a new W. C. T. U. of thirty-one members. Prison work is reported by Mrs. M. L. Chaffin. Services are conducted in both Spanish and American and by colored people also. Prison and flower mission day were observed. Mrs. Elizabeth Fry presented the prisoners with a handsome scrap-book containing Scriptural texts and lovely pictures. They have opened a home for homeless women whom age has rendered incapable of caring for themselves, and for girls while out of employment, assisting them in finding homes, in which they have been most successful. The citizens generally coöperate with the W. C. T. U. in this enterprise.

Fort Worth observed prison and flower mission days with appropriate services. Mrs. B. R. Calhoun, our former state corresponding secretary, was appointed state superintendent of Temple work. She reports a Fourth of July all-day service held in a tent on what is called "Hell's Half Acre," in Fort Worth. The consecrated young men composing Bethel union, honorary members of the Central W. C. T. U., have planted the banner of our Lord right in the midst of the horrors of this much-talked-of "acre," and intend to remain there until winter's blasts drive them in. Six men who had once been under the power of rum gave testimonies. One man had been kept from drinking by this all-day meeting, whose wife had begged, "Please do not drink anything to-day." He signed the pledge and thanked God.

At Denison a body of influential temperance men, including the pastors of most of the churches, have banded together to secure a city ordinance in accordance with the state law to close the saloons on the Sabbath day, from twelve o'clock Saturday night to twelve o'clock Sunday night. Mrs. Dixon, editress of our White Ribbon, and Mrs. Knowles, business manager, with the consent and coöperation of our president and other white ribboners, are actively interested in establishing our state paper permanently at Dallas.

Mrs. Carrie Dodson, of Groveton, an educated colored woman, is state superintendent of colored work and has organized three L. T. L's and a union of nine colored women in Dallas. Six of the women are public school teachers. Sweetwater union is "busy and happy." They have given a Demorest silver medal contest.

Dublin W. C. T. U., assisted by friends, has given a pleasant and successful entertainment at the opera house consisting of songs, recitations and the "Milkmaids' Convention." Many men gave valuable help. One of them occupied a whole day in distributing dodgers announcing the event. Another ingeniously constructed a W. C. T. U. cow, whose appearance was both suggestive and amusing, if not an improvement on the genuine bovine. Houston W. C. T. U. has her water barrels connected with the city water works, so that there is no monthly expense attending them as heretofore. Your correspondent still keeps up the weekly temperance columns in the Houston Post.

We had Mrs. Woodward with us about ten days. Each day at noon she went to the various railroad shops of the city, and at night spoke to interested audiences. A most salutary influence has been exerted in all the various lines of her department. One woman who had never heard a woman speak (there are many such in Texas) was so charmed with her history of the W. C. T. U. and its wonderful influence in favor of women, that she has been anxious to attend every meeting where women speak since.

Flower mission day was appropriately observed here. "Something sweet, something white, and something bright," was taken to infirmaries, jails, hospitals and cala boose, beside to numbers of sick and afflicted in many parts of the city. Mrs. Delia Collins is state superintendent of social purity. The W. C. T. U. have made earnest but unsuccessful efforts to found a home at Ennis, on a substantial basis, called the "White Ribbon Home." It is too far from the business centers, however. The Fort Worth home was started as a private enterprise by Mrs. Collins, and Mrs. Burchell, the present postmistress of that city. W. C. T. U. women are at its head, and are entitled to all benefits and privileges of the institution. There is room for a W. C. T. U. home, and our leaders are making efforts to establish one under their auspices, in the most central part of the state. The sorrow that has come to our dear Miss Willard in the loss of her sainted mother, of which I read in THE UNION SIGNAL, has our deepest sympathy. Miss Willard can rest assured that her affliction has touched the heart of every white-ribboner in Texas.

MINNESOTA.

WRIGHT COUNTY CONVENTION AND OTHER NEWS.

About twenty-five delegates were present and many visitors, the attendance at all sessions being very good. Mrs. Hobart, although in poor health, entered with interest into all the meetings.

The annual address of the president dwelt upon the strength of the county organization, the importance of department work, and exhorted individual members to fulfil their obligations to their local unions and thus better and broaden their own lives by the study of the problems of the times. Several excellent papers were read, and practical as well. Reports were encouraging; the report on county press work being one that carried joy to the heart of the state superintendent, as well as to the immediate hearers. The resolutions were suggestive, practical and interesting, expressing renewed interest in the missionary W. C. T. U. and evangelistic lines of work; opposing the employment of teachers who are infidels or who use alcoholics or tobacco and protesting against the publication of the details of crime, divorce trials, etc.

In the evening Mrs. Hobart spoke for an hour on the voter's responsibility concerning the liquor traffic. Her remarks were attentively listened to and frequently applauded.

Luverne has had an innovation in the shape of open air W. C. T. U. meetings, resulting in much good, visible even at once, and how much more that shall be revealed by and by—who can tell? Mrs. Law, of Michigan, was engaged to give two lectures; a drayman's cart was borrowed for the speaker's stand, and suggestively decorated with white. A flag displayed close by helped to make known the patriotism of the union ladies, and a well of clear, cold water near the cart also came in for a share in the decorations, the pump handle being ornamented with a knot of white.

The novelty attracted a much larger audience than any ordinary methods would have gathered, many of them being of the very class we are so anxious to reach yet seldom succeed in bringing to our meetings. The first evening Mrs. Law addressed the 800 assembled for over an hour, and on the second evening there was a still larger attendance. A number of young men who were in the habit of drinking beer while at work, were so impressed by what they had heard that when they came to their work in the morning they made an agreement that they would drink no more beer, shaking hands upon it over a beer keg. When last heard from they had kept their pledge.

NOTES.

The Minneapolis Central union has sent out about 200 children from the city to the country and villages round about, for a two weeks' vacation, fresh air and country living. The Anoka Y's received about thirty of these little ones, finding homes for them and rejoicing in their presence.

Champlin union disbanded to make way for a Good Templars' Lodge, some of the temperance people desiring to organize one, and the W. C. T. U. women thinking it better to unite with them than to try to support two organizations in so small a village. But the W. C. T. U. spirit still remains, and several of the city children found homes there.

Preston union feels it has had a revival and wants everybody to know it. For some months only two or three faithful ones have held the fort. But lately, the Y. P. S. C. E. and Epworth League had a union temperance service, being assisted by three of the Jubilee singers. The songs and reading were so effective that some, not members, were heard to remark, "We must join that union," so a notice of the next meeting was published, four new members received, and at least four more secured since. Several new departments were taken up, and they are now praying (and working) that the revival may continue.

East Grand Forks union deserves to be ever specially remembered in the thoughts and prayers of the temperance people, for probably no other union is on ground so completely occupied by the enemy. Very many of the saloons cast out of Grand Forks in prohibition North Dakota have fled for refuge to East Grand Forks in high license Minnesota, to the great detriment of both towns. Yet the union there is bravely trying to secure a hall for itself that shall stand to remind passers-by of "God and Home and Native Land" in the saloon-ridden town.

OKLAHOMA.

MOVING FORWARD.

In the onward sweep of the political campaign the W. C. T. U. of Oklahoma turned to the People's party for advancement of equal suffrage. Mrs. M. A. Coplard, chairman of the W. C. T. U. territorial legislative committee, has been actively engaged planning and carrying forward work that will tell in the future along this line. She has addressed a number of public meetings of the People's party upon equal suffrage, and been well received; many promises were held out to her that this party of reform would favor the equality of sex before the law.

On the 16th inst. a territorial convention of the People's party was held in Oklahoma City; Mrs. Coplard, accompanied by the writer, attended, and endeavored to get a resolution passed eliminating sex from the elective franchise. Almost immediately after the convention was called to order Rev. A. G. Coplard introduced a motion "to make the W. C. T. U. ladies present honorary members of the convention, with all the privileges thereof." He was asked to state the breadth of his resolution; he defined as meaning "all the privileges of the floor, together with voting," the chair decided that no man or woman who had not been elected delegate in the regular way could be seated by a motion of the house; but he afterwards put a motion, and it carried, to seat a man who, because he was a fusionist, was not elected a delegate from his own county but elected to fill a vacancy.

After the noon adjournment, Mr. P. O. Cassedy, editor of West and South, an Alliance paper, introduced the following: "Resolved, That the ladies present in this convention be entitled to the privileges of the floor and the right to vote in this convention," the chair decided the motion out of order. Mr. Cassedy is a member of the National Committee of the People's party, also chairman of the territorial committee, and strongly favors equal suffrage. Judging from the many speeches that were made upon the resolutions quoted, there is a strong undercurrent of sentiment in the People's party that will ultimately bring about woman suffrage. Even if the W. C. T. U. failed to get a foothold in this convention, we are not discouraged. We know that woman's suffrage is the key to prohibition, and we also know that the brewer who told Miss Anthony, as she passed from the committee room of the National Republican convention at Minneapolis, that "they didn't want woman suffrage in theirs, and didn't mean to have it," is the sentiment of all office seekers who desire the continuation of the liquor traffic.

The Guthrie union was invited to occupy the afternoon at a union Sunday-school picnic. Mrs. Emma Miller presided, and led the devotional exercises. Mrs. Coplard, in an exceedingly effective address, explained the work of the W. C. T. U. Mrs. Celia Titus read a paper telling the children about the Temple. Upon the stand was a picture of Mrs. Carse and the Temple as an object lesson for the little ones. Rev. E. F. Boggess gave a temperance address, making many good points in it for woman's suffrage. Mrs. Titus also read a paper upon the subject. The exercises were interspersed with music. A "Voting Song" was sung by Masters Tom and Luke Titus, also little Eva Swan's sweet voice was heard in a solo. Going into a Sabbath-school some distance from my home, a "stranger among strangers," I found a white-ribboner in charge of the school, Mrs. Nellie Sheplor, of Toledo, Ill., who had been president for four years of the sixteenth W. C. T. U. congressional district of Illinois. Thus we ever find a true W. C. T. U. woman filling some place in the Master's vineyard.

CALIFORNIA ECHOES.

The annual school of methods of the California W. C. T. U called together the white ribbon hosts in great enthusiasm. As usual the Southern Pacific Railway Company aided the women by courtesies at Pacific Grove and in transportation. Under the direction of Mrs. B. Sturtevant Peet, the program for the entire week was intensely interesting. Miss Mary Allen West, World's and National superintendent of school of methods, was our guest, and every day conducted department work. The music, under the direction of Mrs. Annie Hilliker, was inspiring. Mrs. Peet opened the convention by expressing the joy of the Pacific Coast that General John Bidwell had been chosen as the standard-bearer on the Prohibition ticket, and urging the women to earnest campaign work. Mrs. M. G. Norton well described "Lines of Work that Lead Toward God." Mrs. E. P. Stevens' address, "A Little Leaven," showed that the prayers of the W. C. T. U. are leavening our national life and eventually, like the alcohol in yeast, the liquor traffic will be destroyed.

Mrs. M. J. Mayhew in her cheery way talked on the theme, "More Sunshine than Shadow," showing that the use of intoxicants in home and social circles had largely decreased. It used to be drink at births, weddings and deaths. Now, who ever hears of rum at a funeral, except among the pall-bearers of a deceased president or congressman, and when the government pays for the liquor? In the evening Mrs. J. L. Evarts made a cordial address of welcome which was happily responded to by Mrs. J. L. Stratton. Miss Severance gave a good address on woman suffrage, entitled "Some Ways and Wherefore."

Mrs. S. C. Borland, in her thoroughly practical way, talked on juvenile work. "Progressive Temperance," by Mrs. P. D. Browne, was a lively paper, showing that in church and state, temperance is gaining, and recommending more thorough organization as seen in the success of Evangelist B. Fay Mills. Mrs. Emma P. Smith gave a fine Bible reading, "Women of the Bible."

Mrs. Lydia Prescott in her remarkably good paper, "Little Things," showed that never will the labor problem be solved till the golden rule becomes the foundation of business. Mrs. Emily Hoppin, state treasurer, made a fine speech for "Finance" that opened the hearts and pocket-books. Mrs. Henrietta Skelton, state organizer, "brought down the house" by her "Notes from the Field." The Oakland Glee Club Temperance Cadets gave a most enjoyable concert which netted the state treasury nearly one hundred dollars.

Mrs. Emma P. Smith, in the "Relation of Temperance to Labor" showed that drink caused much of the labor trouble. Mrs. Rose French read an essay on "Work Among Railroad Employés," emphasizing its importance. Mrs. D. J. Spencer, the business manager of the Pacific Ensign, reported on its financial condition, and urged greater work for the official organ. Mrs. Van Pelt, the editor, gave a talk on her experiences in the sanctum. The Y's, under the leadership of the state superintendent, Miss Winnie Morris, gave a delightful evening entertainment. Miss Mary Allen West preached ably on Sunday morning. Sunday afternoon Mrs. E. G. Greene, superintendent of social purity, led a meeting.

All workers in social purity will be delighted to know that Mr. Charles N. Crittenton, the famous evangelist and philanthropist, is perfecting plans for a gift of a large sum of money to the National department of social purity whereby Florence missions under W. C. T. U. auspices will be founded in many large cities of the United States. The sixth of the Florence missions and homes for the rescue of erring girls Mr. Crittenton has now established at Los Angeles. The Rescue Home of San Francisco, nobly and successfully carried on for years by a band of Christian workers, last January elected Mr. Crittenton president of its board, and it now bears his daughter's name. At Beulah, near Oakland, the Salvation Army also sustains a Rescue Home.

The gospel temperance meeting on Sunday evening was led by Mrs. Ada Van Pelt. "Arise, for Thy Light is Come," was beautifully sung. Mrs. S. M. M. Woodman, of Chico, spoke on "Communion Wine," proving that Christ never manufactured fermented wine. Mrs. Emma Pow Smith, the indefatigable state organizer, appealed to the fathers to vote against the liquor traffic. She also urged mothers to join the W. C. T. U. Mrs. Emily Pitt Stevens, National organizer, spoke well from the sentence, "Christ came not to judge the world but to save the world." She also made the plea for the collection and a generous one was taken. Mrs. Skelton closed the meeting with prayer.

The remaining three days of the session were well filled. In the absence of Mrs. Gear, Miss West talked of "alcohol as a medicinal remedy" showing that in nearly all cases some other stimulant would do the work equally well, and the use of alcohol is largely discontinued by the best physicians. Miss West then spoke upon "The Uses and Abuses of Literature," urging the women to furnish temperance and Christian literature in boxes in depots and other public places, to offset the vile literature disseminated, and deploring the prominence given to scandal and crime in the daily press.

Mrs. Carey, of San Jose, National superintendent of Chinese work, urged more interest in these heathen at our very doors. Mrs. P. H. Mathews showed the great need and success of "Temperance work in the Sunday-school." Mrs. L. Haskell presented a thoughtful paper upon the "Labor Problem," and Mrs. G. M. Kimball in "The Circulation of Ideas" showed the immense importance of the press department and that through the local newspaper the ideas of the W. C. T. U. may be circulated. Mrs. C. S. Danks read a good essay on the "Temperance Column in the Local Paper," emphasizing its importance.

Mrs. Kimball well discussed finance; Mrs. Christina Armstrong talked well upon "Methods of Sabbath Observance Work." A delightful reception was tendered Miss West and Mrs. Sturtevant-Peet in the parlors of El Carmelo hotel. "The Madonna of the Future," by Mrs. S. M. M. Woodman, was a beautiful thought well elaborated. The W. C. T. U., of Pacific Grove, tendered the ladies a delicious luncheon instead of the annual picnic. "The Trial by Jury," conducted by Mrs. Rose French, was a decided hit, representing the trial in a San Francisco police court of a saloon-keeper who had sold liquor to a minor.

Mrs. Jennie Phelps Purvis presented "Narcotics," their awful effects and the need of more determined work against tobacco and opium. She also described in a sparkling manner "The National Convention as I found it." Miss S. M. Severance gave practical means of securing woman suffrage in her paper, "My Methods, Results?" The importance of the press in educating public sentiment on suffrage was dwelt upon. A collection was sent Mrs. Dr. Mallory to aid in the prohibition campaign in Placer county. Though lost by two hundred votes the agitation has done wonders for the temperance cause. Mrs. H. E. McMath, in her bright paper, "Headquarters' Spectacles," showed the great work done by the Oakland union through their headquarters, and urged all unions to secure a local habitation. "Coffee House Work," by Mrs. S. F. Barnum, superintendent of Oakland coffee house, which does a business annually of twenty thousand dollars, was shown to be a practical means of pushing the temperance work. Mrs. A. B. Gove, the prison evangel, roused all sympathies by the sad scenes in "Prison Work." Nearly all prisoners are the victims of the saloon.

The address of Mrs. Anna K. Bidwell on "Our Privileges" showed the great pleasure of working for God. The five barley loaves and two fishes represent our privileges, and if we do our part God will do the rest and the multitudes will be fed. Mrs. Mary Frank Browne well discoursed on the "California Napoleon"—the liquor traffic which though strong will eventually be banished from American soil. Poems and songs and recitations were given. "The Ethics of Politics," a thoughtful paper by Mrs. Sturtevant-Peet, well portrayed the difficulties in the way of prohibition, but they will be overcome. Greetings were sent Miss Jessie Ackerman, the round-the world missionary in Australia.

The death of Madam Willard touches a chord of sympathy in the hearts of California white-ribboners and Miss Willard has the prayers of all in her hour of bereavement. Mrs. Sarah B. Cooper, vice-president of the Pacific Coast Woman's Press Association, made a motion at its recent meeting, that the president, Mrs. Nellie B. Eyster—a white ribbon woman—voice the tender sympathy of the P. C W. P. A. for Miss Willard.

The Bidwell rally on August 4, when Colonel Ritter, of Indianapolis, the chairman of the late National Prohibition Convention, formally notified General Bidwell of his nomination for the Presidency, was an occasion long to be remembered. General Bidwell, in his majestic way, thanked Col. Ritter and the Prohibition party for the honor conferred upon him and outlined the battles of the campaign in the fight for the home against the saloon. He said truly that if the women could vote, he would occupy the White House. Ex-chairman French was appointed to escort Mrs. Bidwell to the platform and the audience gave three cheers as the blushing little lady stood by her husband's side. Vice-president elect, Dr. Cranfill, will probably visit the coast soon. The Prohibitionists are making a gallant fight.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

MAJOR E. T. SCOTT'S address is 134 Locust St., Santa Cruz, California.

MISS JESSIE ACKERMAN'S present address is 28 Russell St., Melbourne, Australia.

ALL communications to Wisconsin W. C. T. U. president should be addressed: Mrs. Vie H. Campbell, Evansville, Wis.

THE twentieth district Illinois W. C. T. U. had thirty-seven delegates at its interesting annual convention held in Tamaroa lately.

A DEMOREST medal contest of unusual interest was held at Judsonia, Kas., not long ago. Little Corinne Shepard was the winner of the medal.

THREE of the valued members of Mt. Carroll, Ill., have passed away since the opening of the year, Mr. Willard Wicks, Mrs. Eliza Garver, Mr. John Demmon, Sr.

MUCH interest in flower mission work has been displayed in Alabama during the past summer. In Birmingham flower mission day was observed by sending bouquets to the hospitals and almshouses, and one hundred copies of THE UNION SIGNAL (special number) to the convict camps, county jail, almshouse and hospital.

MRS. L. E. BAILEY is actively engaged in Saratoga county, N. Y., speaking for the prohibition party evenings, and holding meetings during the day in the interest of the W. C. T. U.

THE little city of Monroe, La., has just emerged from another Christian temperance upheaval, brought about by the instrumentality and personality of the noted evangelist, Rev. Geo. Inge, of Mississippi.

MRS. L. K. MERRICK, a leading white-ribboner of Jackson county, N. C., passed away August 29. Resolutions of deep respect and appreciation were framed by the local W. C. T. U. of which she was president.

THE suggestive article in THE UNION SIGNAL of June 30, regarding farmers' wives, has met with emphatic indorsement. One earnest worker writes that it is a "fur row we might plow straight through to victory."

MRS. JULIA BOSWORTH, of Kirksville, Mo., has been for nine years an active white ribboner, traveling for eight years as a lecturer and organizer. The Kirksville I. O. G. T., of which she is also a member, has done good service by opposing the issuing of saloon licenses.

THE W. C. T. U. of Butler and Bloomingdale, N. J., have had a fine lot donated them, and are engaged in active efforts to procure money to erect a building on it for the needs of their work, and also for a reading room and coffee room. Success to the enterprise!

HOOPESTON, Ill., hospitably entertained the annual fifteenth district convention last month. Mrs. Rounds was present, also Mrs. Ida Buxton Cole, Miss Lucy Gaston, and other leading workers. Mrs. Kate Goldman was re elected to the district presidency. The meeting was eminently successful.

THE state L. T. L. conventions are becoming a helpful feature of W. C. T. U. work. Pennsylvania reports one held last month at which about seventy delegates were present, representing fourteen counties and twenty three towns, and the Pennsylvania L. T. L. became a permanent organization. Mrs. Helen G. Rice, of Boston, National superintendent juvenile work, was present.

MRS. METZGAR, of the social purity work in Illinois, is beginning to speak in public on her sacred theme, and her sweet womanly manner wins many friends and deepens the sentiment in all hearts cognizant of her words and works in favor of giving women the right to protect themselves in custom and in law better than they have been protected in the past.

HIGHLAND FALLS, N. Y., is a place of about 2,800 inhabitants and about thirty saloons. On a Sabbath evening this summer twenty two of them were open. It is hoped to organize a W. C. T. U. soon. Meanwhile they would be thankful for samples or packages of temperance papers and tracts for distribution. Send to Rev. G. W. Thompson, pastor of M. E. church.

W. C. T. U. drinking fountains are not so plentiful as they should be. Many state and local unions are contemplating their erection. Mrs. Laura Perry Case, 201 Ashland Boulevard, Chicago, National superintendent of W. C. T. U. fountains, suggests that a uniform design be decided upon and that they be constructed of substantial material to become an enduring monument to the work of the W. C. T. U.

MRS. FRANCES J. BARNES, the beloved National superintendent of young woman's work, goes to Virginia's state convention, September 28 and 29, then through Ohio, making two stops, and to Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, Kansas and Colorado's state gatherings, much to the delight of the young women in these states. After the National Convention, Mrs. Barnes will return directly to her home in New York City, not remaining in the West, as has been previously announced.

THE Fremont, Neb., W. C. T. U. temple was built in 1888, at a cost of eight thousand dollars, the necessary funds being raised by the local union, which was generously supported by the citizens. It is centrally located and contains a free reading-room, circulating library and an auditorium with a seating capacity of six hundred, besides all modern conveniences. The Fremont W. C. T. U. has reason to be proud of its possession, which is such a fitting memorial to the cause in which they are enlisted.

TO ILLINOIS belongs the high honor of holding more Demorest medal contests than any state in the Union. She also has the honor of being the second state to hold a diamond medal contest which will occur in connection with the state convention at Danville in October. The young people who have won Demorest great gold medals, and who will contest at Danville for the diamond medal, will occupy a nobler position in the temperance cause than was ever occupied by young people of Illinois heretofore.

COL. JOHN C. BUNDY, for many years editor of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, Chicago, passed to the better life on August 6. He was a friend and brother, sincerely trusted and beloved. He sought to place psychic phenomena on a scientific basis, coöperating with such men as Prof. William James, of Harvard University, Rev. Minot J. Savage, of Boston, and others. Every well wisher of his race must honor those who interrogate phenomena of whatever sort, and surely none can be more worthy of interrogation than those that seem to beckon toward a larger knowledge of the larger world invisible. Warmest sympathies are sent to Mrs. Bundy and the only daughter.

A CORRESPONDENT makes the following valuable suggestion: Why should not the W. C. T. U. have Economic Reading Circles? I would like to suggest through THE UNION SIGNAL that to save time and labor we shall act under an advisory board, already conducting such circles, and well known among the world's reformers, of which Hamlin Garland, Copley Square, Boston, is chairman. The course of reading is composed of three branches: history (first year English, second year American): political economy and general science. The reader is not pledged to do more than one year's work, the achievement of each year being determined by short essays in answer to stated questions, and acknowledged by means of certificates and other suitable forms of recognition.

Dr. Peter Bryce, for thirty years superintendent of the insane asylum of Alabama located at Tuskaloosa, died August 14. He was a man endowed with a remarkably fine personal presence, a great brain and a most brotherly heart. We remember with pathetic tenderness the days during which we were the guests of the doctor and his beautiful wife while attending the Alabama W. C. T. U. convention in 1887. Mrs. Bryce was for years president of the state union, and has the earnest sympathy of her white ribbon sisters in this hour of trouble.

The Lakeside W. C. T. U. Home has been especially fortunate in having Mrs. Rachel A. Bailey, of Hastings, Mich., the first ten days of the assembly to conduct eleven o'clock meetings in the chapel. She also addressed one auditorium meeting and three of the women's conferences, held at four o'clock each day at Alumni Hall and presided over by Mrs. Vincent. The corner-stone of Good Templar Hall, just across from the Home, was laid, and among the contents deposited therein were a W. C. T. U. pin and a copy of The Union Signal.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL DEPARTMENT.

Report blanks with a second letter of suggestion and appeal have been sent to all state superintendents. A full statistical report is very much desired this year from every state and territory. State and territorial superintendents can make such reports only as the county and local superintendents furnish the requisite figures and facts, therefore we urge that full statistical reports be sent from every local union to the county superintendent, if there be one, if not, directly to the state superintendent. While there is no limit as yet fixed for the securing of the autograph pledges, we very much hope, so far as possible, that this work will be done soon, and reports made in time to be incorporated in the National report at the annual convention in October. The quarterly temperance Sunday, September 25, will be a good time to secure these pledges. Then, if reports are sent at once to county or state superintendents, it will enable the latter to send their complete reports to me by October 1, which is the date given to receive state reports. There should be no delay, as this leaves little time for the National report to be printed in season for the annual meeting. I desire again to thank all those who have so grandly responded to my appeals, both for the use of literature on the quarterly temperance Sunday, and the securing of the autograph pledges. About one hundred thousand of these autograph pledge cards have been ordered already, and many more are intending to order, I am assured by correspondence. As I expect to be traveling and speaking during September and October, delay will be avoided by ordering the autograph pledge cards directly from the department secretary, Mrs. Julia A. Bidwell, Deposit, Broome county, New York. Circulars giving full information in regard to this effort will be furnished free of charge, either singly or in quantity, upon application to the department secretary. Please send postal note rather than stamps, when convenient to do so, in payment for the autograph pledge cards. There is the impending danger that liquor will be sold on the Exposition grounds. If this must be, despite our prayers and petitions, let us at least offset this national disgrace by the silent yet forceful protest from our Sunday-schools through these autograph pledge cards.

Lucia E. F. Kimball,
S. S. Supt. World's and Nat. W. C. T. U.

DEPARTMENT OF MERCY.

Dear Friends Who Love the Birds:—

It is proposed to have at the World's Fair competitions between collections of living birds native to America. A prize of $75 is offered for the best collection, and three other prizes of $50, $35, and $25 go to the competitors that follow in order of merit. The Youth's Companion, which has a very large circulation, has taken advantage of this to suggest that boys and girls compete for these as well as for other prizes, and it is made especially tempting by being the only instance mentioned where money is offered as an inducement. Now, if you think as I do, that this is nothing less than offering a premium to children to do the very things that our Band of Mercy teaching urges them not to do (no regard at all would of course be paid to whether it was or was not the breeding season of the birds captured)—if you think it would not be a humane thing to deprive wild birds of their liberty, and herd them together to be more or less ill attended to during the Exposition, some perhaps dying; if you think the birds of America can be seen very well by the visitors to the Fair in other ways, and that there will be objects of interest in abundance at the Fair without the need of teaching children to commit acts of cruelty to obtain them, you will write as I am now doing, to Col. George R. Davis, Director-General of the Columbin Exposition, Chicago, and to the editor of The Youth's Companion, Boston, and make your earnest protest against this. I suggest that you get ministers and any who are interested in humane work to do the same. Please do it at once if possible so that the expression of the sentiment may be strong. Many thousands of the dear birds have been slaughtered to gratify vanity. Let us prevent this additional cruelty if we can.

Mary F. Lovell, Nat. Supt.

POLICE STATIONS AND POLICE MATRONS.

Cards have been sent to every state superintendent of this department, asking for the following information preparatory for the annual report to be given to the National W. C. T. U. at Denver, October 28 to November 2:

1. Will you continue to act as state superintendent of police stations and police matrons for the next year?
2. How many cities of your state have a population of more than ten thousand inhabitants?
3. How many women have been arrested for misconduct and sent to police stations during the past year?
4. How have these women been disposed of, and to what charitable institutions have destitute women been sent?
5. Have your local superintendents made application to the municipal authorities of these cities to have police matrons appointed at police stations?
6. Are the matrons, who are in active service, paid as members of the police force with a fixed salary?
7. Do the matrons wear the police matron's "star" while on duty?

Those to whom this card is addressed will greatly favor me by a prompt reply which will be appreciated by one of your comrades in work for the uplifting of humanity.

WORK AMONG RAILROAD EMPLOYES.

Dear Sisters:—Please report to me at once, as follows:

1. Railroads upon which work has been done and at what places.
2. Pages of literature, papers and books distributed, and where placed. Whether in way cars, shops, depots, construction camps, or to section men.
3. Meetings and song services held. Names of ministers who have aided, and to what denominations do they belong. How many sermons preached to railroad men, and have you gained the coöperation of young people's societies in meetings and song services.
4. Number of pledges and bonds signed.
5. Number of conversions of railroad men.
6. Are railroad reading-rooms maintained, and if so, how; by the corporation, by employés or by the union?
7. How many way cars and engines have been equipped with literature, racks and regularly supplied; give name of road and cars and engines by their numbers for purpose of record. How many scrapbooks have been placed in way cars?
8. Visits made to families of employés and to sick and injured employés. Fruit, delicacies and flowers sent sick or injured. Have committees representing the union attended funerals of employés or members of their families, and have floral offerings been given?
9. State number of socials, receptions or other entertainments for railroad men.
10. What effort has been made for commercial men, firemen, street car men, express and hackmen?
11. What amount of money has been expended in your state?
12. Incidents relating to "work among railroad employés"; items showing increase of interest, with information and suggestions that will enable the department to reach better plans in the future.

Mrs. M. M. Givens, Cor. Sec.

The eighteenth annual meeting of the Pennsylvania W. C. T. U. is to be held in the First M. E. church, New Castle, October 7–11. A meeting of the executive committee (general officers and county presidents) will be held at 3 p. m. Thursday, October 6th, and the usual delegates' prayer meeting at 7:30 p. m., same date. Names of delegates are to be sent to chairman of entertainment committee, Mrs. A. M. B. McCleary, No. 219 W. Washington street, New Castle, Pa. Banners, flags, mottoes, etc., are to be sent to Miss Mary Barnett, No. 152 Neshannock avenue, New Castle, Pa. Pray often for God's blessing upon our eighteenth annual meeting.

Mary H. Jones, Pres.
Henrietta H. Forrest, Cor. Sec.

The eleventh annual convention of Tennessee W. C. T. U. will be held in Nashville, October 11, 12 and 13. Col. Geo. W. Bain will address a mass-meeting on Monday evening, October 10, at the gospel tabernacle. Mrs. Mary McGee Snell will be present throughout the convention sessions, giving Bible readings each day and an address to mass-meeting October 12, at 7:30 p. m. The convention will be one of unusual interest, and a large attendance is expected. All co workers and friends, both in Tennessee and elsewhere, are cordially invited to attend.

Lide Meriwether, Pres.
Mary B. Abernethy, Treas.

The ninth annual convention of the Montana Woman's Christian Temperance Union will be held in Bozeman, October 4 to 6 inclusive. There will be a meeting of the executive committee before the opening hour of the convention.

The third annual meeting of the W. C. T. U. of the state of Iowa will be held in the Congregational church, Burlington, October 4–7. Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman, of Missouri, will speak the evening of the 4th. For full call and program see Iowa Signal of September.

Marion H. Dunham, Pres.
O. M. Crawford, Sec.

CONCERNING ACCOMMODATIONS FOR VISITORS ATTENDING THE NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION.

Hotels and hotel rates for visitors at the National W. C. T. U. Convention to be held in Denver, October 28 to November 2, and for delegates preferring hotels, are being secured by the committee having the matter in charge.

One noticeable feature of Denver is the large number of family hotels or first-class boarding houses, not devoted to the transient trade. These have been taken into consideration as well as the regular hotels within a convenient distance of Trinity M. E. Church, in which the Convention is to be held, and convenient, also, to rapid transit by cable and electric lines.

Brown's Palace, very close to the church, will furnish entertainment at $3 and $4 per day according to location of rooms. This includes meals, as the hotel is conducted on the American plan. The Palace, just completed and furnished, is probably the finest west of Chicago, and superbly located. These rates are given upon the contingency of securing not less than fifty guests.

The Albany, corner of 17th and Stout, offers most reasonable rates, considering the excellence of the hotel, its advantageous location and admirable management. Room and meals, $3 per day, two persons occupying a room, $5 per day. The Albany is a favorite place for conventions. The use of the club rooms will be donated to the executive and delegates, if the Albany is chosen as headquarters. Its distance from the church is about four blocks and the managers are noted for their attention to the comfort of guests.

The Gilsey, 18th and Stout, will furnish rooms by the week, price $4 to $6, two occupying a room will pay nothing extra. Meals, short order. The proprietress is willing to do everything possible for the guests.

The Albert, 17th, between Glenarm and Welton, and distant three blocks from the church, offers pleasant and newly furnished rooms for $1, $1.25 and $1.50 per day. An attractive café gives meals at $1 per day; no bar.

St. James Hotel, Curtis, between 15th and 16th, makes reasonable rates. Cars pass the door.

Broadway Hotel: Rooms and board, $3 per day; two occupying the same room, $2.50 each; very convenient to the church; no bar.

The Ramona, 14th Avenue and South 14th.

L'Imperial, Court Place and 14th, and other family hotels conveniently located, will make reasonable rates, conditional upon having rooms to spare.

The Woman's Christian Association furnishes rooms and board at exceedingly moderate prices.

The Woman's Exchange—auxiliary to the W. C. T. U.—is conveniently located, furnishes meals on the short order system, and is convenient to many places where rooms can be secured.

A bureau of information will be established later. Meanwhile, it is desirable that the committee should know as certainly as possible the number of delegates and visitors to be expected, that arrangements can be made more definitely. Those delegates wishing to be together should definitely say so. For the present, all parties desiring information on this matter can address

Mrs. Frances Belford.

Publisher's Notes.

A GREAT WORK! A GREAT OPPORTUNITY!!

The Revised Encyclopedia Britannica which we offer to our readers at the unheard-of rate of only ten cents a day for ninety days, is a unique and splendid work. It has no peer among Encyclopedias. There is but one Bible for Christians; one Talmud for Hebrews; one Koran for Mohammedans, and there is but one Encyclopedia Britannica for the people who speak and read the English language, and who turn to it as to the one comprehensive, all-inclusive and authoritative epitome of human knowledge in all its branches.

To possess this matchless work is to own a whole library and have access to information on every subject within the domain of human experience, study or inquiry. The extraordinary terms announced on another page upon which the Revised Encyclopedia Britannica will be supplied to our readers, are only for such readers.

Remember this fact.

It is an exclusive privilege.

A few years ago the complete edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica cost nearly $200, thus preventing any but the wealthy from purchasing it. We are now able to offer a later, a better and more complete edition in 20 volumes, comprising a total of 7,000 pages, with 96 colored maps.

We have confidence in it and we know our readers will be benefited by having this great work to consult. We are willing to trust you. In proof of this we send the entire 20 volumes with all charges prepaid on receipt of only $1, and allow you to pay the balance at the rate of 10 cents a day, the same being remitted monthly for a period of 90 days.

Can we do any more?

There is now no further excuse for not owning this great Reference Library. Take advantage of the offer now. Do not delay. The offer is made for a short time and to our subscribers only.

The Union Signal

Permit a word of praise or good cheer, not because you want or need it, but because I must say something! God bless THE UNION SIGNAL, the W. C. T. U.—the president, vice presidents, editors, officials, leaders, the rank and file, the God-honoring and man-blessing "Cause"! THE UNION SIGNAL comes as an angel with its angel blessing: ennobling, purifying, helpful and cheering. It has the divine element of truth, the internal witness of "experience." As we look on a face and know that innocence and worth are behind it—feel that it is so—as we commune with people and feel that they are true, as we read the Bible and feel that it is the Word of God, as we come by obedience and faith into touch with God and have a square understanding with Him and know and feel that "He is"—is our God and King—so, in a measure, THE UNION SIGNAL bears about with it the marks and infallible evidence of its goodness; i. e., the "divinity" of the temperance cause. J. B. H.

We live on a farm in full view of the Rocky Mountains, we have plenty of fresh air, sunshine and hard work. We have a great many papers and magazines, but the best one that comes into our home is THE UNION SIGNAL, it is so bright and cheery, full of good, healthy news, with kind counsel and good advice.

The Advance Guard.

This is the name of our new magazine. Just the thing for our older L. T. L. boys and girls. I wish every one of them could read the article entitled "Snares," by Julia McNair Wright, in the July number. The price of this magazine is fifty cents per year. Send five cents to the Temple for sample copy. I know you would all enjoy the "Cheeryvale Law Club." This magazine will help the L. T. L. superintendents in making the meetings interesting to the older boys and girls by giving many useful hints. MARY D. HETHERINGTON.

I meant to have written before to express my pleasure at receiving the copy of The Advance Guard. It is, indeed, a good thought, and will, I am sure, fill a vacancy in our periodical literature. Our boys and girls who have gone a little beyond The Crusader will be delighted. T. M. T.

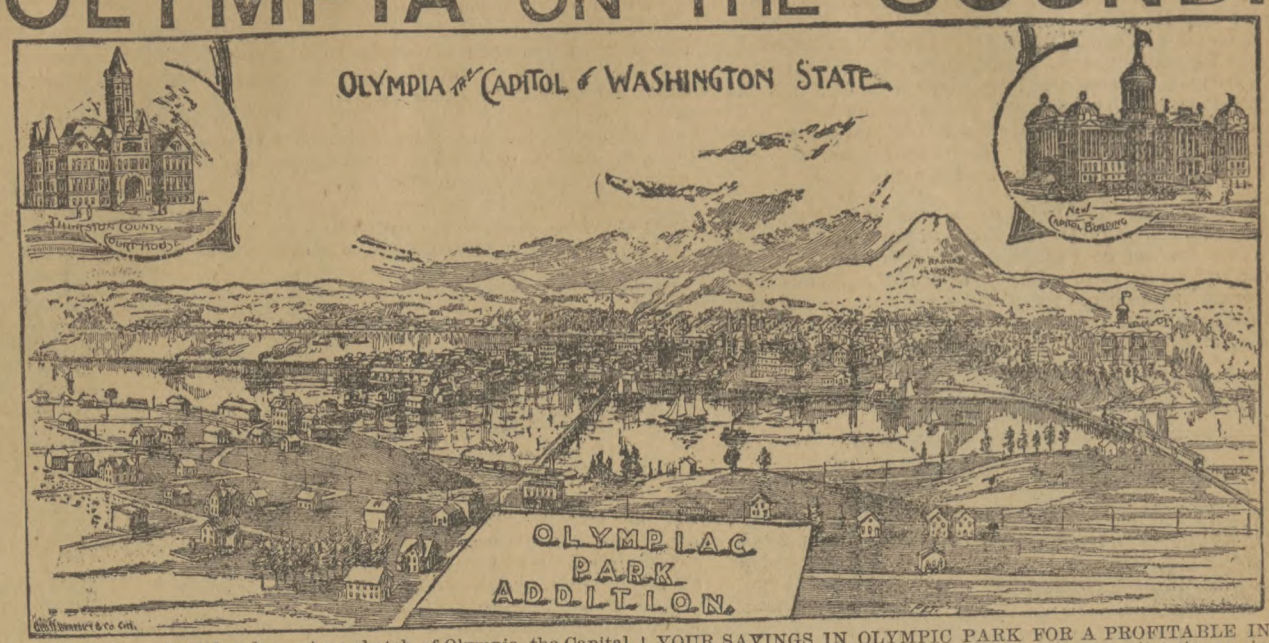
OLYMPIA ON THE SOUND.



The above is a splendid and very true sketch of Olympia, the Capital of the wonderful State of Washington, showing the relative position of Olymyic Park Addition. OLYMPIA is a growing, thriving young city of over 8,000 people, situated at the head of navigation on Puget Sound; possesses unrivaled transportation facilities, both rail and water, resources great and inexhaustable, such as Lumber, Coal, Iron, Tin, Gold, Silver, etc., etc., and abundance of natural advantages; one of the greatest water powers west of the Mississippi River; a harbor second to none in the world, which floats the largest vessels and is headquarters for a great many steamboats. Olympia's population has more than doubled during the past 18 months, and is growing faster and making more substantial improvements according to her population than any other city in America. OLYMPIA has four railroads, besides these the Great Northern and Union Pacific are now actively engaged in building, and will be running trains into Olympia in a few months. MANUFACTURING INDUSTRIES OF ALL KINDS ARE LOCATING AT OLYMPIA. The combination of unlimited resources and great natural advantages, capital and enterprise is pushing Olympia to the front and will keep her there. PUT YOUR SAVINGS IN OLYMPIC PARK FOR A PROFITABLE INVESTMENT. Interest yourself in this great young city, the coming metropolis of the Pacific Coast. It will be safer and more profitable than depositing in a savings bank. Olympic Park is within one mile of the State Capitol building and Post Office. All lots are 25x100 feet. All lay well, not a bad lot in the whole addition. Inside lots are $125 each; corner lots, $150. Terms, $10 cash, balance, $5 per month; or one-third cash, balance in two equal payments running one and two years. Ten per cent. discount for all cash. Deferred payments draw six per cent. interest. Warranty deeds given, title guaranteed. By having lots reserved you will secure better location. Lots ordered by telegraph will be reserved a reasonable time for remittance to reach us by mail. Send us $10 and we will select for you the best lot unsold, we will send you a plat showing the lot selected. If you do not like the lot selected you can exchange for any lot unsold. We will reserve lots 10 days upon payment of a small amount per lot, which amount will apply as part of first payment. Send money by express or P. O. order or Chicago draft, payable to order of Russell & Russell. As to our reliability we refer you to

GOLD PLATED
WARRANTED GENUINE.
BOX JOINTS.
Don't buy a common looking silver watch when you can now obtain for the small sum of $4.95 a handsome genuine 14 karat gold plated hunting case, full engraved watch with a first-class full jeweled movement, a perfect time keeper, genuine full plate handsomely damaskeened and ornamented, fully equal in appearance to the watches regularly sold by jewelers at from $25 to $35. In carrying this watch you have the credit of carrying a solid gold watch, as the plating process is got down so fine now-a-days that it is almost impossible to detect the difference. The engraving on the case is just the same as on the high priced watches, and is in the very loveliest and latest patterns. Some will doubt our ability to be able to supply such a watch at this price, and to convince you that we mean just what we say, we make the following most extraordinary offer for next 30 days.
READ!
Cut this out and send it with your order, and we will promptly ship the watch to you by express C. O. D. with instructions to the express agent to allow you to examine it at the express office. If on examination you are convinced that it is a bargain, pay the agent $4.95 and the express charges and it is yours, otherwise you pay nothing and it will be returned at our expense. We could not afford to make such an offer as this unless we were confident that the watch will not only please you, but be a surprise to you. Bear in mind this price will be for 30 days only.

WHAT A Y CAN DO.

I was superintendent of temperance literature for six months in the Stronghurst Y, but being absent from home a great deal of the time, I was not able to accomplish very much. Our Y was newly organized and we had no money for any department, and it was only after my promising to bear all expense, that they consented to take up the department of temperance literature. So you see I could not do much. A little over 1,000 pages of literature were distributed, one wall pocket in post office kept filled, no account was kept of papers placed in that. I made a wall pocket to place in the depot, but the agent said they did not allow anything of the kind. Had I remained there I would have written to the superintendent of the road and asked permission. The papers in the wall pocket were most religious and not strictly temperance. All papers were marked "Stronghurst Y" and had items marked in them. To the young men, and young girls who were accepting the company of young men using tobacco, I marked leaflets on narcotics,—and taking white card board, placed the title on in gilt letters, making an attractive booklet,—and gave them. You know that many, and young people especially, will not read anything they think has the least resemblance to a tract. "Mrs. Klyne's Life Work" makes a very pretty booklet in that way, to give to young mothers. Three or four Signal Leaflets placed together make very interesting booklets. As nearly every one had flowers and fruit, we substituted booklets instead for flowers mission. To teachers we sent L. T. L. leaflets made into booklets—in fact, we tried to make our literature department do the work of others. R. H.

TESTIMONIALS.

Flags of Freedom.

From Mrs. Helen G. Rice's Letter to Superintendents.

At Camp Glyndon, Md., I had charge of the children each morning for three weeks, in a Loyal Temperance Legion. We gave an entertainment which included Miss Guernsey's beautiful colloquy, "Flags of Freedom." Please recommend this as a very effective and profitable exercise for L. T. L. entertainments.

THE CHILDREN'S HARVEST HOME.

Four years ago, at our New York National Convention, it was ordered that September 28, Miss Willard's birthday, should be kept as the Children's Harvest Home.

What Does that Mean?

It means all sorts of helpful, pleasant things. It means a

Harvest Festival,

if you like, with gifts of fruit and vegetables to the poor and needy. It means a

Children's Entertainment

in your town, perhaps, using the charming program in the August Young Crusader. It means supplying each child in town, if possible, with a

Willard Souvenir Card

in memory of the day. It means, above all, "line upon line and precept upon precept," in teaching the children that God's fruits and grains were "made to be eaten and not to be drank."

Send to the W. T. P. A. for program and cards, and have a Children's Harvest Home in your town.

IS YOUR FRUIT SPOILING?

Read in another column the advertisement of "Fruits, and How to Use Them." You will learn how to care for them in the best manner possible, and a great variety of palatable dishes can be made that you have never tried from recipes it contains. Should you desire it, address the first time with Pearline, you feel as if you never had been clean before. Possibly you haven't.

After Bathing

Only baths like the Turkish or the Russian can make you as clean as Pearline does. There's the same feeling of lightness and luxury after it, too.

Bathing with Pearline costs almost nothing. It's like everything else—you would long for it, if it were expensive, but you're apt to overlook it when it's cheap. Directions on every package.

Beware Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back. 334 JAMES PYLE, N.Y.

HARVEY'S GREATEST ENTERPRISE.

Although the manufacturing industries of Harvey represent millions of dollars capital, yet the building of the mammoth World's Fair Temperance Hotel, on property purchased from Walter Thomas Mills & Co., is being talked of everywhere as Harvey's greatest enterprise. The fine residence property offered for sale by this reliable and enterprising firm is very choice, and it will well pay any reader of this paper seeking a place to live away from the accursed saloon to investigate Harvey, and that at once, before the raise of prices in October.—From World's Fair News, Chicago.

LOW RATE HARVEST EXCURSIONS.

The announcement that the North-Western Line, comprising over 8,000 miles of thoroughly equipped railway, has arranged to run two low rate Harvest Excursions during the months of August and September, will be gladly received by those who are interested in the development of the great West and Northwest, as well as by those who desire to visit this wonderfully productive region at a season of the year when exact demonstration can be made of the merits and advantages it offers to home-seekers and those in search of safe and profitable investments.

These excursions will leave Chicago on August 30th and September 27th, and tickets can be purchased at the very low rate of one fare for the round trip to points in Iowa, Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, Idaho and Montana. They will be strictly first-class in every particular and will be good for return passage at any time within twenty days from date of purchase. Full information concerning rates and arrangements for these excursions can be obtained upon application to any coupon ticket agent, or to W. A. Thrall, G. P. T. A., Chicago & North-Western R'y, Chicago.

CHICAGO, September 14, 1892.

Twenty-five years of my life were devoted to persistent indulgment in liquor, till at last my physical and moral forces had reached their lowest ebb. Collecting what little mental energy was left me, I concluded to look around and find if there were not a loop-hole for escape left me, and, thank God, I found it.

Under the treatment of Dr. Mark M. Thompson, at the National Bichloride of Gold Institute, corner Hoyne avenue and Monroe street, I was in the course of four weeks in the full possession of my physical vigor and mental faculties, and as time rolls on the appetite shows no sign of returning, but on the contrary alcohol is to me to-day as if it did not exist.

JNO. A. RONALD,
110 Hoyne Ave.

Mr. Ronald was sent to The National Bichloride of Gold Institute by the Advertising Manager of THE UNION SIGNAL, and he gladly indorses what Mr. Ronald says in regard to his own case.

TO STUDY THE BIBLE.

Mr. Moody's Bible Institute in Chicago is making great preparations for the coming winter and next year, with especial reference to the need there will be for aggressive Christian work among the vast crowds who will visit the Fair. Two new stories upon the main building are about completed. These will afford accommodations for one hundred additional men. Mr. Moody, himself, expects to spend a large portion of the year '93 in Chicago, and is trying to secure leading men from the old country and America to preach the Gospel in English and other languages, and also to give instructions in the Institute, in addition to the regular corps of teachers.

Those who enter the school in October, or as soon after that as possible, will have the best opportunities in the work. In accepting applicants, preference will, of course, be given to those expecting to stay throughout the year. None are admitted but such as are preparing for some form of Christian work.

It seems likely that more room will have to be provided for the Women's Department in order to accept all the promising applicants.

Special attention will be paid to the work of the Musical Department of the Institute. It is proposed to gather and train a large male choir, to sing at the services to be held during the World's Fair, and extra privileges will be granted to pupils having exceptionally good voices, who will remain during that period. The musical terms begin the first Tuesdays of October, January, April and July.

All inquiries regarding any of the Departments should be addressed to Bible Institute, 80 Institute Place, Chicago, Ill.

NEW BOOK..

This is an opportunity which should be improved. This book is entirely different from any heretofore on the market, and will be in greater demand because it will be enjoyed by business men as well as by their families. Not many books are written which appeal to business men as this does. Those who have read it, voluntarily testify to its merits in this direction. A prominent and wealthy business man of his city who employs

HUNDREDS OF MEN

Wishes to place it in the hands of each one that they may be benefited by its teachings. This is valuable indorsement. It will be of especial help to young men

JUST STARTING in BUSINESS LIFE

Employer and employed, as showing where the shoals lie upon which they may make shipwreck. The influence of is also portrayed with power, and that of a noble-minded daughter, in restraining destructive tendencies is outlined in detail in the course of the narrative. The fallacy of the belief, "I can use it or let it alone" is fully exposed. The circulation and reading of this book will be a blessing to thousands.

WHAT?

Why, the beautiful

Souvenir Spoon

which we have been preparing for our workers and all making a collection of spoons. Could it be more complete in design? It shows the beginning of the Great Reform in the bowl, where is pictured the little Crusade Church in Hillsboro, whence it sprang.

The culmination is emblemized in the World, belted with the White Ribbon at the extreme end, while the Medallion of the President of the National and the World's W. C. T. U. is embowered in the National Floral Emblem, the trailing arbutus.

On the reverse side are the World's Floral Emblem, the water lily, as also are the initials of the great Official Publishing House, which secured the production of the spoon.

Of course, every one will want one or more of these spoons—want them for personal use and as gifts. And we have decided to reduce the profits on the same to the lowest point of safety, so as to enable more to buy them.

NOTICE.—They are offered at a lower price than any sterling silver spoon on the market. Here are our rates for the different styles, all made of Solid Sterling Silver:

THE Children's Building at the World's Fair will be unique. Play rooms and playgrounds, with attendants and a large assembly-room, where stereopticon and other entertainments will be given, will afford the children pleasure and enable the mothers to enjoy the exhibition.

A SCHOOL of applied design is to be opened in New York this fall which will train young women in designing for wall papers, cretonnes, carpets, etc. Prizes have been offered already by some prominent manufacturers. A class to train architects' draughtsmen will also be formed.

IN the British Medical Association, the rule declaring women ineligible has been rescinded. A woman, too, is to speak at the next church congress, a circumstance that so excites one poor preacher that he feels himself obliged to resign from all committees if so unscriptural a proceeding be allowed.

A SUMMER school among the mountains has been held in Japan this summer, and was attended by over two hundred students, mostly native men and women. Two themes seem to have been interwoven with all the native addresses, the symmetrical development of the individual Christian life and the national need of Christianity.

HOUSEKEEPERS will be interested perhaps in the story that we are indebted to the Pompeiians for one of our most important industries, viz., canning. A bright Yankee happened to be present at some excavations when some jars of hermetically sealed fruit were unearthed. He caught the idea, and as a result, we have canning factories everywhere.

A RECENT census bulletin deals with the statistics of homicide in the United States. Of the number of homicides, 56.14 per cent is chargeable to native population, and 43.86 to the foreign element. Over 61 per cent could read and write, and over 3 per cent had received a higher education. More than four-fifths had learned no trade. There were twelve hundred and eighty-two total-abstainers, three thousand moderate drinkers and over twelve hundred drunkards.

Your Local Ticket Agent will give you full particulars in regard to these Harvest Excursions; arrangements can also be made in this connection to visit the desirable Railroad Lands for sale by the Illinois Central in Southern Illinois on obtaining special permission to do so by addressing the Company's Land Commissioner at Chicago, Mr. E. P. Skene. In addition, a few weeks before the first Excursion date, your Local Ticket Agent will be able to furnish you with a special Folder, issued by the Illinois Central, which will give you particulars of these Harvest Excursions in such form as will enable you to plan your journey at home. Should you not be within call of a railroad ticket agent, address A. H. Hanson G. P. A., Illinois Central R. R., Chicago, Ill.

CONCESSIONS TO NAVAL AND GRAND ARMY VETERANS.

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad will grant most liberal concessions in the way of stop-over privileges on the tickets sold for the Reunion of the Naval Veterans at Baltimore, September 15th to 19th, and for the Grand Army Encampment at Washington, commencing September 20th. Tickets will be sold at the offices of the Company and at offices of the principal railroad companies of the West, from September 13th to 20th, inclusive, at very low rates, and will be valid for return journey until October 10th. Both going and returning tickets will be good to stop off at all stations between Cumberland and Baltimore, a region rendered familiar to all veterans by the constant warfare along the Potomac. The signature of purchaser to tickets will not be required, nor will it be necessary to have them stamped to make them valid for return journey.

Volume XVIII. CHICAGO, September 29, 1892. Number 39

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Colonel P. S. Gilmore, the famous musician, died in St. Louis on Saturday.

Mrs. President Harrison has been removed to the White House and her health is slowly improving.

The Governor of Illinois has declared October 21, Columbus Day, to be a holiday in his state.

The committee on ceremonies for Columbus Day has decided to grant ten minutes to the reading of Miss Monroe's ode.

The Scotch members in the English House of Commons are rebelling against the Liberal government introduced by Mr. Gladstone.

A frightful railroad wreck near Wooster, O., on the Ft. Wayne route, September 21, killed outright a score of people and injured as many more.

The Christian people of the West Side of Chicago have taken decided measures against the stores that sell on Sunday, pledging themselves not to patronize those merchants.

Major General John Pope, who was distinguished in the Civil War by his heroic advance upon Corinth, Miss., in May, 1862, died at Sandusky, O., September 23, in his seventieth year.

Dr. C. H. Parkhurst, the famous New York City pastor, has returned from Europe, where he spent the summer investigating the collusion of the police and other municipal authorities with the criminal and law breaking classes. He speaks highly of the English cities in this respect, but deplores the social condition of Paris, which he says is worse than that of New York.

MISSES WILLARD AND GORDON have taken passage on the steamer Etruria, which sails from Liverpool October 8.

HAMBURG has long been celebrated for bad water and "good beer." The old town is a filthy, wretched place; the new, or modern portion, elegant. With its filth and beer and steamers, it has an excellent outfit for scattering cholera over the civilized world.

IS IT a real kindness to the general manufacturing interests of the country to stimulate their growth as a hothouse forces plants? Granting that some government aid may be wisely extended to "infant industries," has not the policy of the government passed far beyond that stage? Aiding an "infant industry" is one thing, stimulating an overgrown business is quite another.

THE Republican campaign orators are setting forth the prosperity of manufacturers, the increase in "plants," the rapidly growing wages, as reasons why the policy of protection should be continued. All this is interesting reading to farmers, who innocently ask, "Why not?" With a policy which turns a stream of gold into the manufacturers' pockets, what is to hinder the growth of manufacturing?

THE National Committee of the Prohibition party are trying to give those who did not go to Cincinnati the same opportunity afforded to those who were there, namely, the privilege of giving. It is easy to see how a liberal contribution will help to even things up. It cost something to make the trip to Cincinnati, and then those present made their pledges. Now is the time for those who saved their money at the time of the convention.

MRS. MARY CLEMENT LEAVITT, who started on an extensive western lecture trip a few weeks ago, has already reached Utah on her way to California and Honolulu for the winter. She will not return to the East earlier than July, 1893. Her eastern address remains the same (care Messrs. Kidder, Peabody & Co., Boston), but all desiring her services in the middle and western states will address her care of L. H. Clement, U. S. Mint, San Francisco, Cal.

ELECTIONS have recently occurred in Maine, Vermont and Arkansas. In Maine there were four tickets in the field—Republican, Democratic, Prohibition and People's. The latter two had prohibition platforms and the People's candidate has been acting with the Prohibitionists. The vote as now reported shows a handsome gain of one thousand and forty-eight over the prohibition vote in 1888. There was a heavy falling off of the Republican vote. Vermont also shows a gain of two hundred and seventy-eight as reported. Arkansas nearly or quite doubles her prohibition vote. All this is very encouraging. The great danger is that voters will become discouraged. "What is the good" they ask "of fighting an ever losing battle?" It is the same good as putting leaven in flour. At last in some unexpected way the thing will be done and the monstrous cancer on our civilization will drop away. It is the same good as "patient continuance in well doing" which achieves "eternal life."

IT is a curious fact that Mr. and Mrs. Peloubet, whose Sunday school temperance lessons are of wide reputation and among the very best in Christendom, should have felt called upon to place the following note before Lesson 13 (September 25th) of the International Sunday-school Series. This is what the Peloubets say: "Note that the lesson selected by the Honorable International committee for a temperance lesson and entitled 'The Lord's Supper Profaned,' I Cor. 11:20–34, has so very little to do with temperance that much question has been raised as to what course to take in regard to it. The Baptists have decided to omit the first three verses and present a lesson on the Lord's Supper. All who keep to the text must practically do the same. With great reluctance and diffidence in varying from the program of the committee, who have been in the main wonderfully wise and skillful in the selection of lessons, after no little counsel we have decided to make the lesson a temperance lesson, choosing our own subject."

NEVER had good men so grand a chance as is offered in the approaching election. The mere money questions, "tariff," "protection," "silver" are entirely safe, no matter which party wins the presidency. Adroit orators with painful efforts are able to make out a case against the "other party" from the stump, but the "other party" is equally successful in its turn. The differences would never be recognized by the people in actual practice. Then the candidates are eminently respectable men. Either of them would measure up to the average citizen, perhaps higher. Both as men and as the exponents of an idea they are about as wide apart as "tweedle dum and tweedle dee." Now is the time for good men to vote for their "great principle"—that which they have declared for the last eight years they "would vote for in a minute if it would do any good." The absence of their vote from the old parties will do no harm. Not an interest will perish; just as in the past, so in the future, no money interests will suffer. All parties will take care of the money—not so the morals. Suppose a million voters, or better yet, suppose the four millions of good citizens, (Christians) should vote for General Bidwell and prohibition, what then? Do you imagine there can be any party in power which will not lend a very attentive ear to this four millions, and politely and deferentially inquire, "Please, what do you want?" And don't you fancy you can see that national syndicate of distillers, brewers, saloon keepers, gamblers, es id omnes genus, shrinking into smaller proportions, and displaying less arrogant airs? And what a grand thing it would be, if that should be the end of it, if the party in power, observing the trend of events, should steal the Prohibitionists' thunder, enact the appropriate legislation, and serenely plant the nation's flag one terrace higher, one stage nearer to the last citadel to be won for perfect government.

P. S.—This item is intended to be read to the male members of the family, as an exercise in elocution.

A VALUED Washington correspondent writes under date of September 21 as follows, concerning the Grand Army of the Republic encampment: "We had the greatest parade on record in this city yesterday. It began at 9:30 a. m., and the last division passed the reviewing stand after six p. m. Pennsylvania alone had over fifteen thousand men in line. Ex-President Hayes walked at the head of the Ohio troops, and received an ovation all along the line. The old battle flags, all rags and strings, aroused the greatest enthusiasm, as did the first flag of the war. The old veterans have literally taken the city by storm. You can see nothing but red, white and blue, and hear nothing but brass bands and drum corps. All say there will never be another such a reunion or such a parade. It was evident yesterday, as the columns moved along, that the 'boys' were no longer young. White beards were many, and there were few that were not plentifully streaked with gray. The saloons are profusely decorated. 'Welcome G. A. R. Veterans' is over all drinking places. One boy, after studying those letters for a while remarked, 'I suppose that means "Going After Rum," don't it?'"

A POLITICAL organ that shall be nameless has the following editorial paragraph: "Prohibitionists reveal the true inwardness of the sacrifice alleged to have been made by their candidate for President in the destruction of his vineyards when he became a convert to their doctrines. Mr. St. John lets the cat out of the bag by the statement that Mr. Bidwell tried the experiment of wine-making and lost over $50,000. He then became tired and sold out his vineyard, giving away to hospitals the wines he could not sell. It is a fair illustration of the sort of Christianity these men profess and practice." Human nature is real backwards in these lines; the editor is thinking what motive would have been requisite to make him quit raising grapes for wine! That is our first instinctive commentary, but our better, later one, is this: Doubtless the editor did not know that General Bidwell one day saw some young men coming out of his winery in a maudlin state, and was so wrought upon that the next morning he called together his men and told them to root up the vines. This is the fact upon unquestioned testimony. The great trouble with us all is that we don't know. We are constantly obliged to think, speak and write about things of which we are practically ignorant. If this editor only knew General Bidwell, his noble, genial character could not fail so to impress the man of the quill that he would dip up eulogistic instead of defamatory ink in writing of him.

THE chief questions which agitate the public mind during the pending campaign are those relating to the rights of labor and the outlawry of the saloon. These are so intimately associated as to be virtually only one. At a gathering of the W. C. T. U. near South Waukegan, Ill., recently, on the occasion of the presentation of two valuable lots by the founders of the town to aid in developing the work of the organization, one of the gentlemen in his address stated that a manufacturer who was seeking a site for a large factory, said he would give fifty thousand dollars more for a location where prohibition was assured than for any other spot, howscever well adapted for his purpose, where the saloon existed; that loss of time and breakage in his works from the drink habits of workmen amounted in the aggregate to twenty thousand dollars per year. A question for serious consideration is this: If it costs manufacturers so much when their workmen use liquor, how much do the laboring men sacrifice? That manufacturers appreciate the benefits arising from the prohibition of the saloon is apparent in the fact that both the new manufacturing towns in the vicinity of Chicago, Harvey and South Waukegan, have embodied a provision in their deeds which will forever outlaw the liquor traffic, and one has presented two lots and the other five lots to aid in W. C. T. U. work, viz.: the education of public sentiment to the support of total abstinence for the individual and legal prohibition for the state.

O DAY DIVINE!

BY FATHER C. A. WALWORTH.

What sounds are these like thunder peal,
With tramp of feet and clash of steel?
The Rhine! The Rhine! The Christian's Rhine!
On, brothers, on to guard the line!
O day divine, have thou no fear;
Thy faithful watch is always here.

The shopman closes till and store;
The workman's tool is heard no more;
Sweet bells with music fill the air,
They call the land to praise and prayer.
O day divine, have thou no fear;
Thy faithful watch is always here.

What malcontents are these we meet,
Low discord growling through the street?
Freedom they ask, with beer and wine,
To desecrate the day divine.
O day divine, have thou no fear;
Thy faithful watch is always here.

Look up! Look up! A spirit band,
Our fathers sentinel the land.
This day of rest is their bequest;
Its shield shall be the Christian's breast.
O day divine, have thou no fear;
Thy faithful watch is always here.

So long as Christian pulses beat—
So long as Christian freemen meet—
We lift our gauntlets to the sky,
And swear to guard the legacy.
O day divine, have thou no fear;
Thy faithful watch is always here.

The above, one of the best songs for use in Sabbath Observance meetings is written by a Catholic priest, to be sung to the tune of "Die Wacht Am Rhein."

SOME PASSAGES IN THE PRACTICE OF DR. MARTHA SCARBOROUGH.

BY HELEN CAMPBELL.

CHAPTER VII.

To the astonishment of the whole village, Johnny, on the old Squire's return, was left still at Dr. Scarborough's. That both of the children spent much time with him made no difference, and the conclave in the village store settled to its own satisfaction that either the Squire had aged so that he could not resist the doctor's masterful ways, or that some new streak in the Templeton blood ha brought about this indifference to natural ties; and haing settled it, began again at the beginning finding perpetual food for wonder and fresh speculation.

"Nathan," the old Squire had said, on the day of their home-coming, "I depend on you to strengthen me against myself. I won't have the boy where my own weakness and is aunt's folly will bring him down again into the pit we had made for him. Do you know where I got the strength to make up my mind he should stay with you? From the man that watched poor Tom's last days and for six months kept him from drinking a drop. It always was a puzzle to me that Tom's money had been put into a fruit farm, ranch it might better be called, for there are three hundred acres and you never saw such a sight as those vineyards are; raisins by the ton, and prunes, too, and the whole of them half living on them, but how they roped in Tom nobody could understand but the man that did it. I'd turn Johnny over to him this minute if I had not even more faith in you than in him.

"Tom made money straight through. It was born in him and they say he was one of the most brilliant lawyers in the city. But once in so often everything went to smash, and he went on a spree that lasted till everybody thought he would never come out again, but die a gutter drunkard. They gained on him and he swore that when it got so he had to have them once a month he'd cut his throat or make way with himself somehow. He was strong as a lion, but he weakened more each time and he knew the end was coming. He made a fight for it, they all say. The last time he was sober for three months, and saw the other men drinking without even a look that showed he wanted it. Then, one day in court, his plea just over, and one that swept everything before it, he looked round for a minute, put his hand to his head and went out. 'It's on me again,' he said, and ran without hat across to the nearest saloon. The keeper knew his ways. Tom didn't come out for a week, and when he did, dead silent as he always was after these turns, the client whose case he had gained, was waiting for him. It was this man who has the ranch, Proctor, who had been finding out all he could about him. 'You're to come with me,' he said, and led him straight to the wagon he had there. 'I've an appointment to be kept,' Tom said; 'you must take your turn in order.' 'Engagements with the devil ain't binding,' Proctor said, and before Tom could make fight he had him in the wagon and was driving toward the station. 'You're not going to the devil as long as I'm alive,' he said. 'I've been just where you are and escaped. You shall have the same chance I had.'

"It's your own notion of things, Nathan. This Proctor had been one of your periodical drinkers like Tom; had lived on high seasoned dishes, no appetite and only wanting something that had flavor enough to help him to swallow it. He knew how Tom would be. He knew that before a month was out he would be deep in another debauch, and that he was bound to drink himself to death in one of them. 'If you'll follow my orders to the letter you won't want a drop, not a drop,' he said, for he told me the whole talk as many times as I asked for it, till I had it all in my head. 'The Lord himself couldn't stop me when once I'm headed that way,' Tom said. 'I tell you it's in the blood.'

"'There's nothing in the blood that isn't made by your own act,' said Proctor. 'If you eat things that parch up your mucous membrane till it's mad for moisture, and that stimulate the stomach till it's like red-hot metal and sizzes till you think nothing on earth but whisky or brandy can cool it off, you're the maker of that condition and not the Lord. What you've got to do is to give everything you've been soaking in alcohol a chance. Drop your curries and high-spiced ragouts, and all the messes you drinkers live on—that I lived on myself till I found out the madness of it. Hard? Well, yes. I'd rather have swallowed a hogshead of any patent medicine you choose to mention than to have had to use my will, but it's will that has got to work and will that will cure you when you've learned where it is worth while to make it take its stand. God curses no man with a thing from which there is no escape. You can be free and you shall.'

"That's the way he talked, Nathan, and what he did was just this: He took him home, put him into the pleasantest room in the house, and for weeks made him live on grains, fruit and vegetables. Proctor could talk about a peach or an apple till you began to wonder the Lord allowed you the privilege of anything so beautiful and satisfying for food. Pythagoras himself couldn't have discoursed on beans with half the fluency of this long-legged Yankee, who had drunk himself pretty nearly into his grave and been cured by them. He depended on them for strength, and he had ciphered out what each kind of food did, and how it could fit into the scheme. You know more about it than I do, Nathan. The only thing I can swear to is that he told the truth. Tom didn't drink a drop after he got into his hands, and didn't want to, though he hankered after his high living same as I should; but when he found that it worked just as Proctor had told him: that the appetite went to sleep as it were, and his lookout was not to throw in anything that would wake it up, he minded as if he'd been a baby. He studied all the books Proctor had, and all the reports from cures that had anything about food treatment in them, and he was making up his mind to start a sanitarium of some sort right on that spot, and teach men how to get even with the devil nobody had ever taught them was of their own making. If it hadn't been for that heart trouble, Nathan, he'd be living to-day. He meant to come home and have it out with me, and get Johnny started on the right track, but he went so quick that nobody but Proctor knew just what he wanted.

"I confess I didn't feel sure of the man, and thought there might be screws loose, and his share of the ranch bigger than law would make it, when he wrote me that he and Tom had gone into partnership, and next to no papers to show for it. I'm ashamed to think how I doubted him. Poor Tom had no chance to carry out his notion, Nathan, but his heart was so set on it part of his money ought to go that way. If there's stuff enough in Johnny to understand what the thing means, I wish he could carry out his father's wish some day. I'd like the Templeton name to take a turn like that. It's my own fault that Tom went the way he did; but I knew no more than he, that what a man eats may be his making or his marring, and how should I? Nobody ever thought of such a thing in my young days, and it's queer, even now, when one knows well enough what a thing may do to him he'll go on eating it just the same, and think a pill, or something in a bottle is going to straighten matters. That's the way it works with me and I used to think I had will enough for ten. I don't like the responsibility; I'd rather be under orders."

"No man is free till he is under his own orders, and master of himself," Dr. Scarborough said, after a pause, in which the old Squire looked at him considerately, his mind still on the new puzzles.

"The way things are going," he said finally, "a man can't let himself go as most of us always have. If there's any self-respect left, and for that matter, whether there is or not, he's got to face the fact, that with all the knowledge of to-day, he is much more of an accountable being than at any minute since time began. The trouble seems to be, where to draw the line between being a crank and a rational being. There's no doubt Proctor was a good deal of a crank, for before I left there he had about settled that cooked food had better be given up, and grain and fruit take its place. Man is a cooking animal. That seems to be one main difference between us and the beasts.

"I can't go any such notion as his last, but it is certain those that he began with did the work he wanted them to. I tried them myself, and never felt so well in my life, though I had some powerful hankerings after my old flesh-pots. The long and short of it is, Nathan, while there is no formal will but the old will that left everything to Johnny, I know what Tom wanted, and I want you to draw on me for anything you will need to build some sort of a place where you can carry out some of your own notions, and take special cases that most likely couldn't be coaxed into any regular Asylum or Home. You've always been wishing you could, and here is your chance if you choose to take it. I want to see it begun at least before I die, and some of the harm I have done atoned for, as far as it can be. The mischief is, if you've been a fool, there doesn't seem to be any atonement, but you take the consequences as you go. Lord help us all!"

"That is the charge each generation has to bring against the last," Dr. Scarborough said as the old Squire put out his hand. "Lucky for us that we can throw off the weight here and there on our ancestors, and more lucky that we are more able to see just how far they saddled us with burdens, which, if they can't be dumped at once like Christian's, in the 'Pilgrim's Progress,' can, at any rate be picked to bits slowly. I shall do what I can, my old friend, and glad enough the chance has come. Many a time men have said to me, 'If you had me under your own eye, doctor, I might do what you want, but here at home I can't.' We'll see what can be done for them, and who knows but that it may end in having Johnny at the head of it?"

"By the great horn spoon!" the old Squire shouted, "if he lives he can! I never thought of that! Cure him and I'll leave every dollar to you if he dares object."

"He won't. His tendencies are plain enough," the doctor answered and went his way.

ENGLISH ELECTION ISSUES.

BY LADY HENRY SOMERSET.

The elections are over, and the Liberal party has, after a great struggle for power, at last been returned to office. Never before have elections been characterized by such great moral questions depending on the issue, and never before, probably, has woman's influence been so strongly felt as during these last few weeks. Mr. Gladstone's pamphlet condemning their enfranchisement raised the wrath of the Women's Liberal Association in the opening of the campaign, and although out of deference to their great leader, the Women's Liberal Federation agreed to keep home rule as the principal test question, there is no doubt that woman's suffrage and the temperance cause played as important a part in the political battle field as the subject of the future government of Ireland.

Early in May the Women's Liberal Federation held their Annual Council Meeting, and the subjects discussed by that great concourse were a witness to the wide out look and the splendid social reforms for which the women of our country are in these days standing. Women's trades unions, the labor questions, sentences for assaults on women and children, divorce laws, women on county and district councils, temperance legislation and the protection of child life, were amongst some of the principal topics; and the strong, calm, well balanced arguments and speeches made during those two days were eloquent testimonies to the power of woman in the governing of those larger home circles that we call nations. I think that on the whole I agree with Mr. Cleveland, thus far, in believing that it is a pity that individual women's names should be associated with political clubs or circles, not because her sphere is to be limited to the four walls of home and the reflected glory to be gained by her alliance with a politician, but for the reason that the question is too wide and too all important to be personal, because every woman should take her place, not to govern by individual influence or by the special prerogative of her position, but by that divine right by which she stands equal with man in the order of creation. The discussions of the Women's Liberal Federation were the best object lessons as to the absolute necessity for woman's voice to be heard on those state questions which affect the individual and the home. Questions which it seems to me are of far more infinite importance than the remote possibilities of war, and the financial schemes which after thousands of years of study still leave our civilized countries bowed under the burden of poverty and pauperism.

Notwithstanding, however, the protest of the Liberal leader against the participation of women in political life, many and numerous were the calls on all sides for women speakers when the warfare of the election began in real earnest, and the list of engagements was formidable for every woman who was willing to take her share in the campaign. I understand that very exaggerated reports have reached America as to the treatment that women received on public platforms. I do not for a moment believe that anything but a little rough play was ever exhibited towards any speakers, save perhaps on one or two occasions when they went into the fray with eyes open as to the possible consequence and when they were forced to make a stand, not for the winning of the popular cause, but for the principles of truth and purity.

The question of the Popular Veto was of course one of the most prominent, and the Women's Liberal Federation has this year, for the first time, formed a strong temperance sub committee; this is an unlooked for advance in the right direction and we are thankful to have obtained such an onward movement. With the exception of four or five members, the whole of the Gladstonian party are now pledged to temperance reform and I safely assert that had it not been for the strenuous efforts of the women of this country, nobly supported by the men who have long had this cause at heart, such a state of things would not now be the case. We are looking to the Popular Veto to do much for us in the way of the removal of existing licensed houses; we have, as you are aware, no possibility of state governments; all legislation must include the whole country and we are not able to make experiments in the same way that you do in America, consequently we have to look to the advanced opinions of certain places for the exclusion of the liquor traffic, and thus we hope to gain examples of prohibition towns and country districts.

The brewers have opposed this measure with all the strength of their great resources, combined action and immense wealth. Beer has flowed during the past election like water, and in many places placards announcing the fact that the best brew could be obtained for a penny a gallon, have disgraced our streets; but in spite of "beer and benevolence" in the shape of sums given to local charities and churches, right has triumphed and the time will come when the greatest struggle in the temperance history of our country will soon begin in the House of Commons. Both great parties in the state have again and again reiterated the necessity for some legislation, and to day the people of England, shamed by the sight of the temptation that is legalized in their midst, stirred by the bitter lesson of the nation's drink bill, and moved by a lofty and loving zeal for the cause of home, demand with no uncertain voice that such legislation shall be immediate and effective.

We have been caught by no passing burst of enthusiasm. We proclaim no new principle, ill-considered and untried, in protesting the people's right to sanction or forbid a crying evil by their vote. It is not in the turmoil of public life that we have evolved the principles of reform; they have been revealed to us in the sacred seclusion of home: they have been taught us by drink-ruined lives, and we have been fired with a determination born of no passing enthusiasm to protect the on-coming generation. Therefore, by incorporating the direct veto in the Newcastle program, the Liberal party has only shown itself sensible of the nation's wish. We are asking Parliament to give to the people a right which already belongs inalienably to them by all democratic axioms.

I had the honor and pleasure of addressing many meetings, night after night for various candidates, and with one exception always met with courtesy and kindness. I have never valued any opportunity more than those great meetings, at which I was able to speak of the sacredness of the vote and to appeal to the hearts of men to use it for God and home, and the response that came on all hands, from the roughest mining population to the cultivated and refined business men of our large cities, proved to me that the conscience of our electors is awaking to the fact that the exercise of the vote is an integral part of true Christianity, and that the hallowing influences of the home and the church need to be brought into the domain of politics in order that the great Christian majority may take possession of the land to sweep it clean from the curses of the liquor traffic, the defilements of impurity and the ravages of war.

Besides the temperance question, however, there was another issue raised at this election, which was as important as any, i. e., whether men who had lost their fair name could stand as the representatives of our country in Parliament. The election of Sir Charles Dilke was perhaps the severest blow that we have received for many years, but when calmly considered we realize that the very fact of the opposition raised to his return is a striking proof of the advance of public opinion. Although the man who opposed him was a brewer, it became evident that it was the duty of all temperance reformers to support him against the candidature of Sir Charles Dilke, because our greatest hope with regard to temperance legislation lies not only in the legislation itself, but in the arousement of the conscience of the nation to demand protection against that which they see to be an evil, and it is impossible to arouse such a conscience on one question if it is dead on another; it is impossible for men who are not true and loyal to carry forward any reform measures for home protection, for we must stand against all that shall violate the sacredness of home and lower the standard of womanhood.

The issue of this election was not whether or no we believed in home rule, whether or no we hold that legislation would mitigate the drink curse, or state interference crush the hydra headed difficulties of the labor problem, but it was whether or no the man was to be returned to Parliament who had wronged a woman, who had blighted a home, who had stained a fair name, who had done to others as no man could face his doing were his wife or daughter in question, whether or no such a man was to have a place in the great assembly on which we daily ask God's blessing. The temperance question, the purity question and the labor question, are all part and parcel of the great moral question; the enemy attacks in force, first one and then another of our advance posts, and if we are not to rally to the defense of the threatened outpost, we shall be cut up piecemeal and never make any progress. There is a kind of obstinate, irrational sectarianism that has in so many instances paralyzed the temperance cause because we have not been able to take the wider outlook, and to see that if we once disintegrate one great moral issue from the others we weaken the whole edifice at once. It was therefore with sincere regret that I found that many of the temperance and labor people were supporting Sir Charles Dilke, and that in spite of many prayers and strong feeling on the question, he was returned to Parliament, but the fact that the list of ministers has now appeared, and that the name of a man so talented and so valuable is conspicuous by his absence, is a proof of what a strong public sentiment has wrought.

The most helpful feature, however, about the past struggle, the palm of victory that we wave aloft after the fight and prize more than any party conquest, is the fact that the days are coming when election times shall be solemn seasons, when prayer shall consecrate the ballot box, and when the vote shall be cast as man's highest pledge to God and humanity; the corruption, bribery and contemptible party spirit and miserable recrimination of the past shall cease to be, when on election day the saloons shall be closed and the churches opened—and for these things woman cannot too quickly come into her kingdom.

These are days surely when everywhere women are raising a triumphant song of praise for the glorious work that God is giving unto their hands. They are times of such intense interest that every true woman's heart must beat with a pulsation of quickened life; times when we at last understand the full meaning that has been hidden through the centuries, of God's intentions for women, for was it not reserved for us to tear away the veil that has hidden the signification of God's word? Has the Lord not spoken to us in this nineteenth century, and are not the women ready to publish that word verily a great host? These are days when God is revealing to us light hitherto hidden from our sight. The testimonies of history, science, physiology, pathology, are all unfolding before our eyes further revelations which are to us the very inspiration of God. We need to have our senses keenly sharpened, our ears ready to catch the sound of His voice, and our eyes open to the signs of the times, in order to be fitting instruments for that He is entrusting to our care. But above all we need a divine enthusiasm, we need a flame of love fanned into constant life by the breath of God Himself.

I am more and more deeply impressed how all-important, all-powerful, is woman's work; and each day brings to me more clearly the fact that God has undoubtedly raised up the ministry of women in this latter end of the nineteenth century, and that literally His words are being fulfilled; "And on my servants and on my handmaidens I will pour out in those days of my spirit." With bowed head, and yielded, consecrated heart, must we each one of us receive the divine baptism of power, and be ready to go forth with no lagging footsteps or half-hearted zeal, no fearful looking backward at forsaken conventionalities or the burning idols of ease and luxurious leisure.

All real success must mean suffering; no great cause has ever yet been won for which men were not prepared to suffer and to die. We may not see the triumph always on this side, we may not hear the shout that tells of victory, but we are at least among those who have made the track along which thousands shall yet pass in safety; and if we pause and listen above the tumult of the world we hear the beating of ten thousand feet of those that follow on; we may be swept away perchance in the swift, relentless current of time, but we made the path down to the water's edge and the voices of triumphant multitudes are yet coming that way.

TAXATION AND THE POOR.

BY REV. C. H. ZIMMERMAN.

Chapter V.

THE LIQUOR TAX.

The most hurtful of all forms of indirect taxation is the liquor tax. What Edward Atkinson says of the effect of indirect taxation upon the poor is preëminently true of the liquor tax. "It finds them poor, keeps them poor, and in many cases reduces them to pauperism."

One odious peculiarity of the indirect tax is that it is levied upon one class of persons with the intent that it shall be paid by another. In this case the tax is levied on liquor makers and sellers with the understanding that they are to reimburse themselves at the expense of consumers. This they do by charging the latter three or four hundred per cent more than the liquor cost. No other business pays such enormous profits as the liquor business. Dealers can well afford to pay the government tax of ninety cents a gallon on spirits, and forty-eight cents on malt liquors—and in addition thereto, many times more than has ever yet been assessed for local license.

The highest saloon license I have heard of is $1,600 I have seen a calculation of the profits of the business in Chicago, which shows that the trade could pay $10,000 license each, on enough saloons to supply all the demand and yet make immense profits. Such a license fee would make a monopoly of the business by crowding out small saloons where the patronage is not large enough to meet this expense and leave a profit; but while it would reduce the number of saloons, it would not lessen consumption, since two or three large saloons in each block could sell as much as a dozen smaller ones.

This partly explains why so many large dealers favor high license, and shows the fallacy of the reason assigned by some good people for supporting the license system, that it "restricts the traffic." While it does not lessen the terrible ravages of drink, it does make these same good people partners in the business, and partakers of the price of blood.

The other part of the explanation why liquor dealers favor high license is that the large revenue it furnishes for local expenses and improvements reconciles many people to the existence in their midst of an admitted evil. Many a man who would not consent to have an unlicensed saloon within reach of his children or business, makes no objection to high licensed saloons, because he believes their fees will lessen his taxes. If his belief were in accordance with the facts, his position would be none the less indefensible and shameful; but it is not true that the revenue derived from the liquor traffic lessens other taxes. It has been demonstrated that for every dollar a community receives from license, it pays thirty dollars in cost of police, criminal proceedings, poorhouses, asylums, accidents, and many other expenses caused by the traffic. The liquor tax neither restricts the traffic nor pays a tithe of its money-cost to the public.

The main argument for indirect taxation is that it protects and encourages beneficent industries; but the liquor tax gives legal status encouragement and protection to a business that is an unmitigated curse to the people. It makes government, local, state and national, an accomplice for a consideration in a business that impoverishes and debauches the morals of millions of citizens, makes criminals of hundreds of thousands, and kills annually near a hundred thousand people in the United States alone. Every saloon is a producer of immorality, a pauper factory and a crime factory, which taxation legalizes and protects.

By the liquor tax so called, Christian governments do what shocked the conscience of the heathen Emperor of China, who said: "I will never consent to derive a revenue from the vices of my people." He felt it would be a crime to do so. It is no less a crime in a popular government; but here the whole weight of the responsibility rests upon each voter. It is not divided or lessened because there are twelve millions of voters. Every individual who votes for local license or supports a political party which favors deriving a revenue, either local or national, from the traffic in intoxicating liquors, is as guilty of the crimes of that traffic as if he were the sole ruler of the nation.

There is no other way to locate responsibility in a government by the people. It is common to blame the government, administrations, and legislators. But these are made up of individuals elected to do the will of their constituents. We should appeal to the conscience of the individual voter, and show him that he is responsible for the deeds of the administration or party which he supports by his vote. The liquor tax derives a revenue from the vices of the people, and is, therefore, a crime against God and man. The voter who favors it is as guilty of that crime as the legislator who imposes the tax, or the executive who enforces its collection, and each is as responsible as if he alone had the power to suppress or perpetuate the traffic.

To those who regard these as dogmatic statements of extreme views, the answer is that absolute ethics declares ultimate truth, and is necessarily dogmatic.

A WORD OF SUGGESTION.

BY MARY WOOD ALLEN, M. D.

One thought consoles me for my disappointment in not being able to attend the National Convention this fall, and that is that I have been at Denver this summer, and so shall be able to be there in memory if not in fact. When I read of the proceedings I shall be able to see the beautiful church and can fill in the faces, and so almost make myself believe in after years that I really was there. I shall be able to understand the delight with which the delegates will look up into the clear and marvelously blue arch of heaven smiling over them; I know how the majesty of Pike's Peak will grow upon them day after day: I shall be able to appreciate their wonder at the elegance of the buildings, the whirl of business, the beauty of the homes, the facilities of transportation about the city.

I can in fancy see how cordially they will be met by the charming women of Denver who receive them as guests; I can see them filling the Woman's Exchange with a flutter of white ribbons and a buzz of earnest voices: I can see the beautiful dimples in the cheeks of the president of one of the Denver unions (I don't dare say which one, but those who go will find out); I can see other sweet and cordial faces glowing with that genial friendliness which seems to be a reflection of the white ribbon. Oh! I shall not miss all of the convention, even though I can't be there, and I know some things that those who go will not know, unless, perhaps, some one tells them, and may be that is my share of the work of the convention.

Many who go to Denver will not realize that they are going into an altitude of a mile above sea level, and this means several things. In the first place it means for many a long and tedious journey to get there, and therefore there is need of rest before beginning the labors of the convention, or the pleasures of sight-seeing. It means too, an atmosphere that is stimulating because of its rarified condition. The heart beats more rapidly, the breathing becomes quicker, and the first feeling with many is an exhilaration which leads them to think that they can never be tired in such a "glorious climate." The wise woman who appreciates the great change in her surroundings, and realizes that her physical organization ought to have a chance to adapt itself to this new condition, will not at once hurry off upon a round of sight-seeing, nor will she rush too ardently into the business of the convention. She will give herself time to rest after her journey; she will go slowly in order that her heart may not have too great a strain put upon it in its effort to adjust itself to the rarified atmosphere; she will not mistake the stimulus of the climate for actual influx of strength, and so she will take care not to get over-tired.

The unwise woman will do just the contrary of all this. She will imagine that she is as strong as Hercules and give herself no time to rest. She will supplement unavoidable work by rides and walks, by jaunts and trips, and, it may be, will break down before the convention is over. I wish all delegates from much lower altitudes and from long distances could have several days for rest before the actual convention work begins. I wish there could be more days of convention, and fewer hours in each day's labors; but these suggestions may not be practical. However, there is one I can make which will be eminently practical, and that is, to give heart and lungs an opportunity to accept the situation by "making haste slowly."

MRS. LEAVITT'S EXPERIENCES IN SOUTH AMERICA.

DEAR SISTERS OF THE W. C. T. U.:—During the day after my arrival in Rio de Janeiro, which was Sunday, I spoke to English speaking people at the regular morning service of the mission, and to Brazilians at the same church in the evening. American and English ladies came to the Mission House in the afternoon, and at the close of the lecture enough promised to join a union to make it certain, as we thought, and a meeting for organization was appointed for the next Tuesday afternoon. But even then yellow fever had invaded the house.

Some little time before Jean Carmallen, a Spanish colporteur, with his wife and twelve year old son, had landed at Rio, bringing excellent letters from Protestant pastors in Spain. As he had no money and wanted work, Mr. Tilly gave him the vacant post of care-taker in the church and allowed them to live in some unoccupied rooms in the basement of the mission house. Father and son ate heavily of unripe fruit on Saturday. On Sunday little Josie was attacked; on Tuesday the father was prostrated; on Wednesday Josie died and was buried; Saturday the father died and an English missionary to seamen was attacked and died on Tuesday.

Meetings were out of the question with yellow fever in the house, but as the ladies had promised, and Miss Marvin and Miss Morton could count on several then out of town because of fever and heat, I appointed the first provisional president, and the second provisional secretary for a local union, till such time as they can hold a meeting, organize and elect officers.

On account of the pestilence which was at its height, and was killing hundreds every day, I had intended to stay in Rio only from Saturday till Wednesday. But the steamer was delayed till Saturday; the dreaded disease, accompanied by death, came into the house and yet I was kept in safety.

The physician who attended the cases in the house said the most of poor people attacked were sent to hospitals outside the municipal limits; thus their deaths are not included in the daily report which he believed should be multiplied by three to show the true mortality numbering then four hundred and eight for the last day of my stay. About twice as many foreigners as natives die—about twice as many men as women. In this fact is another proof that alcoholic drinks not only do not ward off attacks of epidemic disease, but rather invite them.

Miss Marvin and Mr. Tilly remained at their posts, nursing the sick, comforting the dying, caring for widows and orphans. Greater heroism has not been shown in any visitation of pestilence.

At length the La Plata, having arrived, was ready to sail. Mr. Wesson, the sailor's missionary, accompanied me on board, and we bade adieu—he young and strong, I, old and shattered; but that very day the cruel fever attacked him, and in three days a solitary missionary mourner walked behind his mortal remains to the grave.

The passage of three days to Bahia was altogether pleasant, but the morning of our arrival it was whispered about that some third class passengers were sick of yellow fever. The city health officer came on board. All the sick were ordered into hospital, and all who wished to land into quarantine, but for three days only. Two pleasant Brazilian ladies, about twenty gentlemen and myself were the doomed ones. One of the ladies spoke French, a German gentleman, a resident of Bahia, spoke English. It was a great trial to him to add three days to his already long absence from his family, but he addressed himself to the task of cheering us, and began making such inquiries of the officials as to our accommodations that they changed our destination. I doubt not that our after comfort was owing very largely to the fact that he was of the party.

A little steamer carried us away forty miles to one of many small islands, where a doctor and purveyor received us into a sugar planter's mansion. I was so fortunate as to get a little room to myself. The gentlemen were turned into one large room.

When our term of imprisonment was over, the same "dug outs" (canoes) that landed us on arrival took us out into mid channel where we waited the passing of a regular steamer, and were picked up by it. The captain and principal owner of this steamer was a slave till the recent emancipation, a full-blooded, African born man.

The one meeting held for Brazilian women in Bahia was notable from the fact that more men came than women; the one English meeting could only be called "large and respectable," because beside a few women and children, the two men who came were—one large and both respectable. I spoke in two Brazilian churches on Sunday, and gave a series of three evening lectures to Brazilians that were very well attended. With only one lady, Mrs. Eintzminger, in town who was at all interested, and she unable to leave her house, organization was impossible, but it will be attempted when Presbyterian and other missionaries have returned and health is restored.

A men's temperance society was determined upon, constitution prepared and translated, and the first steps toward organization taken. Rev. Eintzminger and Mr. Ginsbury will take the lead in it. The work will be done in the Portuguese language.

Mr. Nind, who went to South America under Bishop Taylor, is as earnest-spirited in regard to mission work as ever, and devotes to it all the time he can spare from the teaching by which he supports himself and family. I could not but mourn that with the language so well at his command, he does not give all his time, and his wife hers, to the work they both love so well.

Mr. Nind began at once to make preparation and before the day closed it was arranged that I should speak the next three evenings in mission chapels, at their regular mid-week prayer-meetings, and twice on Sunday. The afternoon was offered to Mr. Holmes for a sailors' meeting. These were all happily carried out, the last named taking place on an English steamer.

Besides these a series of three lectures for Brazilians was proposed. Mr. Nind and I went to the Junta, or provincial assembly, to ask for the use of the hall of the School of Arts and Sciences. The Junta was not in session. We were referred to Gen. Ouveique Jacques, its leading member. After a little conversation in French, in which it was stipulated that the lectures should not be religious, but strictly scientific, General Jacques gave me a letter to Mr. Dacosta, the president of the society, recommending him to give the use of the hall. This was granted, and lectures were advertised in all the papers for Saturday, Monday and Tuesday evenings.

President Dacosta, who is a lawyer, was present Saturday evening, sat on the platform, and expressed himself as much pleased with the lecture. The meeting was indeed a very good one. On Monday evening, as Mr. Nind and I approached the building, several Brazilians told us they were driving the people away, saying there would be no meeting. My hall was lighted, but also another in the same building was filled with a standing crowd, talking and gesticulating very excitedly.

After passing through the gates we were met at the foot of the magnificent outside marble staircase by a gentleman, bare-headed, with outstretched hands, suiting his gestures to his words and shouting repeatedly, "Go back, go back, you cannot have a lecture here to-night." In reply to Mr. Nind's inquiry, he said he was the secretary of the society. Mr. Nind mentioned that we had leave from the president, but he only reiterated his statement. However, we went on up the stairs and entered our hall. No one was there. Immediately the crowd from the other hall came pouring in, but did not take seats. There were between one and two hundred of them; all were well dressed, apparently from fifteen to twenty years of age.

Again the secretary appeared, and in a more excited manner repeated what he said at the foot of the stairs. Then a seedy, broken down looking man, most fanatical in appearance, dashed in, shook his fists in Mr. Nind's face and at me, screamed out a volley of talk in which "Catholic," "Saints," "Protestants," "Devils," recurred often. Mr. Nind told me later it was a torrent of the vilest and most murderous abuse of Protestants.

About this time it was whispered that the Bishop and the president were in the room. Mr. Nind, at my request, went to ask an explanation. Soon he came back saying both the Bishop and the president were there, but he could not get speech of them. Several friendly persons had come in. Some of them told Mr. Nind the crowd was waiting to silence me by an uproar, should I begin to speak. About this time a young Brazilian spoke to me in excellent English. He said he heard the Saturday lecture, that he wished to hear the others, that he was ashamed and grieved by this behavior of his countrymen, that it was only another proof of the truth of what he had often told them since his return from England, that they were not civilized. "This," said he, "is bigotry and barbarism and has nothing to do with what you have said."

After the Bishop and president left the room nearly all the crowd drew off into the other hall, apparently under orders.

By this time it was evident that all who wanted to hear the lecture had been driven away. I put on my mantle and prepared to leave the hall. Some one made the suggestion that I should go out by the back door. I said, "I am an honorable woman, I came here for an honorable purpose, and I will go away by the front entrance by which I came."

As soon as I appeared at the door the crowd of youths set up a shout of triumph and rushed down the stairway; a brass band in the building began to play. When the stairs were clear enough I went down, Mr. Nind at my side. As I turned into the street my mantle was clutched, and I was obliged to pull hard to keep it on my shoulders. Then stones and clods began to fly; some went over our heads, some rolled about our feet. One stone hit me on the back of the knee joint, making a black spot nearly three inches in diameter. A spent stone struck me on my arm, and a clod broke against, and most of it lodged on the same arm. Two Brazilians joined us as we turned into the street. One of these and Mr. Nind were hit with a stone each, and the other with a clod, but none of them were injured. The crowd followed us several rods hooting at and pelting us. By the sound, it was evident they stood still a few seconds, then turned back. A group of six or eight policemen had been visible on the sidewalk. When the crowd ceased throwing stones and turned back, they moved forward, passing us silently.

The stones were big enough to have killed, and were thrown with that intent, as they were aimed at our heads. Several would have weighed a pound or more, and one fully two pounds.

"Were you not terribly frightened?" is the first question every one has asked me. I can truly say I was not. My heart did not quicken its beat, nor did I feel any inclination to hurry our pace. I knew I might be killed, but I knew that the Lord was just there by my side. It was very trying not to understand what was said, and not to be able to speak to the crowd. The next day I tried to see General Ouveique Jacques and President Dacosta; although in both instances the servants said they were in the house, the answer to my card was, "not at home." I then reported the occurrence to Mr. Stephens. United States consul, and to Mr. Cohen, British consul. In reply to inquiries made by Mr. Stephens, President Dacosta said I had kept carefully to my promise and said nothing which could aggrieve any Brazilian.

The presence of the Bishop in the building, the fact that the mob was not from the street, but of the pupils of the institution, and allowed, if not quartered, in the building, throws a blame upon him, and perhaps in a less degree upon the president.

It seems quite plain that the real cause of the outbreak was a report that Protestant missionaries and native pastors had been breaking images in the churches of Rio. What really happened in that city was that liberal Brazilians had removed images of saints from the Hall of Justice, considering that under religious toleration there should be no emblems of any sect in such a place.

Up to the present time, no expression of regret has been received.

Another meeting for ladies and one for English speaking people finished the work. Two ladies only were willing to join a union. A third was soon to return, and then the three will gather the Brazilian women into a union—perhaps a dozen, who are already total abstainers or who are willing to become such.

THANKS FROM MISSISSIPPI.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The saloon-keeper who recently instituted suit against five of the members of the W. C. T. U. at Flora, Mississippi, for $10,000, experienced a change of heart during a late revival of religion and joined the church. He intends to withdraw the case from the circuit court, which involved so much for us.

But the case in the supreme court, to which he took an appeal, has passed beyond his control. The question of legality will be decided this month. We are awaiting calmly, trusting that the decision pronounced by the circuit court last spring will be sustained, and the temperance cause in Mississippi triumph. Our trouble has terminated peacefully through God, who maketh even the wrath of man to praise Him.

I have been requested by the Flora W. C. T. U. to return heartfelt thanks for all the loving words of sympathy that came to them from the unions north and south when they were passing through the deep waters. Letters from Ohio, Illinois, Missouri, Minnesota and Mississippi contained sums of money to help defray the lawyers' fees, and many others proffered substantial aid.

We have been profoundly touched. We realize more deeply than ever the precious fact that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union has made the whole world kin. We clasp our sisters' hands in the north in cordial comradeship. You led the way for us in the greatest moral reform of the nineteenth century. We of the South stepped out from our conservatism to follow you gladly. You won our admiration long ago, and we reaffirm our honor, love and gratitude.

MILK GARDENS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Supposing that there is no other one paper that is read by so many women who are engaged in practical philanthropy and who are accustomed to turn thoughts to deeds, I send to the columns of THE UNION SIGNAL a brief account of an institution in the Old World which might be profitably copied in the New.

It was in Frankfort on the Main that we first heard of "Milk Gardens." We were visiting the famous Palm Garden, and approaching a hedge that seemed to form its farther limit, we heard the voices and laughter of numerous children. Peering through a barrier which we could not pass, we saw a field (it is too large to be called a court or yard) containing swings, hammocks, perambulators, tiny croquet grounds and many toys and games adapted to outdoor use. An army of children, ranging in age from a few months to ten or twelve years, was in possession of this field of delights. Scattered about among them were a number of strong, ruddy young women in the nurse's cap and apron, who cared for individuals or groups, according to the age of the little ones. Here and there were baby tents, play-houses and pavilions. On one edge of the field were some dainty stalls, each inhabited by a fine, mild-eyed cow.

Upon inquiry, I found that this was "The Milk Garden of Frankfort." The "Milk Garden" of this aristocratic old city is the most democratic of places. Here rich people who wish to be relieved for a time of the presence of their children send them, accompanied by their own nurses; and here poor people, who can neither afford to devote their own time to their children nor hire separate nurses for them, may bring their little ones, certain that from the garden nurses they will receive all the care and attention necessary to safety, health and amusement. Private nurses of the rich people and public nurses of the working people are subject to a supervision sufficient to protect the children of all classes from cruelty and neglect. The only food furnished in the garden is milk, whose freshness and purity are assured, inasmuch as it is drank warm as it is drawn from the udders of these healthy, clean, well-kept cows. Children may be left in care of the garden for the entire day, or for any portion of it, as the parents desire. The patronage of the garden includes children whose parents hire its benefits by the year, as they might rent a box in the theatre for the season; others, who come on certain days in each week when their mothers work away from home, and others still whose mothers gain a little respite by leaving them there while they go to market or take an excursion with the house father. The fees are very moderate, and so classified that they are lightest for the poor.

The garden is so administered that it is a self-supporting business enterprise and still is the means of much charity; a certain number of children always enjoy its benefits without price, but these pensioners of its bounty are not identified and therefore the democratic equality of the institution is not impaired.

What a blessing would such milk gardens be in our American cities! What a delightful supplement to the open-air stations maintained during the summer for the sick poor!

I was told that the milk garden is not a summer luxury, but, modified to suit the needs of different seasons, it is maintained throughout the year.

CATHOLIC WOMEN'S TEMPERANCE UNION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—For many years it has been a matter of deep regret to me that so few women of my own faith were engaged or interested in the all-important work of total abstinence, and I had long ago determined that I would never take a total abstinence pledge until I could take it with my Catholic sisters; that if I ever settled in a city I would endeavor to establish Catholic Women's Temperance societies.

The opportunity came to me by my anchoring in St. Louis. When I first met the Right Rev. Vicar General of the St. Louis Diocese, Father P. P. Brady, I recognized in him, aside from the perfect priest, a broad minded, public spirited, patriotic gentleman; one who had at heart not alone the welfare of his own people, but that of his country. Something seemed to say to me, here in this good priest you will find assistance in the purpose you have at heart. I said to him, "Father Brady, it is the hope of my life to see my Catholic sisters organized in temperance societies." Without an instant's hesitation he replied, "It is a grand idea; go on and I will do all in my power to help you." The next step was to visit the supreme council of the Knights of Father Mathew, explain my project, and get their indorsement and good will. Armed with all this encouragement, I sent out invitations for a meeting of ladies at my own home, June 10, 1892, at which we organized the Catholic Women's Temperance Union No. 1, with a membership of thirteen. Father Brady placed at our service St. John's Library Hall, and invited us to meet there as long as we pleased. We have had five meetings to date, and have now a membership of fifty seven. The following is our preamble:

Realizing the alarming growth of crime, immorality, destitution and the tendency to the destruction of home and its sacred influence through intemperance and the liquor traffic, and recognizing the value of organized effort in every line of work, therefore, in faith, love and Christian charity, we adopt the following constitution:

OBJECT.

The object of this union shall be to inculcate and promulgate the virtue of total abstinence, especially in the young. And by prayer, example and advice win others to the temperance cause.

Our badge is a knot of white ribbon, emblem of purity and indicating the purity of our purpose; attached to it a small silver cross with our initials C. W. T. U. inscribed on the arm, the cross being the promise of hope, the guarantee of life everlasting to all who believe in Christ Jesus who sanctified the cross for our sake.

We have already organized four departments with an efficient superintendent in charge of each, viz: Juvenile temperance work, dissemination of literature, flower mission, hospital work and the department of reformation.

We purpose organizing a union in every parish in the city; then through the state, each union to elect delegates who shall constitute a supreme body and will endeavor to make our organization a national one.

Our work is strictly on a line with true Catholic principles and we earnestly hope and ask for the hearty coöperation of all good Catholic women, and the prayer and good wishes of our Protestant sisters who desire the uplifting of all humanity regardless of creed, color or nationality.

Mr. John Mickle, Asbury Park, N. J., sent his check a short time ago to Mr. H. C. Speer for $10,000 with which to purchase Temple Trust Bonds. Mr. Mickle is not only a true and noble friend of the W. C. T. U., but a very far-seeing and sagacious business man. He saw that the bonds had the very best security back of them, and while being just as safe as government bonds, the interest paid on them was almost double that of the latter. We would like to have some more of our rich temperance men invest in Temple bonds. A few more such sales would close them out, and put us in the position to pay up the entire amount of Temple stock purchased from Marshall Field. This would place the control of the stock in the hands of the W. C. T. U., as we would then be the owners of over half of it. All letters in regard to the Temple trust bonds should be addressed to Mr. H. C. Speer, 237 La Salle street Chicago, or 412 Exchange Building, Boston, Mass.

Mrs. L. D. Quigley, Orange, N. J., the devoted daughter of the late Mrs. Sarah J. C. Downs, the loved and lamented president of New Jersey, has sent a check for $500 for a memorial window to be placed in Willard Hall in memory of her mother. Part of the inscription on the window will contain the last words uttered by Mrs. Downs: "The liquor traffic will be outlawed; blessed is he who hopes." Does this not sound like a prophecy? Many responses are coming in for the Madam Willard window. Mrs. Robert L. Greenlee, Chicago, pledges $25; Mr. Geo. C. Hall, New York, $10; Mrs. Margaret A. Watts, Louisville, $2; Millbrook, N. Y., W. C. T. U. sends $2; Portland, Me., W. C. T. U. sends $1. We are sure there could not be anything that would so delight the sad heart of our bereaved National president as a memorial window in Willard Hall to the memory of the mother she so revered. Can't we have the money ($500) all raised for it before Miss Willard returns? Would it not be a good plan for all unions to send $1 towards it? Then each would feel they had a little part in it. Let us try it.

Still another of earth's great ones has passed into the glory of the unseen. This time it is America's sweetest and purest poet, our own Whittier, whose voice was ever raised for temperance and righteousness. The clock which Miss Willard started in his honor for Willard Hall a few months ago will now become his memorial. Chicago's great Danish sculptor, Carl Rohl-Smith, is to design the bas relief on the clock. On one side is to be represented a mariner with Whittier's face: on the other the exultant form and face of Hope. The top is to be surmounted by the globe belted by a white ribbon, and back of it is seen the prow, stern, and masts of the good ship Temperance; underneath will be the verse composed a few months ago by the great poet himself for Willard Hall:

"Freighted with love our temperance ship
Around the world shall sail;
Take heart and hope, dear mariners,
God's errands never fail."

It might be well for unions who desire to give both to the Madam Willard window and the Whittier clock, but who do not feel like sending more than $1, to request that it be divided between the two memorials. Unions that can afford to give $1 or more to each memorial can do so. Seven beautiful, hand painted, Japanese bookmarks (which we will send for 50 cts. each) have been sent from Yokohama, Japan, by Miss H. I. Bruckhart, to be sold for the benefit of the Whittier clock. One dollar is sent by Miss Ellen M. Domett, San Francisco, Cal., and $1 from the Chicago West Side W. C. T. U. for the Whittier clock.

The Y. W. C. T. U. has started a fund to place the name of their National superintendent, Mrs. Frances J. Barnes, of New York, on a tablet in Willard Hall. The following Y unions have each sent $1 for this purpose: Moorestown, N. J., and Camp Creek, Ill., also $1 comes from Anne T. Hilles, Wilmington, Del. This announcement we are sure will be sufficient to set all the Y's at work to honor the name of one of the most lovely, unselfish and able workers to be found in the white ribbon ranks. Mrs. W. H. Hogrefe, Sutton, Neb., assisted by the ladies of the Lutheran Aid Society, gave a Temple sociable, which netted $8. Mrs. Hogrefe has forwarded the amount with the request that $5 of it be applied on the Mrs. Hitchcock tablet. The Rev. Mrs. Graves, Ponca, Neb., sends $1; Waterbury, Neb., W. C. T. U. sends $2, and $5 is sent from Nebraska through Mrs. Kate B. Northup; both of the above amounts are for the Mrs. Hitchcock tablet. Mrs. Northup also sends $10 from Nebraska for the Mrs. Holmes tablet. Mrs. T. B. True, Edgewood, Iowa, sends $2.50, and $1 is sent by Mrs. J. Quackenboss, Swaledale, Iowa, both for the Mrs. Dunham tablet. The Lucy Hayes W. C. T. U., Minneapolis, Minn., sends $35, which completes their gift of $100 to the tablet in memory of Rev. W. W. Satterlee. This is the second $100 this noble union has sent the Temple. Four dollars comes from Emily J. Hazelton, West Manchester, N. H., for the Elizabeth Tobey tablet; $25 from the Norfolk, Va., W. C. T. U., for the Mrs. Jones tablet.

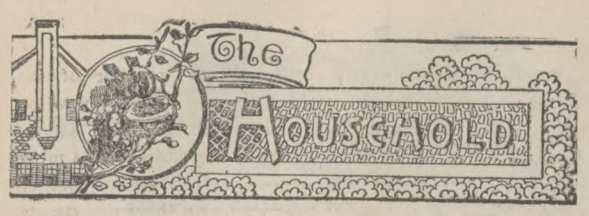
We do not wish persons disappointed when they receive the photographic group, consisting of Miss Willard, Lady Somerset and the founder of the Temple, for filling a mite-box. The photograph is only a small one, as we could not afford to send a large picture.



TWO MOTHERS.

BY HARRIET FRANCENE CROCKER.

"Come, little lambs, the fold is ready!
Mother is waiting to tuck into bed
Her dear little flock"—ah, how they cluster!
How sweet the pressure of each small head
Against my knee as their pure lips falter
The gentle words of the bedtime prayer.
How dear the touch of their clasping fingers,
And the eyes upraised and the foreheads fair
And I clasp my dear ones close and closer
As I think of a lonely, holy spot
In the churchyard still, and of the mother
Who mourns for the little one that is not.

Oh, sad-faced mother, with full heart aching,
And your empty arms and your anguished eyes,
Look up through the mist of your sorrow's waking!
Your baby is sheltered in Paradise!
There are tenderer arms than yours were, even,
That clasp your baby in sweet embrace;
There are gentler voices there in heaven
Than ever yours;—there is one grand face
That smiles to-night on your lost darling—
The face of Him who was once a child!
There's a perfect voice that soothes and blesses
The baby for whom your heart is wild.

Think of it, mother! safe forever,—
While mine may enter the paths of sin;
Safe and sheltered in Christ's own bosom,
While mine must soon life's toil begin;
Safe and sheltered and always happy,
While mine, through the years that are yet to come,
Must struggle and fight for the goal of heaven,
And hardly then will their crowns be won.

And so I kiss them and clasp them closer
As I watch the closing of sleepy eyes;
My little ones rest and wake to-morrow—
While yours wake ever in Paradise!

BY MRS. O. W. SCOTT.

CHAPTER V.

One morning a few days after the parade, Mrs. Douglas was surprised to find Mrs. Terry at the door as she answered the bell. Ostensibly, she had come to return a book; but her face, set in cold, hard lines of misery, revealed that this was not her only errand.

It was hard to express the sympathy she felt for this refined, reserved woman; but Mrs. Douglas ventured to ask, after a few moments of constraint, "Is your husband at home this morning?"

"No, oh, no!" replied Mrs. Terry; "I haven't seen him for two days and a night. I wanted to see Mr. Douglas and ask if he knew where he is, and if—if anything could be done."

"My husband has gone from town to day; but he has tried to find him, and two others have been through Water street. They have searched everywhere. We are so very, very sorry, Mrs. Terry."

"Yes, I knew you would be, but you can't know what this means to me. I shall never have any courage hereafter. He seemed so earnest, and he loved the meetings, and the hymns, and, Mrs. Douglas, he had begun to persuade other men to keep away from the saloons; that's why they tried so hard to get him down again. Oh, I don't know what I shall do when he comes home!" and the poor woman clasped her hands convulsively.

"Have you reason to fear him at such times?" asked Mrs. Douglas.

"Yes, I have to take my little girls and go into the attic—we have a small room there and I can barricade the door with heavy furniture. I wouldn't dare have the children in sight when he comes home, for they seem to make him wild." There was a painful pause and then she continued: "Do you know of any law that will help me? I could have him arrested, but that isn't what I mean. I don't know very much about the laws, but it seems to me if a city keeps saloons to tempt men who want to do right—and who can't drink without becoming crazy—they ought to have some place to keep them until—until it is safe for them to go home. People say that the police won't arrest a man so long as he doesn't stagger, and doesn't fight or make a disturbance on the street. But, oh, it is these men who manage to walk home, who abuse their families! My husband doesn't stagger, but his brain is on fire. He cannot take care of himself—but do you think the lock up is just the place for him? Isn't there some other place, or something besides a policeman's club for an insane man?"

"No, I've never heard of anything else, unless his friends take care of him. But I see what you mean, and I do think that a city which protects saloons is bound by the revenue it gains to take proper care of their victims, but I never thought of it before," Mrs. Douglas replied.

"No, I suppose not. People won't think of these things until they are obliged to. But when I have to stay in the attic all night, not daring to sleep, I have time to think of a great many things. I might call a policeman, but I can't bear to have John arrested and brought before the court, and then to testify against him. Perhaps I am too proud, people say so; but could you bear to have your husband sent to prison? My brother lives near us but he is a proud man and was never tempted to drink. He doesn't call to see me now because I left my own church and came to yours with John; but I'm not sorry I did that. I was ready to do anything if he would only do right."

Pausing a moment to conquer her feelings, she arose abruptly: "If you hear of anything, you'll let me know, won't you? And if—if Mr. Douglas finds him, tell him to encourage John—if he can—and try to keep him from doing anything desperate. Excuse me for saying so much, but—it is very hard to bear."

Mary Douglas clasped her hand closely as she said: "Sister Terry, it is so hard that I wonder you can live. Such an experience would break my heart, I'm sure."

"But women live a long while after their hearts are broken," said Mrs. Terry, and then she walked swiftly away.

That very day at twilight, Marion came into the parlor with a startled face. "Mother," said she, "that Mr. Terry is at the back door. He asked for father and when I told him he was not at home he wanted to see you. Oh, mother, send him away, won't you? His eyes look dreadfully."

Mrs. Douglas' dread and fear of a man under the influence of liquor was intense; but with a fluttering heart she hastened to the kitchen. Mr. Terry had already entered the room and when she appeared he greeted her with an elaborate bow quite unlike his usual quiet courtesy, and then replacing his hat upon his head he sat down. She saw at a glance that he was not sober, and stood beside the table wondering what she could do.

"I've got a book here that I thought maybe Brother Douglas would keep for me over night," said he, as, looking this way and that to see if they were quite alone, he drew from an inner pocket an old, dilapidated volume and handed it to her. It was Paine's Age of Reason.

"Why, Brother Terry, you don't want this book," said his frightened hostess as cheerfully as possible. "Whew! it smells of tobacco enough to make one sick. Mr. Douglas wouldn't keep it in his library, I am sure."

"But I shan't carry it home," and he threw it upon the table. "I wouldn't have my wife see it—not for any money! And my oldest girl, she reads everything that comes into the house."

"But where did you get such a miserable book?" asked Mrs. Douglas.

The man looked at her with a sly, half idiotic smile. "You can't guess, but I just as soon tell you if you won't mention it. It was in a hotel last night. A New York 'runner' was there, and he let me have it to brace me up, you know. He was a smart talker, I tell you. He said there wasn't any God or any hell—nothing to be afraid of, anyhow. I tried to argue with him out of the Bible, but he could out-talk me. My! wouldn't I like to hear him argue with our preacher. Ha! ha! ha!"

It was a great relief to Mrs. Douglas to hear Hugh enter at that moment and close the front door with a bang. The bang was Hugh's special announcement. Encouraged by his presence in the dining room just behind, she looked the poor fellow in the face as she asked: "Did you believe what that man said, Mr. Terry?"

Those terrible eyes fastened themselves upon her for what seemed a full minute. "No!" said he, with an oath. "I knew he lied! I've heard the Lord speak. He spoke to me that night when I went into the saloon." Here he rose and gesticulated wildly: "He tried to hold me back, and His hand was on my shoulder. I could have stopped then, for He said 'stop!' but I would go in. The boys said, 'Come on, free drinks to-night!' and I could smell it, I could, and I said, 'I'll have it if I lose my soul!' and when I took the first glass something like a thick veil fell between me and the Lord Jesus. It won't be lifted again. I'm a lost man and I know it!"

In her pity for him Mrs. Douglas had lost her fear, and she said, quietly: "God will forgive you if you ask Him to. He loves us so much that if we are lost it is because we will not be saved. Won't you ask Him just now to save you?"

But his mood had changed, and he shook his head stubbornly. "I know what I'm talking about. I haven't taken a drop of whisky to-day, but I've done something worse. Guess what I've been taking! but you can't. You don't know about such things. It's chloral!" he whispered, looking around the kitchen defiantly. "I took an overdose, but it's no use. You can't kill fools! Ha! ha! ha!"

"Well, Mr. Terry, I'll tell you what to do now. Go and have a talk with Mr. Matthews. He understands all about these things better than I do. Hugh, bring a light for Mr. Terry!"

In an instant Hugh was at her side with a lamp; opening the door, he ushered out their unwelcome guest, and had the door locked in a trice, while his mother sat down, trembling and exhausted.

"Oh, you needn't have felt afraid, mamma," said he, bringing her a glass of water. "I was close to the door with papa's cane, and Marion had an umbrella, and we sent Ted over to Mr. Pettigrew's for help. The man's crazy, isn't he?"

Meanwhile Ted came running in, followed by Mrs. Pettigrew.

"Has he gone? How white you look! Why didn't you send for a policeman? Mr. Pettigrew and Harry are down street, but I thought I would come over and count one, in case there was trouble," said cheery Mrs. Pettigrew, drawing down the shades and then ushering the family into the sitting room, with the easy manner of a born "Mistress of Ceremonies." "Dear me! I thought Mr. Terry was too much of a gentleman to do anything so rude," she added, after Hugh and Marion had repeated what they could recall of his words.

Mrs. Douglas could not repress a smile. "A gentleman is hardly responsible for his actions when he is insane," said she.

"That's a very charitable conclusion, I'm sure," and Mrs. Pettigrew rested her handsome head against the high backed rocker and folded her hands. "Some physicians claim it too, but I think a man who isn't naturally weak knows enough to behave. I've no reason to doubt Mr. Terry's sincerity in his Christian profession, but there's a lack of moral fiber, you may be sure of it. Mr. Pettigrew and I have never dared to hope that he would stand any length of time."

"He stood until the procession halted in front of Voigt's saloon the other night, and the odor of the drink, and the excitement of free rum for the party's success overcame him. Somebody must share the responsibility with him, I think," said Mrs. Douglas.

Ted and Dorothy had gone to bed, and Hugh and Marion were busy in the study over their lessons, so there was an opportunity for uninterrupted conversation.

Mrs. Pettigrew's face reddened as she responded, "That was too bad, wasn't it? I told Mr. Pettigrew that if our Republican procession stopped before a saloon it would look as if the party upheld the business."

"And what did he say?" inquired Mrs. Douglas.

"Oh, he hadn't much to say, for of course he saw it was unfortunate. But he said that some things were tolerated just before election which would not be at other times. You know this is a pivotal place—so many German and Irish voters—and has to be carefully managed. They rule us, these foreigners do, for neither party can get along without them. I declare I wish they had stayed across the water where they would have been governed. They are no more fit to govern themselves or the country than my Fido is, not a bit!"

"Isn't it a pity that our own people don't give them a better example, then? The science of government which is taught them during our campaigns isn't calculated to impress them with a very high opinion of our political righteousness, I am sure," said Mrs. Douglas.

"That is too true!" and Mrs. Pettigrew drew a long sigh. "But my husband says if our party can win this time it will be in a position to take up reforms. After four years of Democratic rule, they can't afford to let any side issue divide the interest just now. They must count every vote." Then as if suddenly reminded of something, she exclaimed, "And speaking of votes reminds me of the ridiculous story somebody is circulating about your husband. They say—oh, it's too funny!—that he is going to join the Prohibition party."

It would have been easier just then to keep silent than to speak, for it is easier to antagonize one's enemies than one's friends. Nevertheless, Mrs. Douglas said: "You wouldn't think it very strange if this rumor were true, would you? A good many men in the Republican party are disheartened by the attitude it holds toward temperance interests, and Mr. Douglas is only one among many who feel that that party no longer illustrates their principles."

Mrs. Pettigrew was very diplomatic, but she could not conceal a kind of horrified surprise. She rocked back and forth for a moment, her lips tightly compressed, looking at her friend with a puzzled, anxious expression. Then with a little laugh she exclaimed: "Well, now, you and I won't trouble ourselves about politics at any rate; I hate the whole subject, don't know anything about it, in fact, and don't wish to. I think we women would better attend to our own affairs, don't you? But if Brother Douglas has the remotest idea of joining those deluded fanatics, my husband can talk him out of it in about three minutes." As Mrs. Douglas did not speak, she continued, with added gravity: "I may as well say that I've suspected where your sympathies were since I heard you speak one afternoon in our Woman's Christian Temperance Union meeting. But political prohibition is quite a fad just now among some of our best women. There's Sister Reed and the Congregationalist minister's wife and some others; but so long as they're sweet and sensible, and can't vote, what harm does it do? Some of our members get excited over it occasionally, but I tell them we have all the latitude and longitude we could ask for, and the less we have to do with politics the better. Don't you think so?"

Perhaps these remarks were as logical as could be expected from a lively partisan, but under ordinary circumstances Mrs. Douglas would have been tempted to question a few of the contradictory statements. The day's experience, however, still rested like a burden upon her, and, looking at politics not as a system but as a responsible individuality, she could not answer in the affirmative.

"I would rather not go outside my 'sphere,' if any one can tell me just what that is," said she. "But if the wrongs and sufferings of women are perpetuated by what we call 'politics,' then to do our duty toward them we may be obliged to carry the war into that Africa. Mrs. Terry was here this morning." Here followed a recital of what we already know, which touched Mrs. Pettigrew's quick sympathy. "I know Mrs. Terry," said she, "and I consider her a real lady. She was a Jewett—one of the Providence Jewetts—and used to be a member of our union. We must try to do something for her."

"Yes, but what? It isn't a case for money, or food, or old clothes. She isn't that kind of woman. She would starve before she would complain or ask a favor. I feel sure that only the relation we have held to them led her to speak to me as she did this morning. All day long as I have been thinking of her, one text from the 'woman's chapter' in Proverbs has been repeating itself: 'Open thy mouth for the dumb, in the cause of all such as are left desolate.' We who are safe and happy and shielded from the drink curse mustn't be selfish. Women are dumb because of ignorance, or weakness, or poverty, or pride. We must speak for them—and if in speaking we are obliged to use a political telephone, we want one with a 'certain sound,' don't we?"

"I had never looked at it in that light," responded Mrs. Pettigrew, fingering her white ribbon thoughtfully; "but, dear Mrs. Douglas, whatever you think or say or do about these matters, please, please wait until after election!"

WORDS TO THE WISE—NEWSPAPERS.

BY ABBY MORTON DIAZ.

A little company of women were talking of this and that. "As for newspapers," said one, "there's scarcely a thing in them worth reading; all filled up with politics! To be sure the society columns, telling who goes where and what dresses they wear, are always interesting."

"Now, I don't care so very much for those," said the second; "they only make me long for fine clothes—and politics are just horrid. Poetry is my line—poetry is lovely. I devour every scrap of that and read all the love stories."

"As for me," said a third, "I've no time to waste on verses and such, and politics, as you say, are horrid; and so is all that lot of stuff about trusts and combines and syndicates. And as for society news that is too absurd for anything. Think of people going deliberately to work to have their names and their clothes, and their guests' names and their guests' clothes pushed right up in front of the world! Women ought to see for themselves that there's no dignity in this sort of thing; it belittles them—putting so much emphasis on clothes. And think of the time and labor consumed. Take one item. First, there's the writing of it, 'The fascinating Mrs. Harcourt Montgomery attracted much attention, gowned in a costly fabric of a lovely shade of rose pink with garnishings of emerald green, the combination exquisitely setting off her dazzling complexion.' And then the putting it in type: 'The fascinating Mrs. Harcourt Montgomery, etc.'; then reading the galley proof: 'The fascinating Mrs. Harcourt Montgomery, etc.'; then the revised proof reading: 'The fascinating Mrs. Harcourt Montgomery, etc.'; then correcting the type: 'The fascinating Mrs. Harcourt Montgomery, etc.', then the thousands of women in city and country, on parlor sofas, in boudoirs, on piazzas, by kitchen stoves, on rocks by the sea, under pine trees, and all informing themselves that, 'The fascinating Mrs. Harcourt Montgomery, etc.' Think of the numberless items of this kind written, set up, proof read, proof revised, corrected, printed, mailed and finally read. What a waste of this short human existence!"

"And it is only because it is about women that it is considered proper," spoke up Mrs. Tibbits, a bright little woman in the corner. "Suppose it were all about men? Listen: 'The elegant Mr. Harcourt Montgomery was magnificently attired in full evening dress, with a noticeable crimson and old gold necktie, which strikingly set off his fine black mustache and jetty locks, and rich olive complexion'; or this: 'The blue eyed scion of the wealthy Nugents was coated in costly black broadcloth, the product of foreign looms, and its rich sombreness being relieved by a necktie of the most delicate heliotrope, fastened à la negligè with a diamond of price. His feet were bewitchingly encased in patent leather ties. The Nugents are fabulously wealthy.' No, I never touch politics, or anything connected with business matters, and I have no special liking for poetry, but I will not countenance by reading it, this belittling of women. What do I read? Well, I am greatly interested in electricity and its applications. It seems to me that it is going to do wonders for the human race. Steam cars must go, and probably all manner of horse vehicles. The air is to be navigated. What do I read? I read of all the inventions of the times, of the kinds of metals as yet little known; of the progress in use of electricity; keep the run of Edison and of the extended uses of the telephone, and all new applications of force of any kind. Such goings on as there are! Why, fifty or sixty years hence, we on this scrap of a planet shall hardly know ourselves! for next after electricity will come other forces as yet scarcely recognized, and—after—these—" she added slowly, "after these will come mind force, whose practical possibilities are as little comprehended now as were those of electricity fifty or sixty years ago."

"Now I agree with all of you as to business, stocks, investments," said a motherly dame, "and I have no use for politics. Do you want to know what I look after in the newspapers? Living creatures. I am interested in bees, cats, dogs, horses, elephants, partridges, beavers, parrots, ants; they all have intelligence, but how little we are acquainted with any of them. I read the stories about them, and I believe that some day when we have more time, and use our time for the best things, then we shall get acquainted with the animals and understand them, and—perhaps—'twill be the same with plants and flowers."

"Everything you have mentioned is interesting enough," observed a steady listener, "leaving out politics, of course, and the society columns, but what you have all mentioned seem to me of small importance beside the various plans and endeavors for the good of poor humanity. I keep the run of the various charities and philanthropies, of the hospital and rescue work. In all this there is a real human interest."

"Well, I never," spoke out Aunt Phosie, from her seat by the window, "if you haven't every one of you left out a matter which does concern you, whether you think so or not. I refer to politics. There is that in politics which concerns every woman. You can't afford to pass 'em by, and I'll tell you why."

"Pray do," cried little Mrs. Tibbits. "But what wonderful things are the newspapers, and how thankful we ought to be to the newspaper makers for setting before us such a variety that each one can find something to her liking!"

SIDE-LIGHTS FOR WORKERS—THE PERSONAL EQUATION.

BY MRS. S. L. ROTHROCK.

A SILENT WITNESS.

At a large "no-license" meeting held in a New England university town recently, one of the speakers, a Catholic priest, related this incident: "Before the saloons were banished from the town a young man, little more than a lad, who had formed the fatal habit of drink, found his way to one of the dens of death on a peaceful Sabbath morning. The night before he had drawn his week's wages, and instead of going home to his widowed mother had halted at this place. Late in the night he had stumbled home and with the early morning set forth again to quench the maddening thirst. But he was penniless now, and the smiling host of the previous night had no smiles to waste on a drunken wretch. There were high words and blows, and then the saloon keeper, aided by his son, kicked the poor, half-intoxicated lad out of the door, across the street into the gutter, and there they paused to kick him to death!

"This on a sweet Sabbath morning, in a beautiful New England town, famed for its churches and seats of learning!

"The murderer was tried and sentenced to three years imprisonment. When a few months of his term had passed, his 'friends' sent a petition six feet in length, bearing testimony to his many good qualities, and the 'persecuted' man was set free to carry on his horrible 'business' in some other place. Not long after the saloons were banished from this town, and four years of decency, of thrift, of safety and cleanliness have followed.

"But still may oftentimes be seen the mother of the murdered lad, walking slowly down the street on which the deed was done which robbed her of her boy. As she draws near the scene of the tragedy her step falters more and more, until at last she pauses on the spot where his dead body lay that Sunday morning, and there she stands, a mournful figure, lost in her sad thoughts. She speaks to no one, no one speaks to her. See her, a silent witness against the cruel traffic which has smitten her so sorely, and none the less against the Christian community which so long suffered such evil deeds to be a possibility!

"Good men and true live in those sheltered dwellings. They gather in the beautiful churches and thank God for the peace and safety of their homes. They look with grateful pride upon their noble sons and daughters. They meet to congratulate one another that they have at last driven the rumseller out of their beautiful town.

"But the poor, heart-sore mother thinks on, and weeps on alone. Too late, too late to save the boy of her love and hope! Too late for her poor heart's peace in this world!

"Do the Christian citizens think of their long delay when they look upon the sad form standing silently on the spot where rum, with their consent, murdered her boy? And do they wish they had moved a little earlier upon the foe?"

A FEARFUL TEMPTATION.

A bridal party was visiting at our house, and one day after dinner the temperance question was introduced. After a free discussion I turned to the brother of the bride (a young man I had not previously known) and said: "Of course you are a temperate young man!" I shall never forget the look he gave me as he replied: "If you had asked me that question yesterday morning, I would have answered you emphatically, Yes, I am a temperate young man; but to-day I cannot say it."

I eagerly asked for an explanation, and, having my promise not to be offended, he frankly gave me the following statement:

"Early in boyhood I discovered I had an appetite for strong drink. I secretly sought opportunities for its indulgence, and when seventeen years of age found myself in a fair way to become a confirmed inebriate. About that time I was converted, and through grace was enabled to keep a victory over the appetite, although the struggle was a long and hard one. I signed the pledge, and for four years had faithfully kept it, and had flattered myself that the appetite had been eradicated; but, while visiting here the brandy in your mince pies has been a source of growing temptation, and yesterday when I tasted the brandy sauce on your plum pudding, it proved too much. You will remember I hastily excused myself, and in less than twenty minutes after leaving your house I was under the influence of liquor. You will also remember that I did not return until some time in the evening, and by way of explanation, said I had a severe headache, and went immediately to my room. I was actually too intoxicated to trust myself in the parlor."

This occurred about twenty-five years ago, and up to that time I do not remember ever to have heard a word offered against the use of brandy for culinary purposes, and being an earnest Christian woman would have resented the question, had I been asked if I was "a temperance woman?"

The answer that young man gave me was a bitter revelation, and with a truly penitent heart I begged him to forgive my criminal thoughtlessness, and falling upon my knees I promised God never again to disgrace my table with the accursed poison; and then, amid our tears and sobs, the young man was persuaded to reconsecrate himself to God and to his pledge, and before we arose, God gave me the evidence that no farther fruit should follow the fearful mistake I had so thoughtlessly made. From that time the young man was truly saved.

"THE heart that trusts, forever sings
And feels as light as it had wings;
A well of peace within it springs;
Come good or ill,
What'er to-day, to-morrow brings,
It is His will.

GREAT wealth pursued as an end is a curse to any member of the human family. There is no such soul-dwarfing, hell-inciting, suicidal occupation on earth as the selfish piling up of surplus wealth as the object of life. The possessor of millions who goes on adding to his store as a gratification of his insane ambition to accumulate, and lives without a conscientious regard for his obligations to his fellow-men, is surely kindling within himself that torment which Dives experiences, because he is defying the supreme law of his nature. . . . It is not the fact of the millions, for money is useful, but that their selfish possession will eventuate in a self-made hell in the human soul. . . . Bion once said of a niggardly rich man, "That man does not own his estate, but his estate owns him."—Henry Woods.

OUR BILL OF FARE.

Helen Campbell continues her unique and charming story, which is arousing much interest. Lady Henry Somerset contributes an article of intense interest on "English Election Issues." Rev. C. H. Zimmerman treats tersely "The Liquor Tax." Dr. Mary Wood Allen gives "A Word of Suggestion" concerning the Denver Convention. Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt tells some of her "Experiences in South America." Mrs. May Wright Sewall describes "Milk Gardens." The new Catholic Women's Temperance Union is reported by Mrs. Leonora M. Lake. Harriet Francene Crocker contributes a touching poem. Mrs. O. W. Scott gives us chapter V. of "David Douglas." Abby Morton Diaz discusses "Newspapers" and Mrs. S. L. Rothrock furnishes a new "Side-Light for Workers." The children are treated to the first chapter of a promising story, "White Ribbon or Gold?" as well as "Aunt Jane's" ever new Cozy Corner. Hester M. Poole fills the Queen's Gardens. Ohio, Kansas, Vermont, Missouri and New Mexico occupy the News From the Field, and important information for the workers is to be found on page twelve.

MISDIRECTED EFFORT.

The work pressing upon the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is so great that conservation of our energies is a most important factor in success. Not an iota of strength can we afford to waste in misdirected effort. Yet a thoughtful observer cannot help being painfully impressed with the waste which continually goes on in this direction.

Our forty departments of work give scope for the employment of all our strength, yet it is patent that no one union can pursue all these lines; hence judicious choice of those best suited to its environments is absolutely essential. Just here comes in the difficulty which very often leads to failure. Each National and state superintendent is sure her department is the most important; if she did not believe this she would not make a success of it. She presents it to the unions with all the eloquence her tongue or pen is master of, and their enthusiasm is kindled thereby. In the glow of this enthusiasm they vote to take up this department. As the weeks pass on and enthusiasm cools, they find that there is really very little they can do along this line in their community; they dislike to recede from their position so they will not relinquish this line of work which they cannot do, and take up that which most needs their doing, hence inactivity and discouragement become their portion.

To illustrate: not long ago we attended a county convention in a sparsely settled western county; most of the people were new settlers, with all a new settler's difficulties to contend against. Their homes were humble and their work was hard. There were plenty of children needing to be warned of and fortified against the temptations of the wineries and saloons all around them, yet not one Loyal Temperance Legion could be found. There was woeful need of evangelistic work and temperance literature, yet these three fundamental departments had never had a superintendent in either county or local union. The only department so blessed seemed to be parlor meetings. Thinking how few parlors there were in that frontier settlement, how little time those overworked mothers had for sitting in parlors had they had them, it would have been ludicrous, were it not so pitiful when we remember that mothers' meetings which could have been so helpful, that literature, evangelistic and juvenile work were all sacrificed to this one, to them, impracticable department. The anomaly was explained when we saw the state superintendent of parlor meetings, a most magnetic woman living in the state metropolis and making her department a grand power for good there. This county president had attended the state convention, been aroused by her report, and straightway determined that similar work must be done in her county, entirely oblivious to the differing conditions.

Scattering an individual's forces is another form of misdirected energy. "This one thing I do" is the best motto for most of us. Universal geniuses are scarce. Time was when we had so few workers that it seemed necessary for one woman to take several departments, but we are fast growing out of that form of pupilage. Indeed, giving several departments to one woman when it is not an absolute necessity, perpetuates and intensifies the very evil it seeks to remedy. If one woman superintends two departments, the work of each is usually half done, for she can give only half of herself to it.

But granted that there are women whose half is better than most women's whole, and they can attend to two departments better than others can to one, is it well to let them do it? We think not, for it is the cause of arrested development in those who, through the work of the department, might have developed into efficient workers. "Whoso doeth my will shall know of the doctrine," is God's plan, and ours cannot improve upon it. "Knowing through doing" is a fundamental principle in education. Many unions among us are sick and many are dead because of disregarding it. With the work of each department so systematized as it is now, with the plain directions furnished by superintendents and manuals, every union can furnish women enough to carry on the work of each department it needs to take up. Given a woman consecrated to God and His service, possessed of the grace, grit and gumption which is the W. C. T. U. birthright, ready to study up the department and to commence working in it before she knows as much about it as its National superintendent, let her take up its work in earnest, and she will conquer success.

Think now, what it would mean to have every union in the land fully "manned" by such superintendents! It would mean the addition of at least ten thousand active, efficient leaders to our ranks, for it is safe to say there is not a union which does not feel the need of at least one additional, capable superintendent. It would hardly be an exaggeration to multiply this number by two, or three or four.

Systematic study of W. C. T. U. departments, judicious choice by each union of those demanded by its environments and thorough work along these distinctive lines is what is most needed by the unions to-day. "To every one her work;" this well done, "the end will crown the work."

HOW ALCOHOL PRODUCES DISEASE.

Too much effort cannot be made to spread the truth that alcohol is a poison, and that its habitual use results in disease and death. As the battle waxes hot, plenty of professional men will be found to claim that constant moderate drinking is not harmful, and that the claim that total abstainers have a longer lease of life than non-abstainers is a fiction.

There is one point in this topic which deserves much more extensive publication than it has yet received. It is the answer to the question, "How does Alcohol Produce Disease?" No answer can be more clear and conclusive, yet we rarely see or hear the matter treated as one of the settled facts of modern science.

Among the lectures at Lake Bluff, Ill., Convocation, as far back as 1883, that by Dr. I. N. Danforth deserved, and still deserves, a very high place. His topic was the "Effects of Alcohol on the Fibrous Tissue."

Of this tissue he says: "It is universally present in the bodies of all the higher animals; not an organ of any kind, muscle, bone, gland, membrane, tendon, ligament, artery, vein, not even a brain can be found without it. So true is this, that if it were possible to remove all the fleshy tissue from a muscle, or the 'cells' and tubes from the liver or kidneys, still the outline of these would remain defined by the white, membranous webs in which all these organs are ensheathed. This fibrous substance is found in every portion of the body, at all periods of life, in all stages of development and all stages of decay."

The central facts of the lecture are that alcohol promotes an excessive growth of this fibrous tissue, and that this unhealthy tissue tends "to contract upon or shorten itself, and this unfortunate tendency cannot be prevented or even modified."

When we remember the structure of the kidneys, the liver, and the brain, it requires no expert to indicate the results. The kidney is essentially a dense bundle of very minute tubes, each no larger than a hair, and of blood-vessels equally small. The tubes are lined with very minute cells, and these cells are brought into very close relations with the blood so that they may separate from the blood certain poisonous elements, the result of wear and waste. The tubes and blood-vessels are held in position and bound together in most intimate relations by delicate threads of connective tissue. Anybody can tell what the effects on such an organ must be to have each hair like fibre of tissue slowly growing shorter. Dr. Danforth describes it as a "strangling" of the kidney out of existence. He says, "The pathological fact is that the kidney, perhaps the most important emunctory organ of the body, is grasped in the merciless clutches of this alcoholic connective tissue, and is slowly strangled out of existence in its anaconda grip. A large proportion of the cases of Bright's disease are of this peculiar type, and they are always fatal."

The liver is an organ somewhat similar to the kidneys in its general make up, having the fine hair-like tubes and minute blood-vessels all bound around by a "tila," or web of fibrous tissue. Now let this tissue grow excessive, and let it contract or shorten itself, and any one can see the result. "The true liver structure is slowly strangled and destroyed." "The result is inevitable—death, preceded by months or years of misery involving dropsy, jaundice, and other ills—in a word death from the well-known 'drunkard's liver.'"

Equally destructive, though in a different way, is the effect upon the brain. The same thing takes place, excessive fibrous tissue contracting itself. But instead of strangling minute blood vessels, it lays hold on the nerve fibers, distorting them by increasing their tension, and in various ways impairing their functions. Read the following carefully: "Thus the functions of the cerebrum, the seat of intellectual operations, are disturbed and rendered more or less abnormal by the mechanical irritation exercised by the connective tissue which is due to the exciting influence of alcohol.

"Now, in practice we find all possible gradations of mental and emotional disturbance, from the transitory and hardly noticeable deflections of judgment or temper which the 'moderate drinker' sometimes experiences, to the extreme of alcoholic dementia or mania so common in our insane asylums.

"The most important point in this discussion is the fact to which I now call your attention, viz.: that the brain of the 'moderate drinker' is in a constant state of abnormal and dangerous excitement, on account of the presence of an excess of fibrous tissue, for this fibrous tissue teases and excites the brain, thus keeping it in a state just short of ungovernable explosions of rage or violence. A little thing—a trivial cause makes a madman of an apparently innocent moderate drinker; some unexpected act of violence follows, and a peaceful citizen is transformed into a criminal. A trial follows—the usual muddle of 'expert' testimony is introduced, the prisoner is proven to be both a responsible monster and an irresponsible maniac. The court, the lawyers and the jury are alike befogged, and the prisoner probably escapes with no punishment or a trivial one, while the people clamor concerning the failure of justice. Dr. S. L. Wright, of Bellefontaine, O., in the New York Medical Record of July 14, 1883, insists upon the mental disturbance consequent upon chronic alcoholic poisoning, and the absence of perfect mental and moral responsibility as a result thereof. He attributes this directly to the increase of the intra-cranial connective tissue.

"It is hardly necessary to pursue this subject further. A multitude of authorities can be cited, and as many cases related substantiating the principles already laid down. My main object—that of showing how and why the habitual although moderate use of alcoholic liquors is dangerous alike to the individual who thus indulges, and to those around him—is now accomplished. I have stated no new facts, simply strung together some things long known to pathologists, and I ask for them your candid and thoughtful attention."

These facts should be familiar to everybody. It requires no heavy drinking to bring about this result. "Moderate" daily drinking will secure this end.

CONCERNING CARDS.

We are asked to give our ideas of card playing at home; progressive euchre and the card playing mania in general, and purpose doing so in a frank and familiar manner.

The first thought that comes to our mind is what Edison said to us when we went to see him at Menlo Park some time ago, to get his personal testimony on the total abstinence question. We asked him if he had ever used intoxicants, and with a disdainful smile he answered, "No." We asked him why, and still smiling he answered, "I had a better use for my head." His philosophic mind recognized, even when he was but a little fellow living the life of a newsboy on the trains, that alcoholic drinks make the brain less clear and powerful. By similar reasoning, if asked why we do not know one card from another, we might say, it is because we had a better use for our heads. Our mother was a woman of sufficient ingenuity to put us early on the track of doing something worth while. She taught us that ourselves, plus time, was all the capital we had in life; that if we put ourselves into time to the best advantage, we should come to something; if not, we should not. And we early determined to gain something by useful, helpful re action on the world about us, either large or small, according to our powers. We determined that cards would get nothing of our time because they had nothing to give back. We put our heads into books, thoughts, work, for they had something to give back.

Repeatedly on the great trunk railway lines, as we have been busy with our work on the Pullman cars, persons would come to us and ask if we would be kind enough to make up such and such a game of cards; we have never uttered more solid words of satisfaction than these: "You'll excuse me; I do not know one card from another, I never did." To see men who on the scales would weigh anywhere from two hundred to three hundred pounds, spending their time between the smoking car and a pack of cards, has always been to us one of the most disgusting sights that we are called upon to contemplate; and to see women with not a bit of ballast but lacking only butterflies' wings to set them afloat in their symbolism, tittering over some combination or other of these pasteboards, has fatigued us for our race. Sometimes, when we have said this, the answer has been made; "Why do you mind it? Under the law of the survival of the fittest, those people are going under; that is the best thing they can do." We have heard that same answer made when we bemoaned the loss that comes from drink. "Those people are fitted only for sub soiling; let them go under; that's where they belong." We know that scientific articles have been written by learned specialists to prove that this is the only way out; this is the inevitable law. But while we see a great deal in the hypothesis of evolution that helps to explain the wonders of the world about us, we believe the gospel law seeks to work, not so much the survival of the fittest as the survival of the most. And we believe that these brothers and sisters of ourselves who lose their lives instead of finding them, are really more sinned against than sinning, after all. The environment of heredity, the lack of the regnancy of a splendid will power, perhaps as much as anything else, and more, the lack of a good mother, has put them where they are—among the parasites of the earth, rather than among the vital growth; has classified them with the drones instead of the workers, in the great life of humanity. Our hope is, that the forces being set in motion under the law of our Christian civilization, will yet teach them the happiness of use and the true use of happiness, so that in future ages these idiotic methods of "killing time" will be told as the marks of a great semi-barbaric period, when people knew no better. We know that the Indian races are taught the cards, dice, and all sorts of games; the putting on of ornaments of every kind to the tripping of the light fantastic toe; and we believe that these things shall be put away "when the race out of childhood has grown."

THE OTHER SIDE.

"One half the world knows not how the other half lives." We are so busy organizing the forces of a better civilization that we are apt to lose sight of the individual in the mass. As a corrective we have decided to give some individual cases that have come to our knowledge. We hope they will be carefully read and pondered with the thought that they are as common as the dust in the street or the smoke of the air of our large cities. "'Tis true 'tis pity, and pity 'tis 'tis true."

Says Mrs. B. "My husband is very sick and the railroad has killed my cow. I used to sell the milk to help support the family. I have been to the railroad company, but here is a letter in which they say they are very sorry but they cannot do anything for me."

Z. is a poor mechanic whom illness and loss of work brought to the verge of despair. Z., with his wife and children, live in a couple of rooms furnished with a few articles bought by them on the installment plan. The payment was overdue. Z. was ill in bed and the furniture dealer would wait no longer. He took away the kitchen stove (the only one they had) and their one bed. In the midst of all this distress another baby came upon the scene.

Martin H. was threatened with arrest by G. who charged him with a most heinous assault upon his little daughter. For two and one half years G. kept Martin in his house under the threat of criminal prosecution and Martin paid all his wages to him. The youth was starved by the man, who gave him no new clothes. When M. said he was going to leave, G. threatened to have him arrested on the false charge. He placed a paper before M. which he signed. It was a promise to be G.'s slave for life and to pay him all his wages in consideration of not being prosecuted. Investigation proved that the accusation was false and kind friends came to Martin's rescue, so that he is a slave no longer.

M. was the wife of a drunkard who came home at night, took the money she had earned during the day at the wash tub, beat her and made her home hideous. She submitted to this two or three times a week for years, rather than break up her family.

L. is a girl twelve years old, employed in a sweating establishment. She receives five cents for finishing off a cloak. Her younger sister, seven years old, receives four cents for four hours work.

Mrs. Frank Rafferty and her four little children slept out of doors on a weather-beaten lounge every night last week. Piled around her on the street were a few poor articles of furniture—all she owned in the world. Last night her babies were crying aloud with hunger, and had it not been for kind friends one of the little boys would have died before daybreak. On a ragged piece of carpet thrown over the rough cobblestones of the pavement slept her drunken husband, muttering and cursing at his uncomfortable bed. To shield her little ones as much as possible from the chilly wind which swept down the street the brave mother directed the children to take turns in thrusting their bare feet under her skirts as she lay shivering on the hard lounge. When aroused last night by a News Record reporter she told her simple but sorrowful story of want and suffering. "I have always been ready to work," she said, "and have tried very hard to support my little children, but Frank spent all his money for whisky and we couldn't pay the rent. I begged the landlord not to turn us out just as cold weather was coming on, but he insisted that I must either pay or go. I don't mind the cold myself, but it nearly breaks my heart to see my babies sitting there with their teeth chattering and their faces blue with the cold. I begged a policeman to take care of my furniture so that I could go to work and earn some money, but he told me that if I didn't move it away he would set it afire. It's all I've got in the world, and some of it is what father gave me when I was married. A kind gentleman was here to-day and offered to help me. If he does I'll try to pay him back some time if I'm not taken sick."

The rich and happy ought to know these things—ought to study into them and to help bring these prisoners out of the abodes of cruelty. To do this is the secret of the happiest life, and will some day become the instinct of self-preservation; for, as Dickens so graphically says: "There is not an atom of Tom's slime, not a cubic inch of any pestilential gas in which he lives, not one obscenity or degradation about him, not an ignorance, not a wickedness, not a brutality of his committing, but shall work its retribution through every order of society up to the proudest of the proud, and to the highest of the high."

THE OLD PARTIES AND THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

A recent issue of a prominent prohibition journal contains an article severely censuring President Harrison for the methods used to secure his election, his use of wine, and his appointment of leading liquor men to office. To our minds the arraignment is properly far less of President Harrison than of the Republican party—of both old parties, in fact, for neither has a monopoly of these tricks of the trade. It is notorious that the measures described are constantly resorted to by both of the old parties. Democratic saloon men voting for a Republican President under the compact that Republican saloon men shall in return vote for Democratic governors, and all with the definite understanding that the saloon is to receive substantial consideration from both candidates, is a perfectly legitimate transaction in political circles. It needs to be concealed only from the voter inclined to take up with temperance fanaticism. The dishonest and illegal use of money for election purposes is a crime in the eyes of the ordinary politician only when it is the other party who so uses it.

We do not believe that the nominee himself can prevent the unfair practices of his party, and therefore he cannot fairly be held responsible except where he himself participates in them. He may indeed decline to be a candidate except on the condition that only straightforward means be used in the campaign. The result of such action would be that some one else would be nominated. But having accepted the nomination, the utmost that he can do is to refuse to be himself a party to any dishonesty. The party "bosses" will manage the campaign without reference to any conscientious squeamishness on the part of their candidate.

When an honest man is thus obliged to choose whether he will refuse to be a candidate or accept the nomination with the full knowledge that the most disreputable means will be used to secure his election, it is time for the people to awake to the fact that something is the matter with our political machinery. It is childish folly to call any one hard names. No change either of men or parties will in itself help matters. Only a party which acknowledges the evil and is pledged to find a remedy affords the slightest ground of hope.

The lavish use of liquor at the White House in this day of intelligent Christian sentiment on the question, may well be a subject of regret to all temperance people, but neither that nor the President's appointment of leading liquor men to positions of honor and power should be a surprise to any one. Those who based hopes upon the "temperance and morality" plank of the Republican platform showed only a profound ignorance of politics. So long as temperance men will allow themselves to be deceived by such "sounding brass and tinkling cymbals," so long will the two great liquor parties continue to fasten conscientious voters to their chariot wheels by meaningless resolutions indorsing temperance and all other virtues in general.

And why, considering the platform upon which he stood and the large liquor ring in the constituency back of him, should not President Harrison appoint liquor men to office; rather, how could he do otherwise? If the liquor trade is a perfectly legitimate one, if liquor dealers compose as large and honorable a part of his constituency as the representatives of any other trade, what right has the chief executive to ignore their claims or treat them with contempt? The man who voted for Harrison cannot rightfully complain of these features of the administration, he has simply proved the truth of the old statement, "whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." When the country really desires a different harvest, it must sow a different kind of votes. Men do not expect to gather grapes of thorns nor figs of thistles, but they do constantly and confidently look for temperance legislation from a party which regards the liquor traffic as equally legitimate and honorable with all other trades and they expect the President elected by that party to be the standard bearer of temperance principles. Disappointment has been their lot in the past, it awaits them in the future. The results they look for can be obtained only through a party which explicitly declares the liquor traffic to be morally on the same plane as highway robbery and which proposes to put it on the same plane legally.

"We sometimes think vicarious sacrifice is a hard and cruel idea, we forget that it is joy to the one who undertakes it, because it is undertaken from love."

By nature we are pig iron. The great Artificer would transform us into Bessemer steel. We do not like the process, but if we have any common sense, not to say spiritual intuition, we supremely desire the result. Perhaps the wheat would like to be the loaf of bread, but tribulations (threshings) intervene, and these are not only the "flails of God's afflictions," but the heat of His transforming power. It is just so with us.

At Bay View, the Chautauqua of Michigan, Bishop Ninde, in speaking recently, had assigned him as his subject, "What shall be done with the women?" He began by saying: "Let them alone. I would change the question to—what shall we do for the women, and I would answer, let down the bars, open wide all the gates and let the women go wherever their consecrated common sense leads them. Surely we can trust them to do this."

Writes a racy correspondent: "August has made his imperial good-bye bow. We were sorry to have him go, for indeed he won a warm place in our hearts. 'Hot, dusty dog days?' Oh, yes, but what cooling showers and magnificent sunsets! 'Restless, sweltering nights?' Of course, but how they were glorified! If the brilliant war god really heard all the nice things earth's enthusiastic stargazers said about him, he must have known that all our best adjectives were early exhausted. No wonder he is retreating. As we like to stand well with our neighbors there are some things we do hope the good people (?) of Mars did not learn on their late visit. We hope they did not hear of that ruinous "lockout" at Homestead, and the widespread strikes which so disgrace and brutalize both employers and employed. We hope they did not notice the long, long procession of heart-broken women and starving children, following to dishonored graves unnumbered drunkards, made such by Columbia's legalized liquor traffic which last year gave us 300,000 criminals, 800,000 paupers and 300,000 idiots! We hope they did not gather in the awful fact that our Christian government last year paid for this deadly traffic nearly one billion dollars—more than seven times what she paid for her public schools! If, however, they caught sight of the W. C. T. U. Temple at Chicago, over which floats the flag bespeaking peace, purity and prosperity to all peoples in all lands—it is well. Aye, speed away, beautiful star! bear the white prophecy of earth's redemption from the drink curse to the farthest limit of your trackless round, for He who marks out your way and holds you to your course is Leader of the white ribbon host, our cause is in His hand."

Miss Isabel Gibson, of Paris, who after her year's stay among American white-ribboners, returned to France last fall filled with enthusiasm and earnestness in the temperance cause, has organized a band of Paris Y's—the nucleus of the Y. W. C. T. U. of France. Miss Gibson, I hear, is at present visiting and resting in England, and during her absence Miss Flora Brown, a bright American girl, resident in Paris, has taken the presidency of the society. She has written me an interesting letter from which I glean the following items:

I bring you the great news of the opening of the créche of the Paris Y's. And now that this has been effected we hope that it will encourage the dear white ribboners of Paris to go forward with a good courage and become not only renowned for their abstinence, but for their courage as workers in the wide field of philanthropy. We have three large, airy rooms, two of which are occupied by pretty white berceaux, the other being the poupounat, or play room. These are on the first floor, but there is a courtyard where the children who walk can go and play when it is fine. This apartment we have only taken for three months, as in October we hope to go into a large house with a spacious garden, just in front of the rooms which we now occupy. There are thirty children to whom admittance has been refused, we can only take in ten. Of course we feel what a great responsibility this house will be to us, and the question of funds makes us feel rather anxious; but we can but trust to our Heavenly Father, who knoweth, and there is such strength in the thought of His knowledge. Our hope is, that having shown that we are in earnest, by opening this temporary home, we may inspire our friends with confidence, and make them feel that the work deserves support. The petition is still a troubled question, though both Miss Gibson and myself will stick to it. You know what the French government is, and how many formalities one has to go through before anything can be done, and I hear that women cannot petition in France! Still, French women are beginning to come to the fore as the late Congress Feministe has shown us.

On Duty.

BEAUTY IN COMMONPLACE THINGS.

BY HESTER M. POOLE.

It was late in September. Amy had been graduated the preceding June. As there was no necessity for her following a pursuit, and as she had no hobby, it seemed as if there were before her nothing but the ordinary duties naturally falling to the eldest daughter of well-to-do parents.

In such a case it is well to cultivate a hobby, to learn to do some one thing well. Yet too often, as with Amy, an ease loving disposition and indulgent friends militate against any such effort. As a visitor I could only suggest. But what are suggestions against such enormous odds?

That day Amy seemed petulant, restless, unhappy. Throwing herself on the lounge by my side, in the family sitting room, she suddenly plunged into the subject of her irritability.

"I am so unhappy!" she sighed. "Life is so uninteresting, so dull, so commonplace."

This, then, was all the fortunate young woman could complain of. Her sunny years, running on without a ripple, with no difficulties to surmount, no heights to climb, were made "dull, flat, stale, unprofitable," because they were utterly commonplace.

A crowd of thoughts swept over me which it is not now necessary to transcribe. They were accompanied by the wish that Amy might encounter obstacles which would arouse her latent energies and force her to go to work with energy and will.

It is only concerning the commonplace of which I will speak to-day to other girls, perhaps less happily situated than my young friend. Yet the idealistic tendencies of girlhood, in which that dreamy mist cast by the imagination over all the pathway of the future, throw a halo of poesy over what, when stripped of enchantment, will be as bald and real as the facts of to-day.

Yet a love of romance is a part of every deep natured soul. That imagination which is at the root of the love of the beautiful is never to be crushed or dwarfed. Let it be trained aright and it glorifies and consecrates the humblest facts and the highest duties.

Is there no food for imagination, no latent beauty in commonplace things? Some writer, is it Susan Coolidge, has wisely sung,

A commonplace life, we say, and we sigh;
But why should we sigh as we say?
The commonplace sun in the commonplace sky
Makes up the commonplace day.
The moon and the stars are commonplace things,
And the flower that blooms, and the bird that sings.
But dark were the world, and sad our lot
If the flowers failed, and the sun shone not.
And God, who studies each separate soul,
Out of commonplace lives makes His beautiful whole.

The stars are commonplace. What can be more so? Every night and all night long they wheel into line, orderly, continuous, "without haste, without rest," fulfilling their appointed march about some distant, central sun. Yet what study so uplifts the mind unto sublime conceptions, what so expands it and inspires a sense of majesty and awe, as the study of astronomy? What so illustrates that tremendous power which underlies all created things and finds its orderly expression in law, as that which engaged the attention of the sages of Chaldea, Assyria and Persia, even before the Psalmist sang his worshipful, "The heavens declare the glory of the Lord."

Behold the sky! How many of us love to watch the changeful beauty of its scenery of clouds and sunshine, storms and tempest? Yet the sky, too, is commonplace. Every day during all our lives we have been able to gaze into its depths and observe its transformations. Who ever saw it twice alike? Who fails to sympathize with its frowns and smiles? It laughs, it weeps; it is covered with changeful clouds trailing in living beauty across those infinite cerulean depths which draw the imagination on, on, away unto other worlds, with their shining continents and mysterious oceans. Then its gorgeous sunsets fading into night, serene, holy, peaceful! Is there not unutterable beauty in the commonplace sky?

To those who, happily, are not shut in by great high domes of brick and marble, those who have around them an almost limitless horizon, I would recommend the study and the love of all the moods of the sky.

Of the soothing qualities of this sky-love, too much cannot be said. It lifts one up and out of the sordid, petty cares which creep into all our lives and, if we watch not, eat out the roots of pure joy and love of the ideal, the unworldly, the beautiful.

Again, it takes us out of doors. And women, we all know, stay indoors far too much. How much better are our lives than the higher order of beasts, if we do not rise into the better life, the life of the spirit, at some time every day in all our years? Let us get above bread and butter and dress and equipage, one hour out of the twenty-four. Let us revel in illimitable grandeur. Let us give ourselves wholly and truly to the sweet influences of nature. Then shall our souls drink from supernal springs of heavenly Love and Wisdom. Then shall we grow in grace of spirit, in the perception of the divinity, the mystery, the power, the beauty, which encompass and crown all our days and nights. Then shall the fluent influences of holy peace and love flow into and through us. We shall be at one with the heart of things. And the Divine Life surging through our individual spirits shall give us to understand what Jesus meant when he said, "I and my Father are one."

Always the aspiring one sees and loves the beauty of commonplace things. Otherwise, says Emerson,

"To thee the heavens shall express
But emptiness on emptiness, . . .
And to thine eye the vast skies fall,
Dire and satirical
On clucking hens and prating fools,
On thieves, on drudges and on dolls."

On the other hand,

"Can thy style-discerning eye
The hidden-working Builder spy,
Who builds, yet makes no chips, no den?"

if so, thou canst penetrate beneath the surface and detect the beautiful in the commonplace. It is like the sweet core of the chestnut within its prickly burr.

The same law holds good in all things. Within the cocoon of the everyday fact lies enwrapped the chrysalis of loveliness.

Take the wayside dandelion and examine it under the lens of the botanist. Or the herbs and grasses at our feet; the insects that breathe at morn to die at nightfall; the rocks that are the framework or the debris of the earth; the snowflakes that illustrate the laws of crystallization; the prism that separates the loving family of colors into individual members; these and ten thousand things beside, throb with continual living beauties.

Let us study them. They are to be discovered, wooed, sought. The great Giver of loveliness does not always thrust them before our unappreciative perception. They are to be sought, if at all, for their own sake. We are the lapidaries for these diamonds of commonplace things.

Can we read understandingly Emerson's "Monadnock" and "Wood Notes"? If so, we can polish our own jewels.

Metuchen, N. J.

OHIO.

FANCIES AND FACTS.

"The work is advancing," comes from the twenty-third district, whose last annual was held in the "Crusade church" at historic Hillsboro, the home of dear "Mother Thompson," who, notwithstanding affliction and bereavement in her family, favored the convention with her presence, and a talk as helpful as it was sweet and touching. The Methodist church was crowded the first evening to hear Mrs. Leiter on "Physical Culture." The audience was not disappointed. Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman gave a forcible address the next evening on "Problems that Face Us." The Methodist pastor, together with Revs. McShurly and Beecher, rendered sympathetic service throughout. "Shall District Organizations be Continued?" was ably discussed, and by vote of the convention decided in the affirmative. This question promises to be a live one at our next state meeting. Mrs. Purdum, state treasurer, made the gratifying statement that the twenty-third district was ahead, as to paid-up dues, of any in the state. Several new organizations reported. Excellent reports of the year's work were presented. Mrs. Snyder, of Kingston, was elected president, in place of Mrs. Purdum, who received the thanks of the convention for her most faithful and efficient service.

Ross county W. C. T. U. convened at Adelphi, Mrs. Agnes Snyder presiding. New unions have been organized at Adelphi and Bainbridge, also two L. T. L's, that of Kingston with fifty members. Mrs. Hoffman has charge of the question box, and gave a fine address in the evening, subject, "Bible Women." She also spoke in the M. E. church at Kingston the following Sabbath. No speaker has been better received by the general public. Mrs Snyder was reëlected county president. The wideawake W. C. T. U. of Kingston held a public meeting in the Presbyterian church (is it a fact that the churches are closed to white-ribboners?), addressed by Bishop Thoburn, of India, whose American home is at Kingston. The bishop gave his audience to understand that there is a political side to the temperance question. Mrs. Snyder followed; her theme was "The Christian Woman's Remedy." The speaker proved, not that love is stronger than law, but that love is law, and law is love, or ought to be. This tireless worker is also president of Kingston W. C. T. U.

The Y's of Southern Ohio held their third annual conference in the Methodist church at Athens, Miss Frances Ensign presiding. The occasion, from first to last, was inspiring; Miss Ensign has the love and hearty coöperation of her sister workers. A discussion led by the president, "How to Help"; question box, conducted by Mrs. Bechtel; "Parlor Meetings," by Mrs. Powell, and an amusing talk on "Woman Suffrage," by Rev. Mr. Powell, were some of the good things on the program. Mrs. Bechtel also told what girls in college can do for Y work. Miss Pollock answered the question, "Does it pay to be a Y?" decidedly in the affirmative. A reception was given at the home of Mrs. Tolloon with refreshments served at Miss McVay's residence next door. Unique souvenirs—an ivy leaf, on one side of which was printed in white the letters, "Y. W. C. T. U.," and on the other, "Athens, July 7-8, '92," were given the delegates. A delightful drive to the Children's Home, and the entertainment furnished them by the little asylum people are gratefully remembered, together with the cordiality of the Athens folks, who know how to dispense hospitality as well as the Y's know how to enjoy it.

A sweet note from Mrs. Lida G. Romick, from her sick room in Huron Street Hospital, Cleveland, dated August 11, reads: "This is my ninth week here, and while my recovery seems slow, the wonder is that I am alive at all. It is the goodness of God in answer to the prayer of faith. More than ever do I gladly say

"'Take my life and let it be Consecrated Lord, to Thee.'"

Mention of the accident by which Mrs. Romick sustained such serious injuries, was made in my last letter. Our hearts are full of grateful praise to the mighty Healer in whose arms she is resting.

Ohio Good Templars laid the corner-stone of their new building, which will be the handsomest on the grounds, at Lakeside, just opposite the W. C. T. U. building, which will make the location temperance general headquarters. The Good Templars are a growing, aggressive organization, side by side with us on the march to victory.

I clip from A True Republic the following:

TOLEDO, O.

MRS. J. J. SUMNER:—I warn you hereby to resign all your offices in the W. C. T. U., or we will see to it that your daughter loses her place in the school. We mean business and want no fooling. We know all about your connection with the organization and demand that you hold no office in the state, county or city. We do not care for the local, but leave all other offices. Refuse, you will take the consequences. Yours respectfully,

By order of Liquor League.

Mrs. S. M. Perkins, president of the twenty-first district, has been holding suffrage conventions in various parts of northern Ohio during the year. These have given the cause a forward movement.

Mrs. Frances Leiter made a fine impression at the National Teachers' Institute, at Saratoga Springs. She was the only woman who spoke in the great Casino Rink. Her address on "Educational Equipoise," delivered without manuscript, was considered one of the best on the program. Physical culture was also discussed before the meeting of state teachers in Cleveland, by Miss Anna Morris and Mrs. Leiter, in a way to kindle enthusiasm among the teachers. Educators are seeking instruction in this new department.

BUCKEYE BITS.

One of the largest L. T. L's of eastern Ohio is at Geneva, over two hundred members. Mrs. Helen Shields is superintendent.

The Crusade state heartily welcomes to our working ranks, Mrs. J. W. Bechtel, formerly state superintendent of Y work in Virginia. Her present home is at Zanesville.

Resolved, That we indorse the methods and plans of the Ohio Woman's Suffrage Association in securing to the women of Ohio the exercise of their right to vote upon equal terms with men.—Fifth district W. C. T. U. Convention.

Mrs. Emma C. Stout, former editor of the Delaware White Ribboner, and mother of the little editor of The Midget, has been called to bury her baby daughter. Our prayerful sympathies are with the sorrowing family in their Florida home.

The second annual Ohio state conference of charities and correction was held in Cleveland, September 13–16. The address of welcome was given by Mayor Rose, responses by Gen. R. B. Hayes, ex-President of the United States, and Wm. McKinley, governor of Ohio; annual address by the president, Dr. Elroy M. Avery, Cleveland.

Mrs. R. J. Trego, superintendent evangelistic department asks through the Messenger this searching question. "Do individual members or workers observe 'The trysting time,' nine o'clock hour, as a time for prayer and thought?"

"Christ never asks of us such busy labor
As leaves no time for resting at His feet."

KANSAS GLEANINGS.

"Gather up the fragments that nothing be lost."

Recognizing as we do the mighty force of the accumulation of little things into a grand total, it is with much to encourage us in our work as reporters, that we regularly proceed to "gather up the fragments" from all over this broad land of ours, "that nothing be lost" which will help to cheer and strengthen any weary worker for "God, home and native land," and, Kansas being the "geographical center" around which the United States "vibrates," feels her responsibility, and tries very hard to measure fully up to the same, even though she is not as highly favored as her eastern sisters, with the presence and counsel of so many of our "white ribbon chiefs." In this state of "magnificent distances" it is often very inconvenient to secure the help of our state leaders, which may be perhaps as well, after all, for the "rank and file," as it naturally leads to their greater development.

Wetmore W. C. T. U., though but a year and a half old, has held twenty-four regular and several business meetings. It has sent delegates to the three district and one state convention held since its organization and entertained the annual district convention of 1891. It has also secured several lectures by eminent speakers, held two medal contests and one literary entertainment, and although it has but ten active members, with four honoraries, has collected and disbursed about $75 to advance the temperance cause.

The Douglas county W. C. T. U. held its "annual" at Lawrence, with nineteen delegates present, also our beloved state president, who gave helpful and cheering words. Baldwin union had unfortunately much sickness among its members. The faithful county secretary could not be present and requested that another be elected to fill her place, which was regretfully done. Words of love and sympathy were expressed for her in the loss of her sister, and petition to our Heavenly Father was given that His arm might sustain her in her time of trial. Great enthusiasm was manifested by the Lecompton union in the Demorest contest work. Lawrence union had done efficient prison work, with some conversions. The new union at North Lawrence is doing well. The desire was expressed that the tablet for the Temple, in memory of Drusilla Wilson, be taken up as a state work, and a collection was made for the purpose. Mrs. M. B. Day, of Lecompton, was reëlected president, as was also the treasurer, Mrs. McCrory, of Lawrence, with Miss Lizzie Smith, of North Lawrence, secretary.

Anderson county white-ribboners convened at Garnett, with the president, Mrs. J. H. Westein. Miss Minnie Young and Miss A. Kirkton, also Mrs. E. H. Bain, rendered delightful music. The greeting to the delegates was given by Mrs. C. K. Smith; response, by Mrs. Henry. The president gave an excellent address. Mrs. J. C. Reed gave a talk on Sunday school work, and reported the foreign department, viz., 930 pages of literature, mostly among the Germans. Mrs. Hiatt reported forty-seven persons in jail for 1892, most of them young men and boys. Gospel services are held at jail every two weeks. One signed the pledge, and many promised to lead a better life. Mrs. C. R. Smith had distributed thirty-two "appeals to teachers" and one hundred blanks for teachers' signatures. The Garnett union has had three lectures the past three months, and one entertainment. Each county paper is "influenced," pockets and holders have been placed in depots and hotels. Leaflets have been distributed in each Sunday school and temperance papers among the "normal" teachers. Glenlock, a plucky little union, reported $29.35 raised during the year, one mite-box ready for the Temple, and a quilt for sale; nine volumes purchased for their library; one medal contest held, and promised still better things in future. This report was given the Chautauqua salute.

Mrs. Cone, of Winfield, sends a report of temperance work at the Chautauqua encampment. She says, "Mrs. A. S. Benjamin, of Michigan, was with us, who goes about 'doing good to all men' (through women mostly), 'as she has opportunity.' She conducted a school of methods at the assembly which was the best we have ever had, our own gifted women taking hold as never before. The parliamentary drills were excellent. We also had two lectures by Rev. Anna Shaw, and temperance mixed with many exercises and speeches. The grand gold medal contest drew the largest crowd at the assembly, and the contestants won honest praise. The medal was awarded to Miss Jessie Lantz, of El Dorado. Mrs. DeLong, in the presentation speech, made happy comparison between Moses and Mr. Demorest, who, though he could not speak himself, sent out others doing untold good. Winfield union is prosperous; has work in several departments. Flower mission day was observed; some of the prisoners weeping at the name of 'mother' and the sight of the flowers; has held four medal contests and raised nearly half of the hundred dollars pledged for the Temple and expects to have its name engraved on the Temple walls next year."

Pratt county, organized two years ago, recently held its third county convention. The county president, Mrs. Nancy Gilbert, was in the chair. The nominating committee reported in favor of reëlecting same officers, which was done. Pratt union reported having twenty five members and working in thirteen departments. Reports from three other unions. Mrs. A. E. Dumeuil reported temperance taught in most schools in the county. Mrs. M. M. Anderson reported several gospel temperance meetings held with good attendance and good collections. A paper, "Synopsis of W. C. T. U. Work," brought out an interesting discussion. Recitation, "In the Kegs," was rendered by Miss Viola Dumeuil. Question-box conducted by Mrs. Anderson. In the evening Miss Imogene Webster, late of Portland, Oregon, gave an excellent paper on physical culture, followed by an able address by Mrs. Emma Smith, of Winfield, whose helpful presence was enjoyed throughout the convention.

A good record of the semi-annual convention of the fifth district, which was held some time ago, reached me only a short time since, and as the annual meeting will so soon convene I will not occupy space by giving it, but will take this opportunity to ask them and also the reporters for each convention to forward their records to me promptly, so that the news may not become stale. It sometimes happens that letters reach me soon after I have sent off my monthly report. These, if important, I forward to be added to it; if not, they receive attention in my next. As the district meetings all occur in September, I should like the reports in before time for state convention, if possible.

NOTES.

Kansas white-ribboners, so many of whom are themselves motherless, feel a tender sympathy for our National President in her great bereavement, and commend her to Him who has promised to be a Father to the fatherless.

The Rastall union, having just completed its fifth year, had all its records blotted out by fire which consumed the home of its secretary, the family barely escaping alive.

Mrs. Dora Evans, president of the fifth district, gives much of her time and energies to the medal contest work, in which she is very successful, securing also many signers to the W. C. T. U. pledge among the young who wear the white ribbon proudly on all occasions. She is one of our "sweet singers" also, and greatly aids the cause in that way.

The unions at Liberal, St. Francis and Cedar Point, which have been dormant for some time have taken on new life.

The Americus union issues printed programs of topics to be presented at each meeting of their union, six months in advance.

Many inquiries have come concerning the "doll drill" mentioned in my last, for use in L. T. L. entertainments. It would make a good program leaflet for such occasions if printed.

The state convention is to be held at Pittsburg October 4, 5 and 6, Mrs. M. M. Howard, of Cherokee, railroad secretary.

VERMONT.

THE SEASON OF COUNTY CONVENTIONS.

This is the season of county conventions. Our state has been blessed with a series of exceptionally fine ones. "We never had so good a county convention before," was the verdict for Addison county, the first held, and "a most successful meeting" was the verdict of Rutland county, the last held. Our counties are well organized and well officered; most of the national departments are duplicated, and at conventions are ably presented.

Health and hygiene has been a favorite department with us from the first, which Mrs. Davidson's health calendar can testify, as well as the palatable and healthful fare provided by the loving home keepers of our unions when county conventions are held. The indefatigable superintendent of juvenile work has created a widespread interest in Demorest medal contests. No county convention seems complete without one. Our faithful Y leader, Miss Blakeley, spares no pains to forward the interests of her department, and every now and again we hear of a new Y being formed. Mrs. Bell, our superintendent of prison and almshouse, is striving to secure a state reformatory for women, and the history of her labors to this end would fill a volume. Mrs. Franklyn, superintendent of legislation, is blessed in being the wife of one of the most uncompromising Prohibitionists ever seen. He was made special prosecutor for Rutland county by Governor Page, and has done such heroic service defending the prohibitory law against liquor sellers that he was mobbed upon the streets by the rough scuff of the foreign population of Rutland.

If ever you heard that the prohibitory law of Vermont is inoperative you have heard that Rutland was the worst place in the state. The inhabitants, largely Irish Roman Catholics, will have "the drink." They resort to all manner of devices and subterfuges to obtain it. There are plenty of men whose cupidity is at work to secure the profit there is in rumselling. Arrests, fines, and imprisonment are frequent. The traffic is persecuted but not destroyed. It is driven into vaults and cellars, cisterns and outhouses. Druggists sell it on the sly and at their peril. Hotels keep it in dark, ill-smelling nooks, but it may not feel respectability or see the light of day. Pay for it cannot be collected. The man who sells it is an outlaw. He may be caught up any time and imprisoned for years.

John O'Neil, a citizen of Whitehall, N. Y., sent liquor into Rutland by express. His efforts to evade the penalties of the prohibitory law read like a romance, and cover a period of ten years. Last April, the Supreme Court of the United States confirmed all the judgments of the state courts and to day he is incarcerated in the Rutland House of Correction for a sentence of more than fifty-four years. It is virtually a life sentence, for he is about forty-six years of age. Chief Justice Field said that this century had not produced a sentence of such severity. Do you think from the above that the prohibitory law of Vermont is inoperative? Since Mr. Franklyn has been special prosecutor, the traffic has been driven to desperation. A watcher is kept night and day walking Main street and if he sees any person whom he surmises is interested in finding out hidden liquor he gives the alarm. Sometimes the telephone is used and every vestige of the contraband beverage is destroyed. There is not much peace for the wicked and so they want to make war upon the blessed prohibitory law of Vermont.

MRS. CLINTON SMITH,
State Reporter, Middlebury.

MISSOURI.

THUS IT GOES.

A four weeks' teachers' normal at Bolivar, Polk county, has just closed. One of the most interesting features of the session was the oratorical contest. A large audience was in attendance to hear "What ought to be done and what can be done with the liquor traffic." The first prize ($15) was awarded Mr. E. S. Brunson, and Mr. Ed. Pitt received the second prize ($10). The prizes were presented by Mr. E. W. Newton on behalf of the W. C. T. U. Bolivar supports a large L. T. L. and a colored Sunday school.

Springfield has held a successful county convention. The workers of Springfield and the officers of the state are putting forth their best efforts to make the coming state convention the most interesting and profitable convention ever held in the state. Rev. Anna Shaw and other speakers of national reputation are expected to be present. Let every worker in the state be present that she may have a voice in this important work of re-districting our state and amending our constitution. Let all work done in respective departments be faithfully reported that we may know exactly what has been accomplished.

Miss Carrie Carter has been filling a series of engagements in the third district with marked success, and at the same time arranging dates in her own district (the fourteenth) for Mary Clement Leavitt and Mrs. Alice Williams.

On Vine street south of 18th street, Kansas City, the saloon has been banished for the first time to the knowledge of the writer. Colman union and the police commissioners, aided by our Heavenly Father, are responsible for this result. Colman union sent a box of clothing June 1st, valued at twenty-five dollars, to sufferers from the cyclone at Harper, Kan. A successful social was also given in June. In July an open session, for which a good program was furnished, drew a good sized audience and awakened much interest. The first meeting in August was a business meeting. Each member contributed twenty five cents of her own earnings and several dollars were added to the treasury. Officers were elected and the year's work finished.

Three new whisky houses with open doors, no screens and no license, have appeared in Harrisonville. Rather discouraging but they "must go." Reymour union held a successful Demorest medal contest July 1.

Sam Jones was at El Dorado Springs in July and it is said dealt out hot prohibition shell. One of the local ministers has given a sermon on tobacco, another a temperance sermon, and others express their sentiments strongly on the liquor question. Three contests have been held and they are preparing for another one. The union has sent three dollars for prohibition work and have made a comforter to send to Springfield. They are also collecting money for mite boxes.

The little girl who won the grand gold medal at Maitland expects to go with Mrs. Rhoads to Denver in November, to compete for the diamond medal. Mrs. Cochran has organized a flourishing L. T. L. at Oregon, which meets every Sunday. July 1, Craig and Fairfax unions were invited to spend the day with Mrs. M. T. Stickler. The morning was spent socially. Able papers were read, interesting reports were given, recitations were well rendered, ideas were exchanged and plans were made for the extension of the work. Ladies were appointed to furnish literature to the neighboring country schools.

The Christian church of Humansville has been holding a revival meeting, and on one occasion purchased fermented wine at a whisky drugstore and gave it to the congregation in the name of Christ. This was thoughtlessness on the part of deacons, for when they were spoken to they forthwith procured good wine, but it shows how sleepy the church is on this important matter.

Kirksville has a Y of sixteen or eighteen members, some of whom are working. They held a rainbow social some time since that was a success. The W. C. T. U. meets once in two weeks. Here the work of one of our good sisters stands out most prominently. She is earnest and ever on the alert to do all she can "In His Name." She is regarded highly by her people, and the light of temperance shines brilliantly about her head.

The union at Bonne Terre has just held its annual meeting. They have elected a good corps of officers and have taken up nine departments of work. The L. T. L. gave a picnic, in which the Good Templars joined. Swings, hammocks, croquet, a good dinner and plenty of lemonade were some of the pleasures of the day. Miss Carrie Lee Carter was passing through and stopped an hour or two. The sale of ice cream added fifteen dollars to the treasury. They have distributed forty eight mite-boxes, and hope to raise $100 for the Temple by April. They will give a Demorest medal contest soon, the second contest given at Bonne Terre. A union of colored women has been organized, and thus the work goes on.

State Reporter, Humansville.

NEW MEXICO.

ANNUAL CONVENTION.

Our seventh annual convention was held at Las Vegas August 31 to September 2. From the opening session, Wednesday afternoon to the union meeting Sunday evening, the interest was steadily maintained and the attendance unusually large. Delegates came from Albuquerque, Kingston and Socorro, and reports were sent from Santa Fé, Silver City, Gallup and Blossburg. Nor must we fail to mention most encouraging news from Fairfield, New Mexico, where a union has been formed, as an auxiliary to Oakland, Cal., but which will be hereafter connected with New Mexico. The outlook in the territory is growing brighter, seven new unions having been formed the past year, making the total fifteen.

The most hopeful feature of the work is increased interest among the members; and the signs of the times point to a growing confidence and respect by those not directly connected or interested in the temperance cause. These facts were made evident during the convention of Las Vegas. The cordial greetings of the reception committee, the decoration of the First Baptist church with flags, flowers and W. C. T. U. mottoes, the welcoming songs by a chorus of children, and unusually pleasing recitations by a number of young people, as well as special music furnished cheerfully for the evening services, testified to the general interest in the occasion, while the alert, executive ability and warm appreciation manifested by the visiting delegates gave a spirit of unwonted zeal and fellowship to the meetings of the convention.

A new and pleasant feature was the presence of fraternal delegates, one being received from the King's Daughters, the Epworth League, and the Christian Endeavor Society, and the helpful and stimulating attendance of a number of clergymen was highly appreciated. Never before has the local press given such liberal space to the convention; reporters for both daily papers being present at every session.

The most notable features of the evening services were the comprehensive and vigorous annual address by the president, Mrs. M. J. Borden, and an able paper on "The Power of the Press," by Mrs. M. E. Marble, of Kingston.

The election of officers for the ensuing year resulted as follows: Mrs. M. J. Borden, president; Mrs. L. N. Higgins, vice-president; Mrs. L. A. Collings, recording secretary; Mrs. M. P. Stamm, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Ella S. Lucas, treasurer, and Mrs. J. B. Dickinson, territorial press reporter.

Through the generous courtesy of the superintendent of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé railroad, an excursion to the Hot Springs was tendered the delegates on the last afternoon of the convention, and a dinner at the delightful "Montezuma" hotel, by the entertainment committee.

With brighter hopes for the future of the W. C. T. U. in New Mexico, the convention adjourned to meet next year in Albuquerque.

MRS. J. B. DICKINSON, Press Reporter, Las Vegas.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

Will Mr. Wm. A. May, the author of "When the Temp'rance People Win," send his address to this office, care editor of The Advance Guard?

Mrs. Ida Buxton Cole has been meeting with success in the fifteenth district, lecturing for the Y's at Danville, September 4, Sidney, September 7, Catlin, September 8 and at Ambia, Indiana, September 9.

Miss Sarah H. Henly, who was for several years superintendent of prison and jail work, in Little Rock, Ark., W. C. T. U., died last June. She left bequests of $500 to be used in the work of social purity.

The seventh annual convention of Clearfield county, Pa., W. C. T. U. met at Dubois recently, thirty delegates present. The first and second prizes for increase of membership were awarded to the Houtzdale and Lumber City Y's, respectively.

Oklahoma Territory W. C. T. U. boasts the following able corps of officers: Mrs. J. E. Roberts, Elreno, president; Mrs. Emma Miller, Guthrie, vice-president; Mrs. M. E. Smedley, Elreno, corresponding secretary; Mrs. H. Smith, Frisco, recording secretary; Mrs. C. P. Walker, Oklahoma City, treasurer.

The W. C. T. U. Coffee House in Elmira, N. Y., is especially noteworthy for the perfectness of its appointments, it having been entirely renovated throughout. The good women who have it in charge are endeavoring to demonstrate their ability to furnish more than an equivalent for the saloon restaurant, and success has crowned their effort.

David Tatum, the Quaker temperance evangelist, is now on a campaign in Illinois and Iowa. His many years of valiant labor, his high religious character, his ability as a speaker and his small financial demands, all combine to render it a great privilege for our unions to secure him for an address, especially at this campaign time. Any one desiring his services can address him at Ravenswood, Ill.

Dr. Mary Wood Allen, of Toledo, O., long associated with us as a lecturer of exceptional knowledge and attractiveness, speaks on heredity, social purity and hygiene. She also holds mothers' meetings and lectures on physical culture. Miss Willard has recently added Dr. Allen to her department of purity work as a lecturer. Her address is 1412 Adams street, Toledo, O., and local unions would find her services most valuable.

OFFICIAL COMMUNICATIONS

CONCERNING ACCOMMODATIONS FOR VISITORS ATTENDING THE NATIONAL W. C. T. U. CONVENTION.

Hotels and hotel rates for visitors at the National W. C. T. U. Convention to be held in Denver, October 28 to November 2, and for delegates preferring hotels, are being secured by the committee having the matter in charge.

One noticeable feature of Denver is the large number of family hotels or first-class boarding houses, not devoted to the transient trade. These have been taken into consideration as well as the regular hotels within a convenient distance of Trinity M. E. Church, in which the Convention is to be held, and convenient, also, to rapid transit by cable and electric lines.

Brown's Palace, very close to the church, will furnish entertainment at $3 and $4 per day according to location of rooms. This includes meals, as the hotel is conducted on the American plan. The Palace, just completed and furnished, is probably the finest west of Chicago, and superbly located. These rates are given upon the contingency of securing not less than fifty guests.

The Albany, corner of 17th and Stout, offers most reasonable rates, considering the excellence of the hotel, its advantageous location and admirable management. Room and meals, $3 per day, two persons occupying a room, $5 per day. The Albany is a favorite place for conventions. The use of the club rooms will be donated to the executive and delegates, if the Albany is chosen as headquarters. Its distance from the church is about four blocks and the managers are noted for their attention to the comfort of guests.

The Gilsey, 18th and Stout, will furnish rooms by the week, price $4 to $6, two occupying a room will pay nothing extra. Meals, short order. The proprietress is willing to do everything possible for the guests.

The Albert, 17th, between Glenarm and Welton, and distant three blocks from the church, offers pleasant and newly furnished rooms for $1, $1.25 and $1.50 per day. An attractive café gives meals at $1 per day; no bar.

St. James Hotel, Curtis, between 15th and 16th, makes reasonable rates. Cars pass the door.

Broadway Hotel: Rooms and board, $3 per day; two occupying the same room, $2.50 each; very convenient to the church; no bar.

The Ramona, 14th Avenue and South 14th.

L'Imperial, Court Place and 14th, and other family hotels conveniently located, will make reasonable rates, conditional upon having rooms to spare.

The Woman's Christian Association furnishes rooms and board at exceedingly moderate prices.

The Woman's Exchange—auxiliary to the W. C. T. U.—conveniently located, furnishes meals on the short order system, and is convenient to many places where rooms can be secured.

A bureau of information will be established later. Meanwhile, it is desirable that the committee should know as certainly as possible the number of delegates and visitors to be expected, that arrangements can be made more definitely Those delegates wishing to be together should early say so For the present, all parties desiring information on this matter can address

Mrs. Frances Belford.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE HOSPITAL NOTES.

The hospital is quiet and restful, the physicians on its staff are able and competent men and women, while the nurses are being carefully educated in the care of the sick, and last, but not least, alcohol will not be used in the medicines or as a stimulant, and when disease has been conquered the patient does not have to overcome the poison of alcohol taken into the system as a medicine.

The Sunday afternoon meetings at the hospital were opened last Sunday by Mrs. S. M. I. Henry, who gave a very interesting and instructive Bible reading. At present Mrs. Henry is one of the patients in this institution.

Miss Natsu Sakaki and Miss Hoesa Magano, two young ladies from Japan, will take a two years' course of instruction in the Clara Barton Training School for Nurses. These young ladies have entered their work with much interest and enthusiasm.

"Being a temperance man I would like to know if there is anything better than bay rum for the face after shaving?"

"What can a nursing mother use in place of beer? I know that beer drank by the mother will cause an increased supply of milk."

Dr. Ousley, our house physician, answers these questions as follows:

1. Rosewater (distilled better) may be used on the face after shaving instead of bay rum.

2. While beer may increase the quantity of milk it decreases its quality, and you may depend on it, fond mother, your babe fares better without than with such milk. It is like the milk or beef of cows which are fed on distillery slops. Let the mother drink freely of good milk four or five times per day, and eat only nutritious food, not allowing herself to become overworked or worried, and in the majority of cases she will have sufficient nourishment for her child; if not she can alternate the mother's milk with some of the prepared foods which are equally as good.

The following has been sent us by Mrs. Luella Phillips, and we feel sure the plea will touch the many thousand hearts that are beating in sympathy with this temperance work; and may the touch not be in vain:

FRANCES WILLARD BED.

Friends of Temperance:

Miss Kate Jackson has done a noble deed for our great cause by furnishing a room in the Temperance Hospital, which she has named for our chieftain; and now let each admirer of our faithful leader send one dollar, or more, with which to endow a bed for the same. Five thousand dollars will be a permanent endowment, the bed to be occupied by patients sent by temperance people from places where they have no hospital facilities or accommodations, as villages and rural districts. It will arouse and awaken the people to have patients sent from home for proper treatment. The bed is to be occupied by somebody at all times. Let us begin this great work at once so our chieftain may be enabled, while she is yet with us, to see a part of the great good she has accomplished for frail and suffering humanity. Now, all answer at once by sending in your dollars (and tens of dollars, if able) to Mrs. Caliste Bigelow, treasurer, No. 539 West Adams street, Chicago, Ill.

Ellen Snyder, Sec.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The nineteenth annual convention of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Connecticut, will be held in Norwich, October 11, 12 and 13. Addresses will be given by Mrs. Mary A. Livermore and Mrs. J. K. Barney. Mrs. Alice J. Harris, of Boston (prima donna of the National union), will sing during the convention. Visitors as well as delegates are cordially invited to be present.

Mrs. Cornelia B. Forbes, Pres.
Mrs. Mary M. Andrews, Cor. Sec.

The nineteenth annual convention of the New York state Woman's Christian Temperance Union will be held in the Academy of Music in the city of Newburgh, October 4, 5 and 6, 1892. Mrs. Mary A. Livermore will speak on the first evening of the convention; the Y's will have the second evening, and Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap will speak on the last evening.

Our Library Table.

Rev. F. E. Clark, D. D., the widely-known, highly-honored and well-beloved president of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, and the friend of all young people, has written for the girls a book which every mother and elder sister will welcome for its own sweet, pure sake, Looking Out On Life. If, as the girls of to-day, the women of to-morrow, stand on the shores of the great sea of life, they would watch with their quick eyes, not alone for the sparkle and shimmer of the waves, and the foam wreaths they toss into the air, but for the danger signals, for the light-houses and for the distant goals of purity and strength, there would be fewer shipwrecks strewn along the beach. In this book Dr. Clark stands with them, as it were, upon the shore, and with the keen gaze and steady hand of an accustomed mariner, points out the danger spots and the distant Fortunate Isles. Practical, simple, girl-understanding, his words cannot be rejected by honest hearts.

D. Lothrop Company, Boston.

Afro-American Folk Lore told Round Cabin Fires on the Sea Islands of South Carolina is a book that will have an interest all its own for those who seek to study race characteristics through the literature of a people. A quotation from the preface will best speak for the book, which is certainly interesting and unique. The author says of the tales: "They all have that flavor of the life on the Sea Islands, which is so quaint and fascinating to all who have ever known its peculiar charm. It will be noticed that Br'er Rabbit's triumphs over all 'de odder Beastises' is the most prominent feature of all these legends which, by the way, seems as innocent of any moral motif as the animals themselves. It must be remembered that the Rabbit represents the colored man. He is not as large nor as strong, as swift, as wise, nor as handsome as the elephant, the alligator, the bear, the deer, the serpent, the fox, but he is 'de mos' cunnin' man dat go on fo' leg'—and by this cunning he gains success. So the negro, without education or wealth, could only hope to succeed by stratagem."

J. G. Cupples Company, 250 Boylston Street, Boston.

Silver Tones. The title page of this book of songs describes it as a "new temperance and prohibition song book containing the most popular songs sung by the Silver Lake Quartette, for use in W. C. T. U. temperance and prohibition party work, religious meetings, entertainments, evenings of song, etc." Music is an important factor in reform and revolution, and it is not to be doubted that friends will be won for "the cause" by these silver tones of prohibition. The compilers of the above named books are Rev. C. H. Mead, G. E. Chambers, Rev. W. A. Williams.

W. A. Williams, publisher, Warnock, Ohio.

Favorite Selections of Julia and Annie Thomas. This book contains over one hundred exquisite selections in prose and poetry, beautiful in themselves and especially adapted for recitation. It is seldom that a volume of this character is so uniformly charming from first to last. There are gems from the pen of Mary Mapes Dodge, J. G. Holland, Alice and Phœbe Cary, Joaquin Miller and other well-known writers—the treasures having been culled by hands that had the cunning of unerring choice.

The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science for September contains a list of the students in American colleges receiving the degree of Ph. D., for graduate work in political science, political economy, or history, together with a list of the appointments to fellowship in these branches. Sketches are given in this number of prominent men interested in the development of the above named sciences. Prof. David Kinley, of the University of Wisconsin, has contributed an article of special interest to bankers and business men in general, on the "Influence on Business of the Independent Treasury." C. H. Reeve interests lawyers in an article on "Preventive Legislation in Relation to Crime." Teachers and educators are appealed to in Prof. S. N. Patten's paper on the "Economic Causes of Moral Progress."

Among Houghton, Mifflin & Company's publications for 1892 is a very valuable work by John Fiske, viz.: The Discovery of America, with some Account of Ancient America and the Spanish Conquest. This work, in two volumes, is a most complete reference library concerning those past centuries. The author's style is not only pleasing, but powerful. The notes and references are extensive illustrations and maps, numerous and invaluable, the whole making a possession worthy a place on the most richly laden library shelves.

MILKMEN TAKE AN OUTING.

Five Hundred of them the Guests of the New York Condensed Milk Co.

A special train of five cars carried over 500 milkmen and a brass band to Wassaic, Sept. 17, where they made merry for the remainder of the day. They were the guests of the New York Condensed Milk Company upon the occasion of its fifth annual excursion given to its employés. At Wassaic games of all descriptions were indulged in, and a general good time was had. The company gives a similar outing to its employés every year, and the men have grown to look forward to the excursion as an affair of great moment.

OUR DAY FOR OCTOBER

Is now ready. It is a number of exceeding value. Besides the Monday lecture by its distinguished editor (who is now delivering the seventeenth annual course in Music Hall, Boston), the subject of which is "Facts and Fancies of the Higher Criticism," this number tells "How Sabbath Closing of the World's Fair Was Secured," by Wilbur F. Crafts. "The Andover Attack on the American Board" is outlined by Cyrus Hamlin. In Vital Points of Expert Opinion, Senator Hoar speaks of the "Great Issues at Stake in the Presidential Campaign of 1892," and Arnold White tells "The Truth About the Salvation Army." "The Failure of Catholic Public Schools" is described by Wayland Hoyt. These and other valuable articles for thinking men and women constitute a number especially desirable.

Send for a copy. Price 25 cts. per copy; $2.50 per year.

DAILY UNION SIGNAL.

As before announced, preparations are well under way for the production of a daily paper during the forthcoming National Convention, and the plans are more satisfactory than any ever before made. This western convention is to be of engrossing interest. We have received word that Miss Willard has taken passage on the steamship Etruria, which is to sail on October 8 next, and it is hoped that William T. Stead and Lady Henry Somerset will accompany her. In any event, the convention will be another anniversary of the great organization called the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and every member will need to know what takes place.

We are exceedingly anxious that there should be no disappointment anywhere, and appeal to you to do all you can to prevent any. How? Well, by sending in your subscriptions early.

Take Notice.—THE DAILY UNION SIGNAL will be mailed daily from Denver to all subscribers whose orders reach this office on or before October 15. Subscribers whose orders reach this office later than October 15 will receive the five numbers of THE DAILY UNION SIGNAL all in one wrapper, mailed from Chicago after the return from Denver.

We advise you to order NOW. As an added inducement we agree to send a copy of the World's Fair number of The Advance Guard to every subscriber to THE DAILY UNION SIGNAL whose orders for the same are received before the date named—October 15. Price of DAILY UNION SIGNAL for five days named, 25c.

WHITE RIBBON OR GOLD?

BY ESTELLE THOMSON.

Ruban, out on the edge of the grape field, looked up and down the long, green, shining rows of vines, and felt the weight of a great responsibility. Uncle Philander was away; and all these grapes, that would be ready for the presses soon, were to be harvested and cared for. There was wine in them even now, as their globes grew rich with color in the sun; there would be money in them by and by. But Ruban was such a mite of a fellow.

The little California valley was full of viny sights and smells. Around it circled the hills, in lines that were like blue waves running high, when one viewed them from afar; that were thick with wild grass and spotted with rocks and full of flowers, when one climbed their sides and looked up to the higher peaks and the mountain chains. Beyond these peaks and chains, to eastward, the desert lay; to westward with foothills cutting its shimmer from sight, dimpled the sea. And the wind from inland, heated from passing over that stretch of burning sand, blew down gently through little gaps in the mountain wall, and reaching the valley, turned to rich and copious vintage every autumn the grapes that grew by myriads among the leaves.

They had drifted into this sunny, warm enclosure—Ruban and Uncle Philander, and Aunt Natty—one year when there was a bountiful harvest. All the fruits on the sides of the pretty, round hills were ripe for gathering; the entire air was scented with grapes. Men and women, even children, were at work picking clusters and filling trays, and teams were hauling fragrant loads up to the wine house doors where the great vats received them. For days it seemed that everybody lived in open air. Uncle Philander and Aunt Natty felt that they wanted to stay right here, and they bustled around and found the adobe house and moved in directly, and here they were, snug and happy in a vine spot of their very own—their very own, all but a small fraction of title that they lacked three hundred dollars to cover. And that want of three hundred dollars was the one drawback now to perfect bliss.

Still they were very comfortable; and Ruban ate and ate and grew strong and freckled and handsomer each day; Aunt Natty's cheeks filled out, and Uncle Philander—well, well! you never saw such a change in any one in all your life.

You see, Uncle Philander had what the neighbors at home had been wont to call an "unlucky streak." His properties always ran down, no matter how good they were at first, until when he came to sell he invariably had to take a little less than what he had paid. He was looking for easier ways of making money, too, than the old-fashioned, slow-plodding ones; and he was apt to see fortunes just ahead, when any new scheme offered, and to want to rush off to something else exactly when he had made a good start at what he was already doing. Some folks are born that way, and Aunt Natty said she supposed he couldn't help it, although it did seem to her sometimes that he might have tried a little harder. But most unlucky of all was the way Uncle Philander hugged that little brown bottle he carried under his coat. Not that he was counted a "hard drinker," by any means. Oh, no! nobody had ever said that yet. He hadn't a craving in the world for that little brown bottle or what it contained—so he often declared, and he believed it. He could give it up at any time, he told his cronies, with a fine, independent toss of the head that was very pleasing to see. But he didn't give it up, and that is where the trouble lay. When the weather was warm he took a draught to make him cool, and when the weather was cold he drank a drop to make him hot; and always he was a trifle too hot or too cold, and so he tippled away; and the little brown bottle was no more allowed to go dry than was Uncle Philander himself.

"I tell you I can give it up any day, if I want to," he still persisted, and Ruban, noting that fine toss of the head, thought how excellent a thing it is to be independent, with a strong will, like dear old Uncle Philander.

Ever since they had taken possession of the vineyard, however, Uncle Philander had stuck to work quite contentedly, and Aunt Natty was greatly encouraged. He and Ruban had brought the vine-ground into beautiful order. Such stocky shrubs as those vines were, and every year loaded with mammoth clusters of green and amber and rose and ruby colors. Then the nut trees stood up strong and thrifty, prune trees purpled under their bountiful crop, the guava bushes shone as if their leaves were varnished, and all the pretty red earth was rich and mellow; while such a woodpile as Aunt Natty had to burn from—twisted manzanita and white fig-wood and plenty of sweet geranium stalks. Everything was prospering with Uncle Philander then. So the weeks went on, until the last of the pruning was done, the winter rains had fallen to make the plowing easy and the earth was freshly turned, the picking trays were stacked in rows and the fermenting vats cleaned ready for another vintage's use, and Zephyr, the ranch horse, had been put out to pasture in sweet alfalfa that was up to a tall man's boot-tops—when one day Uncle Philander came home from market all in a panic.

He led a strange beast by a string, and over the queer animal's back were strapped a gay bedquilt, a funny shovel and a flaring iron pan. In front, a brand new coffee pot dangled in the sun.

Ruban's eyes dilated as he gazed, and Aunt Natty, happening to the window, suddenly threw her apron over her head and commenced to cry. Poor Aunt Natty!—or perhaps I should say, poor Uncle Philander! Oh, but Aunt Natty knew what was the matter then.

But you—of course you could not guess, unless you have lived in lands where gold is in the rocks and in the beds of the streams, and a little fleck laid bare and shown by one man to his fellows sets the whole town crazy. Uncle Philander's town had gone crazy; Uncle Philander himself said so, and he was the craziest of them all.

After that it was not long before everybody was too wild to work. Not a road nor a little trail leading southward but was thronged with prospectors on foot with their outfits strapped around them; with saddle trains, and sturdy burros loaded with packs; with great canvas top wagons; with many swinging horse coaches filled with eager life; with movables of all sorts, and with people of all sorts anxious to reach and bear away the gold. It was almost like starting for another war, Aunt Natty said. And it all came about in such a simple way, through a single nugget and a handful of yellow dust that some wandering Indians, scraping with horn spoons in the rifts of the rocks, brought in one day to barter for beads and calico.

But what a wild-fire spread! And what a blank life appeared at first to Ruban, after one gray dawn when his wistful eyes followed Uncle Philander, astride the bedquilt and the strange donkey, jogging steadily down the road and out of sight beyond the red geranium hedge.

"You and Aunt Natty can stay and look after the vines," Uncle Philander had said to Ruban with hopeful enthusiasm many times before he jogged away, "and before long I'll send back money to set the ranch free. No more hard work then. I'll take life easy in my old age, and you shall run the vineyard just for spending money."

But as days went on his letters home were not so hopeful. One kind of bad luck followed another, and the gold proved too scarce, and the prospectors too many, and it was plain to be seen that his hopefulness was oozing away. Sometimes he wrote that he was very hard up, and he wanted this thing and that, and was suffering for necessities that a few dimes would buy. At such times Aunt Natty cried a little, and scrimped herself and sold a few fowls, or eggs, or something from the ranch that she had counted on to buy grocery stores, and sent the sum thus eked out to Uncle Philander. Only once did Ruban hear her complain, and that was when Uncle Philander wrote that he had been compelled to pawn his watch to buy medicine. He had caught cold sleeping on the damp ground, and must have something warming to stay him up. Then Aunt Natty burst out:

"Medicine! It's that wicked little brown bottle that's ruining him. He'll drink up the ranch yet, and all that we can sell from it."

Ruban listened, aghast.

"But—Aunt Natty," he said, "why don't you—write to Uncle Philander to give it up? He can give it up; he says so."

Aunt Natty turned and Ruban was startled, she looked so white and wan.

"Never, Ruban!" she cried. "He can never give it up now unless some miracle happens. He thought once he was strong enough, and perhaps he was. But oh, the first drop! It makes way for another, and another; and by and by one becomes so miserably weak. May you never touch your lips to the vile stuff! May the wine of our own hills never tempt you as Uncle Philander has been tempted. Sometimes I almost hate these vines."

Ruban crept out to the vineyard, and looked up and down the rows in great perplexity.

The grapes, glowing abundant among the green, were almost ready for the presses; a few more weeks would turn their juices to ruby floods running through the great vats. But what dreadful thing were they doing? Not only was Uncle Philander drinking up the garden, drinking up comfort out of the house, drinking up Aunt Natty's smiling cheeks and the happy light of her eyes, drinking up all the little homely pleasure of their lives, while they scrimped and worked and worried—but they were going on growing vines and harvesting grapes and adding wine for bottles that might fill other homes with equal sorrow.

Poor little Ruban! Poor Aunt Natty! Poor Uncle Philander! And just then Ruban, looking up, saw Dan.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—The following story is written by a little Cozy-Corner niece. She imagines "Bessie" as seated beneath a poplar tree crying over some little trial when a voice is heard, and this is WHAT THE POPLAR TOLD BESSIE.

"Long before you were born a tribe of Indians lived in this wood. Their chief was an old man, and he had a young daughter who was as pretty as a princess. Many a time she would lay her soft, dusky cheek against my bark and talk to me in her musical language. The old chief was very proud of his daughter, and thought nothing too good for her.

"Everything went pleasantly till the white men came. The Indians generously gave their white brothers land. It would have been all right if the white men had not been selfish and wanted all of the land. They gave the Indians some of the 'fire water' (the Indian name for whisky) and got them drunk, and offered them ten bottles of the poisonous stuff for the land. The Indians, not knowing what they were about, made the bargain.

"One night at one of their carousals the chief ordered the girl to bring another bottle. She was afraid and hesitated. The chief was enraged and threw an empty bottle at her; it struck her, and she fell. In a moment he realized what he had done; he bent over her and tried to raise her; but she was dead. Do you wonder I hate whisky when it killed my little Indian sister?"

"No, indeed," said Bessie, "but what became of the chief and the rest?"

The tree sighed and would say nothing more.

PUBLISHER'S NOTES

BETTER STILL.

Further correspondence with the Phillips Business College has developed a plan by which we are enabled to make an unparalleled offer to our subscribers. Remember this college is one of the best in the country and makes a specialty of instruction by mail. With this fully in mind, we restate the proposition made before, modified to meet the new arrangements.

First, every young person needs a business education. To properly conduct business correspondence and to keep books correctly will be a help to every homekeeper and be a great help to every officer and member of local unions. So we advise every reader of THE UNION SIGNAL to take this instruction.

What will it cost? The price is now within the reach of all our readers.

If you will comply with the plans here set forth it will cost but little.

The price of home instruction is $5 per month.

The price of THE UNION SIGNAL is $1 per year.

Send one new subscription to THE UNION SIGNAL and we will send an order entitling you to one month's instruction from the Phillips Business College without extra charge.

A letter just received says:

"I am arranging to offer a new one hundred dollar type writer as a prize to the student who shall make the greatest progress during a given time."

Do not delay. Send one new name and $1 without delay and enroll yourself in the home instruction class now being organized. Address,

WOMAN'S TEMP. PUB. ASS'N,
THE TEMPLE,
Chicago, Ill.

A GREAT WORK! A GREAT OPPORTUNITY!!

The Revised Encyclopedia Britannica which we offer to our readers at the unheard-of rate of only ten cents a day for ninety days, is a unique and splendid work. It has no peer among Encyclopedias. There is but one Bible for Christians; one Talmud for Hebrews; one Koran for Mohammedans, and there is but one Encyclopedia Britannica for the people who speak and read the English language, and who turn to it as to the one comprehensive, all-inclusive and authoritative epitome of human knowledge in all its branches.

To possess this matchless work is to own a whole library and have access to information on every subject within the domain of human experience, study or inquiry. The extraordinary terms announced on another page upon which the Revised Encyclopedia Britannica will be supplied to our readers, are only for such readers.

Remember this fact.

It is an exclusive privilege.

A few years ago the complete edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica cost nearly $200, thus preventing any but the wealthy from purchasing it. We are now able to offer a later, a better and more complete edition in 20 volumes, comprising a total of 7,000 pages, with 96 colored maps.

We have confidence in it and we know our readers will be benefited by having this great work to consult. We are willing to trust you. In proof of this we send the entire 20 volumes with all charges prepaid on receipt of only $1, and allow you to pay the balance at the rate of 10 cents a day, the same being remitted monthly for a period of 90 days.

Can we do any more?

There is now no further excuse for not owning this great Reference Library. Take advantage of the offer now. Do not delay. The offer is made for a short time and to our subscribers only.

A VALUABLE HINT.

"I must tell you what one of the L. T. L. boys, who lives in West Roxbury, did a short time since. He gathered thirty-six ten cent subscriptions for THE UNION SIGNAL, and out of that number we secured several yearly patrons for the paper. I think that effort put forth in securing trial subscriptions for our SIGNAL pays."

I HAVE ten shares of stock in the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association which I desire to sell; will sell in lots of one or more shares as may be desired. Price, $25 each. R. Q. KING.

Signal Notes.

THERE is a temperance retail grocers association in Montreal.

EIGHT colored men have been employed during the past year by the National Temperance Society to work among the colored people in the South.

A CELEBRATED French juggler, when asked about training, said: "Don't drink, and smoke as little as possible." Only recently have the force-giving qualities of oatmeal vater over all stimulants been discovered /hen unusual exertion is needed.

WHILE a certain Englishman was in Egypt on business, he was invited by the governor of the place to dine, with the explanation that the governor's religion would not allow him to offer wine. When he heard that his guest was an abstainer, he exclaimed with surprise, "And he is a Christian!"

THE physician in charge of the Washingtonian Home, Boston, says that he has patients all the time who are ginger curse victims to alcoholism from the use of Jamaica ginger. Ginger requires the strongest alcohol to hold it in solution, and quickly destroys the tone of the stomach. The crystallized preparation is the only safe one.

THE Inter-Collegiate Prohibition Association of the United States, with headquarters at Ann Arbor, Mich., was organized in June, 1892. The object is to reach students in every college, who are Prohibitionists, and organize them for active work in the coming campaign. As the proportion of Prohibitionists among college students is ten times as large as that of the general population, such an association is an important one. It includes both active and honorary members.

THE temperance question in Germany is always interesting. The greatest hindrance to work among them is their antipathy to radical temperance views, for to them temperance means moderation. Free-flowing beer seems to be a symbol of personal liberty and its consumption the surest way to destroy the sale of distilled liquors. But Germany itself is awaking to the necessity of reform and work is being done by the Blue Cross, Good Templars and other organizations; even the Reichstag has introduced a bill for the suppression of drunkenness.

GEORGE W. CHILDS, editor of the Philadelphia Ledger, a journalist who does not print a Sunday edition of his paper, says: "Would you learn the lesson of success? Here it is in three words. Would you climb the ladder? It has just three rounds: Industry, Temperance, Frugality. Besides these, I have had during my business career the following mottoes: 'Be true'; 'Be kind'; 'Keep out of debt'; 'Do the best and leave the rest'; 'What can't be cured must be endured'; 'The perfect man is one who has a clear commission, an honest purpose, a bright mind and a healthy body.' I can't bring too great stress on the matter of strict temperance. Drinking beer, wine or spirits is a useless and dangerous habit. It does no good and if it is persisted in it is almost sure to lead to destruction and death. You should have courage enough to say no, if you are asked to drink. There is no safety in moderate drinking. The man who touches alcoholic drink at all is in danger. As to sociability, you should try to make companions of the best people that you can become acquainted with. In order to do this you must have something in yourself that may be a return to them for what they give you. A man is known by the company he keeps. I cannot sum up my advice to young people better than to say the greatest pleasure in life comes from doing good to others. Do good constantly, patiently and wisely, and you will never have cause to say that life was not worth living."

False Economy

Is practiced by many people who buy inferior articles of food because cheaper than standard goods. Surely infants are entitled to the best food obtainable. It is a fact that the Gail Borden "Eagle" Brand Condensed Milk is the best infant food. Your grocer and druggist keep it.

This picture shows two laundresses, one at work, the other not able to, because her hands are cracked and sore—she has been using soap containing too much alkali. Read Prof. Leed's report.

Gentlemen: The sample of "IVORY" Soap which you sent to me for analysis has been received, and you will find analysis herewith. The "IVORY" Soap, while strongly cleansing, leaves the skin soft and pleasant to the touch instead of harsh, uncomfortable, and liable to chap, as results from the use of many common laundry soaps, in which the ratio of uncombined to combined alkali is large. The percentage of uncombined fat in the "IVORY" is very small, hence the lather is clean, white and abundant, with entire absence of oil or grease. There are no injurious substances.

The above considerations show the "IVORY" to be a pure soap and excellent for laundry use.

W. E. TAYLOR, 552 55th Street, Chicago.

OUR Chicago correspondent has made special investigation of the Harvey Land Association of Chicago. He reports a most delightful visit paid to Harvey, which he found a clean, bright, flourishing town of 4,500 inhabitants, all grown up within two years, with several church organizations, one of them a recently formed and promising Presbyterian church, not a saloon in the place nor any possibility of one for all time to come—so reads every deed—and a permanent basis for growing prosperity in the location of a dozen or more great manufacturing plants, employing over 2,000 hands and representing millions of capital. Best of all, the affairs of the Association are in the hands of men eminent in business and religious circles, the president, Mr. T. W. Harvey, being the superintendent of the Second Presbyterian Church Sabbath school of Chicago; the vice president, Mr. Fleming H. Revell, the well-known religious book publisher of New York and Chicago, and brother-in-law of Mr. Moody. The place is evidently destined to become one of the great manufacturing centres of the West; conveniently located, it promises to be a rendezvous for temperance people during the World's Fair, at which time large profits will undoubtedly be made on the sale of lots, as they have been thus far —N. Y. Evangelist.

THREE HARVEST EXCURSIONS.

Half Rates via the Illinois Central.

Aug. 30th, Sept. 27th and Oct. 25, 1892.

The Central Route will sell Excursion tickets to the Agricultural Regions of the West, Southwest and South, at one fare for the Round Trip, from stations on its lines north of Cairo, on August 30th, and September 27th. A third excursion will be run to the South and Southwest on October 25th. Your Local Ticket Agent will give you full particulars in regard to these Harvest Excursions; arrangements can also be made in this connection to visit the desirable Railroad Lands for sale by the Illinois Central in Southern Illinois on obtaining special permission to do so by addressing the Company's Land Commissioner at Chicago, Mr. E. P. Skene. In addition, a few weeks before the first Excursion date, your Local Ticket Agent will be able to furnish you with a special Folder, issued by the Illinois Central, which will give you particulars of these Harvest Excursions in such form as will enable you to plan your journey at home. Should you not be within call of a railroad ticket agent, address A. H. Hanson, G. P. A., Illinois Central R. R., Chicago, Ill.

Ramey & Co., 85 Dearborn St., Chicago, advertise for agents in this issue. They have a good article, and their agents are doing a large business. Read their advertisement on our last page.

Our Library Table.

T. Y. Crowell & Co. have placed upon the market some books whose very covers it is a pleasure to the book lover to touch, knowing that the lids are the "outward and visible sign" of an inward grace. These books are as follows:

A PLEA FOR THE GOSPEL is a new volume of addresses by the Rev. George D. Herron, D. D., of Burlington, Iowa. One cannot read far through its pages without becoming possessed of a hearty enthusiasm for the eloquence, terseness, keen insight and spiritual fervor of the author.

SHORT STUDIES IN BOTANY, by Mrs. Harriet C. Cooper, is a very interesting little volume, that will readily attract even the children who are not easily held by the printed page. Written in narrative form by one who evidently understands her audience, with fifty illustrations to aid and beautify, printed on elegant paper in the large, clear type best suited to children's eyes, it must prepare in most delightful manner the way for closer botanical studies in later years, besides giving to its readers a beneficial knowledge of the commonest plant life in field and garden.

Anna Chapin Ray, "but yet a woman," has given to the public who read "boys' books" one that will win for itself hearty praise. It is entitled THE CADETS OF FLEMMING HALL, and is a fitting exponent of the better school and college life which has without doubt come to stay, that in which the rough jokes and brutal treatment of junior students by the regulation "bullys" have been replaced by good fellowship, healthy competitions and honest rewards to honest endeavor. The seventy cadets of Flemming Hall have a circle of leaders, these in turn led by teachers of steady hand and strong heart. The characters are strong and the incidents full of humor with enough pathos to temper the whole. It is well nigh impossible to repress an occasional hearty laugh at the boyish humor that plays at times upon the most commonplace occasions. A thoroughly clean, enjoyable book.

THE RIVER PARK REBELLION and A TALE OF THE TOW PATH are by Homer Greene, the two stories bound in one volume. The first is a lively, fascinating story of school-life, with a sound moral, not "tacked on" but permeating the whole. Ths latter story is odd and touching, and reads like an "ower true tale."

POLLY BUTTON'S NEW YEAR, by Mrs. C. F. Wilder, is what may be termed a "little story" as far as length is concerned, but its eleven chapters comprehend some of the loveliest truths of the Christian life, set forth in a manner most refreshingly quaint and original. Polly Button, a quiet, even humble church member, has the oddest ways of listening to her pastor, and then forgetting to listen as she soliloquizes in her own mind on points she has seized as available for use. Carrying the gospel away with her she proceeds to live out the precious precepts, all unconscious of the power of her example in the community. The narrative is at once attractive, refreshing and helpful, and the dainty dress of the little volume, with its decoration of old-fashioned "bachelors' buttons" makes it very complete.

MIXED PICKELS is the very happy title of a book over which, because of its irresistible attractions, young readers will spend hours of unmingled delight. Pickel is the name of a German family who come to reside, with other grandchildren, in the roomy, old fashioned "snuggery" of American grandparents. Each character, from great hearted, good-natured "Fritzy Nunky," down to the youngest Pickel of all, has his own individuality and charm. The story is original in design, breezy, wholesome, and in an easy, natural manner points more than one valuable moral. By Mrs. Evelyn H. Raymond, author of "Monica, the Mesa Maiden."

FAMOUS TYPES OF WOMANHOOD is another addition to the charming series of "famous" people, as portrayed by Sarah K. Bolton. The reading of biographies must remain one of the most powerful factors in the education of young people along the line of the humanities. Known what books a person reads, known also his mental tastes, and if among these books the lives of men and women who have lived after death because of noble traits of character, one may be not uncertain that the reader has an affinity for and reaching out after high ideals. Mrs. Bolton has the secret of the successful historian. She knows how to cull from her wide field the facts to be presented, and in the presentation knows how to win and hold her listeners. In the book above named, some of the types are, Queen Louise, of Prussia, Madame Récaimer, Harriet Martineau, Jenny Lind, etc. Fine illustrations make the work complete and very desirable.

Houghton, Mifflin & Company have issued in rich green binding with gold lettering, AUTUMN, extracts from the journal of Henry D. Thoreau. This eminent writer was such a close student of nature in all her details, the changes that heralded the coming seasons, the habits of wood denizens in their undisturbed homes, the form and feature of earth and sky, trees and flowers, streams and pools, that what he says of them is accepted as authority. Very near to nature's heart, he interprets her secrets and unfolds them to an appreciative audience. Such reading as this cools the fevered brain, calms the hurried pulse, and brings to lives of trade and traffic whispers of higher and better things.

In theme akin to the foregoing volume is THE FOOTPATH WAY, by Bradford Torrey. The titles of some of the chapters will be suggestive of the contents of this volume, bound appropriately in pale green, and decorated with pine cones: "June in Franconia," "December Out of Doors," "Robin Roosts," "A Great Blue Heron," "Flowers and Folks," etc. It is well nigh impossible to describe such writings in a few stereotyped phrases, but as one reads, woodsy odors seem to fill the air, field-notes catch the ear, memories of cool, dark pines, swaying willows and leaping brooks thrill the senses, and we bless the author for having cheated us out of our everyday matter-of-factness for a little.

THOMAS PSYCHO-PHYSICAL CULTURE AND ELOCUTION, by Julia and Annie Thomas. "Psycho-Physical Culture may be defined as those exercises or movements of the body excited and sustained by soul-force, and directed by, without taxing, mental activity. To render exercise as beneficial as possible it should be of a nature to excite the spirits with pleasurable emotions and to attract the mind as well as to occupy the body. The object is to employ all the muscles of the body, and to strengthen those especially which are weak." The foregoing words are quoted from the book in question, as the best definition of its purport. It is a work admirably fitted for self-culture along these lines, or for the use of a teacher in classes. It is widely acknowledged that a serious defect in our twentieth century culture is the development of brain and nerve to the neglect of bone and muscle, and the "gospel of the body," as taught by these two notable women should not be by any lightly considered.

Address Annie Thomas, 32 West Twenty-sixth street, New York.

Four tiny English publications have come from over seas to our Library Table, claiming for their author, Rev. F. B. Meyer, Minister of Regent's Park chapel, London. They are leaflets, or tracts, severally entitled, WORDS OF HELP FOR CHRISTIAN GIRLS, SEVEN RULES FOR DAILY LIVING, WHY SIGN THE PLEDGE? and THE LAST CHORD FOUND. Each one contains gems of spiritual truth for practical, experimental living, and is worth reading, re-reading and circulating from hand to hand.

S. W. Partridge & Co., 9 Paternoster Row, London.

Edgar F. Howe is the author of a most timely book containing biographical sketches of GEN. JOHN BIDWELL, Prohibition nominee for President, and DR. JAMES B. CRANFILL, nominee for Vice-President. Two excellent portraits of the nominees, as well as nominating speeches, national platform and Bidwell's letter of acceptance are included in the book, which is valuable and exceedingly interesting all through.

Although not among the issues of this year, it may be well to call attention to PROHIBITION: THE PRINCIPLE, THE POLICY, THE PARTY, by E. J. Wheeler, of the Voice. The book is remarkably strong from first to last, its strength lying in the cool logic of the writer. It impresses one as being written out of a conviction that has become crystallized beyond all possibility of change. It certainly ought to have a prominent place among the campaign libraries of the season.

John R. Anderson Co., 150 Nassau St., New York.

GULF AND GLACIER, by Willis Boyd Allen, is the sixth of the charming "Pine Cone Series," over which the boys and girls, and older readers, too, have had such happy times. Starting from Boston on the excursion car, "Kamloops," a merry party enjoys the long trip on the Canadian Pacific to the region of glaciers in the far west. The author's inimitable style of narrative, lending attraction to what might prove "dry" historical reference, and making the amusing incidents of travel fairly rich with spicy humor, is beyond representation in any brief review. This is the the last of the "Pine Cone Series." May the author quickly follow it by others from his facile pen!

D. Lothrop Company, Boston.

THE TEMPERANCE PLATFORM comprises sixty selections of prose and poetry on total abstinence suitable for recitations at public meetings, social gatherings and prize contests, compiled by Miss L. Penney. The writers from whose works selection has been made are well known, such as Geo. W. Bain, J. G. Holland, John B. Gough, Clinton B. Fisk, Neal Dow, Helen Campbell, etc. Published by the National Temperance Society, 58 Reade St., New York.

From the same house comes TEMPERANCE SHOT AND SHELL, EIGHT HUNDRED CARTRIDGES FOR THE TEMPERANCE ARMY, compiled by J. N. Stearns, being a large number of short, pithy quotations on "Alcohol," "Drunkenness," "The Pledge," "License," etc. Also a BOOK OF DIALOGUES, by Rev. A. J. Davis, bright dialogues suited for recitations by boys and girls in schools or temperance societies.

The American Book Company, publishers of school and college text books, have issued for the current school year NUMBERS UNIVERSALIZED: AN ADVANCED ALGEBRA, by David M. Sensenig, M. S., Professor of Mathematics, State Normal School, West Chester, Pa. The book is one that will fill the mathematic loving hearts with all a student's pleasure, and by reason of its helpfulness in the perspicuity of its teachings render the non-royal road to higher mathematics less rough for the timorous ones.

SERMONS AND ADDRESSES BY JONATHAN BLANCHARD, former president of Knox and Wheaton Colleges, and editor of the Christian Cynosure. The pages of this volume are packed with strong utterances on vital questions, valuable for themselves, and of interest because of the widely-known and highly esteemed author.

Published by the National Christian Association, Chicago.

RELIGIOUS CHARACTER OF THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE, an address (now in pamphlet form) delivered at Ocean Grove at the twelfth annual meeting of the National Temperance Society and Publication House, by Rev. Thomas L. Poulson, D. D. In the course of this address Dr. Poulson traces the origin and progress of the cause, showing clearly that it has been the child of the Christian church, relating the history of the weakening of her alliance with it, the dawning of a new era when she again awoke fully to her responsibilities and was duly recognized in her truest associations with the national and world-wide interest, closing with an appeal to her to remain staunch and rise to her fullest stature as an angel of light to expel the darkness of sin.

Nat. Temp. Soc. and Pub. House, 58 Reade St., New York City.

It is becoming more and more of a custom when one who has been beloved and honored in the circles in which he has been wont to move passes over to the eternal shores, for loving hands to collect the tender words of tribute that have been said or written, and put them into permanent form. Early in the spring, just before the "time of the singing of birds," James Munroe Gordon, of Auburndale, Mass., answered the call to join the communion of them that are invisible. He not only died as Christians die, but his life was a rich testimony to the power and grace of God. The little volume that has been prepared as a tribute to Mr. Gordon's memory contains the sermon preached in the Auburndale Congregational church, by Rev. F. E. Clark, on "The Magnitude and the Possibilities of the Human Soul." Also the address given at the funeral service by Rev. Calvin Cutler, pastor of the Congregational church at Auburndale. The touching memorial service, resolutions, a brief biographical sketch, and a letter from Frances E. Willard, have made a booklet that will be reverently prized by Mr. Gordon's large circle of friends and acquaintances.

A LITERARY GUIDE FOR HOME AND SCHOOL, by Mary Alice Caller, teacher of English Classics in Alabama Conference Female College. Published by Charles E. Merrill & Co., New York City.

Perhaps one of the brightest hopes of the civilized world, and markedly so of our own American life, is the fact that parents are ever eager to push their children beyond those heights of education and attainment which they themselves had reached at a corresponding period. This fact alone augurs for such books as this one of Mary Alice Caller, a ready acceptance. The LITERARY GUIDE is the outgrowth of a need wisely considered, and is in itself a success. Perhaps only a few of the young people held in mind during its writing will themselves peruse it be cause of its kinship to a text-book, but in the hands of parents, teachers and friends, it must prove a valuable aid in the guidance of literary tastes. May it not be that the life-principle of the book lies in its central chapter on "The Book of the Ages—the Bible," since all learning, ignorant of the Book of God, is but dire foolishness, and none can go greatly astray who is familiar with its blessed pages.

NURSES AND NURSING, by Lisbeth D. Price. Published by Messrs. Flood & Vincent, Meadville, Penn.

A careful examination of the above treatise will show it to have been written with great care and intelligence, without doubt out of a practical experience that has taken keen notes on all sides. Yet the author shows a lamentable degree of error in her manner of thinking, as she sets forth the same in the chapter on "Food for the Invalid." Physicians and nurses, who, laying aside the trammels of early education and personal prejudice, look facts fairly and squarely in the face, bringing to their aid the teaching of science, cease to prescribe tonics and "foods" whose base is alcohol; and the man or woman who through the prescription of wine jellies, mulled wines, milk and whisky, and porter, runs the risk of implanting irrevocably the germs of death—i. e. the taste and craving for alcoholics—in the name of life-rescuing, is nothing short of criminal.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Mrs. President Harrison is improving.

General Lew Wallace has completed a new novel.

Destructive prairie fire swept across the plains of North Dakota last Saturday.

October 1st was observed by Jews throughout the world as the day of atonement.

The American board of foreign missions began its annual meeting October 4 in Chicago.

M. Ernest Renan, the distinguished author and philologist, died in Paris, October 2, aged sixty-nine.

Terra cotta is the color selected for the municipal decorations of Chicago on Columbus Day, October 21.

The British cabinet is considering the question of a money grant for the benefit of the evicted Irish tenantry.

Mrs. Potter Palmer, president of the board of lady managers, will speak at the dedication exercises October 21.

Michigan school children have contributed $3,988.69 to the penny fund for the educational exhibit at the World's Exposition.

The new Chicago university opened October 1, with six hundred students and no formal exercises. Fully one-third of the students are young women.

Five of the members of the advisory committee of the Homestead strikers were arrested on the 30th ult., charged with treason against the commonwealth.

The laymen at the German Catholic Congress in Newark, N. J., last week voted down the priests' resolution which favored the opening of the World's Fair on Sunday.

It is now proposed to admit the public to the Exposition grounds on dedication day at fifty cents a piece, instead of issuing passes to stockholders and prominent people.

The fiftieth anniversary of the Sons of Temperance, numbering sixty-seven thousand six hundred, was celebrated in New York City, September 29 and 30. Resolutions were adopted protesting against the sale of liquor and open gates on Sunday at the Columbian Exposition. The next meeting will occur in Chicago in June, 1893.

The convention of the Congregational churches of Wisconsin which closed its annual meeting at Milwaukee last week, representing two hundred and sixteen churches, one hundred and seventy-six ministers, and five thousand members, passed strong resolutions for prohibition and against the Sunday opening of the Columbian Exposition.

THE Christian and temperance causes of Chicago have recently received a valuable accession in the person of Dr. Graham Taylor, formerly of Hartford, Conn., who has accepted a professorship in the Chicago Theological Seminary. Dr. Taylor has had a remarkable career in the East as a successful evangelist among drinking men, and Chicago can offer him an illimitable field in this direction, as well as a warm welcome.

SINCE the publication of THE UNION SIGNAL symposiums on dress reform, many letters have come approving the simultaneous adoption by women of a suitable street costume for the Columbian Exposition. The good brothers in-law have expressed their sympathy with a heartiness that has strengthened such a movement, though woman's love for the beautiful demands more grace than was exhibited in their cut of a suit in our columns of September 1. The lifetime of an able woman is not too high a price to give for the help of her sex in the way of sensible dress, and numberless hearts are hoping that a new Deborah has already arisen to lead them out of the bondage of trailing skirts.

THE Louisiana lottery is trying hard to get a foothold in the Hawaiian Islands and the greatest excitement prevails among the better classes, as a consequence. The women of Honolulu, under the leadership of the W. C. T. U., have held numerous indignation meetings and prepared resolutions to be presented to the Queen and through the public school teachers to the children. Public sentiment is thoroughly aroused. Vigilance is the price of liberty in this case, surely, and the power of women in government was never more clearly shown.

MISS WILLARD believes that all white-ribboners will accept it as an act of universal good will on her part to give public credit to the two remedies that were so effectual in preventing seasickness on her recent voyage to England. These were Georgia water and Brush's prophylactic elixir. Our "chieftain" is extremely occupied with her annual address, and we believe is already feeling the benefit of the complete change of environment. Before this reaches the eye of many of our readers she will be again sailing o'er the briny deep. May "God's safe ferry" bear her gently!

THE Pan-Presbyterian Council, which has been holding a long and important session, in Toronto, Canada, adjourned September 30. This Council represented seventeen different Presbyterian denominations and three million six hundred thousand members. It is a conferring, rather than a legislative body, but its utterances are always weighty. One of the most important decisions was the appointment of a delegation to induce the United States government to enter into an agreement with England, France and Germany to prevent the sale of ardent spirits in the New Hebrides.

AN event of unusual import occurred the past week. It was the landing at Boston of sixty Esquimaux direct from Labrador, who are to be among the objects of special interest at the Columbian Exposition of 1893. They are to spend the winter in erecting their own village which is to occupy nearly three acres of ground, and it is to be hoped for their sake that the winter may be a cold one, as otherwise it will be necessary to erect cold-storage houses for them. They have brought with them their own reindeer, snow shoes, and sleds, and everything essential to the complete furnishing of their novel village, and will carry on their native domestic life, as they are in families.

WE hear nothing said respecting the sale of liquors at the Columbian Fair. We understand that the whole territory of the Fair and adjacent property is under prohibition by state law. This fact does not cut any figure, it would seem, in the opinion of the directors, or of the enterprising brewers and liquor dealers. The directors go on and make contracts with the German commissioner by which liquors are provided in his department. Citizens have secured all the eligible lots, it is said, with a view to opening saloons near the park. That there are state laws forbidding such saloons or sale of liquors is not taken into account. It seems to be a circumstance too trifling for notice in the estimation of the liquor syndicate.

MISS MARY ALLEN WEST has doubtless been cordially welcomed in Japan ere this, although no definite word has been received. Mr. Sho Nemoto writes of the careful preparations that have been made for her reception as follows: "Miss West's coming is widely known by all classes of people. The newspapers have told it, and we have had her sketch, photograph and lectures published in a neat pamphlet. I am quite busy in preparing things for her. All people are grateful to welcome her. I am sure she will have great result. Thank the Lord for this blessing upon us." Many engagements have already been made for her and interpreters provided for every meeting. Japanese hospitality is proverbial, and Miss West has been fortunate in having so good a friend at court as Sho Nemoto.

THE newspapers of Denver are generously opening their columns to the use of the ladies preparing for the great National Convention. Although the city has entertained so many conventions this year, it is evincing unusual hospitality toward the white ribboners who will enter its homes the last of October for a six days' sojourn. Those who go as visitors and not as delegates will need to put a few extra dollars in their pockets, as the hotel rates are not quite as low as in Eastern cities. There are no extortionate rates, but prices are necessarily a little higher than in older communities. No one need be frightened by this statement, for the committee in charge have secured greatly reduced rates, as will be seen by reading the list of hotels on page twelve. Names of delegates should be sent at once to Mrs. Frances Belford, 1323 Evans Street, Denver. An important communication from the railroad superintendent, and other items of interest concerning the convention will also be found on page twelve.

THE National Temperance Society has commissioned Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, one of its vice-presidents, to hold meetings in the West, especially in Illinois, for the purpose of arousing the people to demand of the National Columbian Commission, which is to meet in Chicago, on October 18, a veto of the illegal contracts made by the local managers for the sale of liquors in a German beer garden, and otherwise, in the World's Fair, which contracts are a plain violation of two liquor laws of Illinois, and so of the national charter of the Fair. There is a victory in sight as great as that of Sabbath closing, if the people can be aroused quickly, for the demand is not for the enactment of prohibition, but only for the enforcement of existing prohibition in the Hyde Park law and that against the sale of liquors at fairs. All the nation should help Illinois in this fight as it helped Louisiana against the lottery. Mr. Crafts will begin his campaign in Illinois at the W. C. T. U. state convention, at Danville, where he will speak Friday night, October 7, on "The Big Four and Forty More Reforms, with Special Reference to the Sabbath, Temperance, and Purity at the World's Fair." He will then lecture for ten days in Illinois in places yet to be selected. He may be addressed at 189 La Salle street, Chicago.

SCIENCE uses two instrumentalities without which she would be sadly crippled. Her study is creation. She views it now by aid of a microscope, now through a telescope. She examines a drop of water with its death germs and she turns her gaze upon the sun from whence comes life. So complex are the relations of the present civilization that to speak with authority upon any one of the "questions" which the human mind is debating, the use of both microscope and telescope is indispensable. Especially is this the case in the matter of temperance reform. Pessimism sees one thing—the horror of the saloon. She contemplates its wide open door through which ever issues the sad procession of drunkards, criminals, idiots, and groaning at the sight weakly drops her weapons of resistance. She needs an out-look. There are other manifold considerations. Sweep the horizon of progress and make just comparisons. If the world has been standing still and the saloon advancing upon it, then there is cause for faint-heartedness. But it is not so. The increase in the ranks of the enemy is an established fact, but it is only relative increase. Let us use the microscope faithfully as we will upon minutest detail, measuring this with that; then let telescopes bring to our vision the grand totals, the vast relative strengths and weaknesses, until we have a true conception of how the conflict fares. A mere speck on a window pane, if we approach it too closely, can hide from us the glory of the sun. Microscopic examination of the drink evil may serve the same end. It is well to adjust the mightier lenses that bring the heavenly orbs nigh, that we may strengthen our faith by a long look at the blessed truth of right, and gird our armor on anew for fresh victories.

OCTOBER.

BY HESTER ALWAY.

Flecked blue doming the glad golden days
Amber clouds pill'wing the sun's dying gaze;
Purple haze veiling the far shad'wy hills,
Zephyr winds mingling with rippling of rills;
Glorified forests bating the breath—
Beautiful mystery heralding death!

THE WOMAN OF TO-DAY.

BY EMMA PLAYTER SEABURY.

She stands on the shore of the Present; she looks to the past—there are wrongs—
And the sweetness of love, and its refuge, and the murmur of lullaby songs;
Her sails are unfurled to the changes and whims of the winds as they flee,
She is lured by the shores in the distance, away to the infinite sea;
Her hopes, and her dreams, and her fancies, in the future's horizon have met,
But she leaves the serene and the quiet, with a tenderness born of regret.

'Tis an era of chaos, upheaval, an era of change and reform;
In the crash of the walls that are toppling, the drifting debris of the storm,
In the crumbling of creeds that were builded for time, and eternity—when
A life was the price of conviction that martyred the spirits of men—
In the march of the thought of the present, which tram-ples the thought of the past,
She stands mid the wreck and the ruin, and builds with the builders, at last.

She is free from the shackles that bound her—the waves are a luminous calm;
The voices that thrill her to action burst into antiphonal psalm.
She sees not the storm in the distance, she sees not the breakers ahead,
Her path is aglow with the halo where martyrs and prophets were led,
And its light streams away like a banner that flutters and floats in the gale,
And leaves in the distance behind her the splendor and light of its trail.

And the world stands aghast at her daring; the world scarcely breathes. At the helm
Are Justice and Right, and the courage no tempest can ever o'erwhelm;
For faith makes her fearless and dauntless, while love is the rudder to guide,
And wherever a woman is launching, the soul of a man is beside;
She may err, her mistaking may wreck her, she may falter and flinch—but her soul
Has throbbed through the life of all heroes, it will press straight ahead to its goal.

The world need not fear for her future, the world need not frown in dismay,
For woman will always be woman, and mothers be mothers alway.
The refuge of love will be sweeter than the crowds that will shout and acclaim;
The voices of children be dearer than the scintillant flashes of fame;
It is not for herself she is striving; nor for self that her dreaming outruns
The methods that fetter her spirit; she moves for her daughters and sons.

She stands on the shore of the Present—the crowd parts;
as she passes along
They catch the far-off inspiration, they frown, but they thrill with her song;
For truth only slumbers a little, and men will awake to her call;
They, too, have been drugged till injustice has fettered
the land in her thrall.
The mothers will cling to the hearthstones, and cradle the nations for aye,
But right and the truth must awaken, and she fearlessly goes to the fray.

BY HELEN CAMPBELL.

CHAPTER VIII.

Not one volume or ten could hold the experiences of the year following hard upon the old Squire's resolution. To carry out the plan long ago clear in the doctor's mind, and watch the rising of the walls within which centered the hopes of both was a comparatively easy matter. For months many hours daily of Squire Templeton's time were given to inspection of all the building material and close oversight of the workmen, who grumbled but grumbled in vain. From cellar to ridge-pole, not a detail was neglected, and the Squire rubbed his hands as he looked at the small but perfect gymnasium on the upper floor, and the porcelained tubs in the bath rooms.

"I hain't much opinion o' folks that has to be put asoak in tubs," old Potter said as he eyed the city plumbers disdainfully. "I'm well onto seventy an' a bowl an' a rag's always been enough for me an' my folks. It's a carryin' out of the varse, that can't have but that one application, and makin' clean the outside of the platter, but within ravenin' wolves an' no less. You'd ought to consider, Doctor, what you're bringing into this community, that's always been honest an' able to hold up its head anywheres in the gates. Wild hosses won't get a word out of that man onless he's a mind," he added wrathfully, as the doctor eyed him with a twinkle and then turned to one of the workmen.

"Less rag and bowl and more tub would have gone far in keeping five Potters out of the grave," he said a little grimly, as Dr. Martha, who had been considering the matter, asked later for an opinion. "I wish you were ten years older, child, and then I'd explain how a bath and a rub such as is going to be possible for every creature under my roof, can make spiritual as well as physical muscle quite over. God forgive me!" he added, looking down into the child's clear eyes. "I don't want you a day older. What could I do without my little girl? But you can remember, little one, that body and spirit are often practically one, and you best serve the spirit when its case is in best order. A rascal may sometimes be clean, but I doubt the saintship of the dirty, no matter what claims it makes."

He fell into one of his long musings, and Dr. Martha watched the horse, ready to silently touch the reins if any doubt came to the wise creature who turned out instinctively, and otherwise showed a wisdom born of long experience.

"Who is coming first of all?" she asked presently.

"Three men who have begged for such a chance as many years," Dr. Scarborough answered, then stopped the buggy suddenly and leaped out. "Stand here till I come back," he said, and plunged into the heavy undergrowth on the border of the deep wood at one side, from which a groan had certainly come. Another instant, and he saw leaning against a tree a man whose hat was pulled over his eyes, and from whose right hand a pistol hung, as if its use had not yet been determined.

"Prescott!" the doctor cried, as the figure half rose, flinging the pistol behind the tree, then fell back and looked up imploringly.

For a moment Dr. Scarborough hesitated; then sat down by him and took his hand, limp and cold, and shrinking away from the warm strength of his own, then closing upon it as if the only help were there.

"Yes, 'Prescott,'" he said bitterly, "it is time you should know, for it has got to the point where night doesn't do the work and I must have day, too. When that began I said it was a devil, and I must drive it out by death, if necessary. We have the warrant. Christ himself drove the evil spirits in the swine down a steep place into the sea. I am not a lunatic when I speak to you like this. I am only a man driven by the devil when he wills, and who meant to escape to another world where, whatever judgment may be passed, I shall at least no longer have a body and its appetites to contend with."

"Tell me about it," the doctor answered quietly; "it is my business to deal with evil spirits of all orders, and I face them daily. Doubt and ignorance are the most formidable, but knowledge and faith are stronger."

"Lies, lies! Faith has been powerless, and knowledge a delusion. I have prayed the night away, calling on that God whose minister I have been, to deliver me, and with daybreak have done the thing I loathed. See here, Scarborough, no man knows what I tell you now. I, John Prescott, preacher of the gospel for twenty years, am a drunkard, and a drunkard past redemption. A pledge is nothing. I have sworn before God one night, and the next broken my oath joyfully."

"How did it begin, Prescott?"

"Six years ago.† I had worn myself out doing the work of two, and took this country parish to escape some care and to go on with the studies for the work that now will never be finished. I have never been in a saloon in my life. I have always refused wine at social meetings. I have preached on the necessity of temperance, and with all the more zeal since my own downfall. I found that brandy checked the hideous depression and exhaustion that came upon me. I studied at night with the bottle by me, and sleep would not come without my portion from it. There was no localized distress; only every nerve in me throbbed for repose. I emptied the bottle and in the sleep of intoxication found it. Then I waked with a parched mouth, dry tongue, headache, irresolute purpose, remorse. From the secret debauch I went out to visit and counsel, hold meetings, conduct public worship, the memory of it stinging my spirit, yet no relief save in its repetition. All day I longed for the time to come when I could throw off the mask, and behind the locked door, find rest and narcotism in the bottle. My memory is going. Often I am not sure of myself even in the pulpit. The craving has localized. My stomach is not only on fire, but every nerve cries out for drink. I am helpless. God has forgotten me. I deserve hell and I am deeper and deeper in it each day I live. At last I have settled it. I am one possessed. I have the right to end it."

His hand had crept down toward the pistol as he spoke, and as he repeated solemnly, "I have the right," he suddenly lifted it, pressing the muzzle against his forehead, and seeking the trigger.

"Not yet, Prescott," Dr. Scarborough said, barely rising but in that moment possessing himself of the weapon, and thrusting it deep in the patch of bog at their side "Come home with me. It is not too late. You are possessed, but the devil is of your own creation. You can unmake what you have made. You have studied every law of God but the law of life, and that you have violated at every turn, every year of your conscious life. It is a farce to ask God's grace, when you deliberately ignore all means of grace. This body that is your hell this minute, can be heaven if you will, for it is the temple of the Holy Ghost defiled by ignorance, but not past purification. Come home with me."

"I cannot. People will know. It would kill my wife. She has never even suspected the real nature of the trouble, though now she has asked me if it was opium, and if I took it for pain. I shall not live through it, Doctor; I cannot. Death is better than disgrace."

"No one shall know. I shall give out that you are so nearly dead with dyspepsia, that you will die of cancer of the stomach if it goes on, and that I must have you under my own eye for a time. Work with me and you shall be cured."

"I dare not give you a pledge."

"I don't want a pledge. Pledges are for the well or for cases not like yours. I want nothing but to have you come with me now and I will see to the rest. Trust me. That is all."

As he spoke the doctor rose and put out his hands and after a moment in which the two faced each other, said again as the trembling figure shrunk back, "God has not forgotten you. Find yourself and you find Him. Come."

Without a word the minister took the extended hand, and holding it like a child, followed him to the buggy, with apparently no consciousness of Dr. Martha's presence, and in silence was driven toward the village.

"Outside there is still a good deal to do, but inside we are in working order," the doctor said, as he drove up to his own door, and said to Miss Prissy who was passing through the hall, "Here is our first patient, Miss Prissy, Show him the southwest room, and I will be there in a minute."

In that minute the doctor secured the soothing mixture. which was the first necessity, and then following his patient saw him safely into bed, and sat by his side till the exhausted man fell into a deep sleep.

"It's a little premature," he said at last as he rose, "but there was no other way. Don't lose sight of him, Miss Prissy, and Sterling will be here to night. Make him take a bowl of your best farina gruel with a beaten egg in it when he wakes, and I shall be back as soon as I can. Thank God for this place and for the chance to help such a fellow as that, a man out of a thousand, yet with the will nearly killed in him. He shall be pulled through and I believe Marston will help him. I am sure he will if he once realizes that here is some one with no less dread of self-betrayal than himself, and with no less reason for keeping any shadow of knowledge away from the crowd who would gloat over it. This place shall never be known as an asylum, if I have power to hinder it," and the doctor scrambled into the buggy, and with Dr. Martha holding the packet of sandwiches that Miss Malvina had thrust into her lap, made his way once more toward the hills.

THE BRITISH LABOR PARLIAMENT OF 1892.

BY FLORENCE BALGARNIE.

This week has been a memorable one for the trades unionists of the United Kingdom, for they have been holding their Semi Jubilee annual meetings in the city of Glasgow, which proudly calls itself the "second city in the Empire."

The 495 men and women who here assembled from all parts of the country represented 418 trades and a total membership of registered unions of 1,219,934 persons; a pretty fair result for twenty-five years' work, especially when we remember that scarcely eighteen years have elapsed since the legality of trades unions was recognized by act of Parliament, and that mountains of prejudice and opposition have had to be scaled before the full recognition of unionism has been accomplished.

A quarter of a century ago property frowned upon poverty; now it is quite comme il faut for the bejeweled hand to grip the "horny hand of toil," and those of good position in the social world, members of both Houses of Lords and Commons esteem it a privilege to be admitted to galleries and orchestra, that they may follow with intelligent interest the debates of the Labor Parliament which take place upon the floor of the city hall.

Nor is it to be imagined that this new state of things is a mere empty and passing fashion. Underlying the effervescent character of much of the sympathy shown nowadays by the non-toiler to the toiling multitude, there is a serious and persistent determination to fathom, if possible, the gulf which humanity has dug for itself in this world between the modern Dives and Lazarus.

Economic science in Britain and notably also in America, is being studied from the inductive standpoint, and we are most certainly shaking off the old laissez-faire dust from our feet, and are recognizing that the state must be endowed with functions of a distinctly socialistic order.

The older unionists still retain something of the spirit of the past, but the "new unionists," who are now in a majority, have for one of their main objects the attainment of an eight hour day, by act of Parliament; and it was round this point that the chief interest of the congress, both this year and the previous year, has centered. Despite these avowed Socialistic sentiments of the trades unionists, the Lord Provost of the city, the magistrates and corporations have united in doing honor to the delegates by attending their inaugural meeting and receiving them in state in the palatial halls of their new civic buildings.

But there was one dark blot on the feast! A thousand lights revealed the rich coloring of the marble walls; graceful palm trees broke the long, straight lines of the corridors; the air was sweet with flowers, and the band pealed forth its music in joyous strains; but not content with hospitality such as this, the Lord Provost apparently felt it to be his bounden duty to lavish champagne and all manner of choice wines upon his guests. The doors of the supper-room stood wide open all the evening, and he, the elected servant of the people, became the tempter of these men and women who had been drawn hither from all parts of the land. Next day I heard of men who on that night had been led to break their total abstinence resolves, and of others, both men and women, who had spent their whole time over the sensuous enjoyment of the wine cup.

But I am proud to say that the vast majority showed themselves to be sober and respectable citizens, and, indeed, many of the council are pledged abstainers, while three of the chief men, John Burns, Tom Mann and Ben Tillett are temperance as well as labor leaders. Emphasis also was laid upon the temperance question by the president of the Congress, Mr. John Hodge, in his inaugural address, and he admitted that while poverty and drink were twin foes which must be fought, there was no doubt that drink was too often the cause of poverty. He spoke out in manly terms, and called upon his comrades to do more than merely pass resolutions in favor of the direct veto on the drink traffic and to prove by energetic and determined action that they were ready to fight the foe. I listened with a thankful heart to the applause which greeted this expression of opinion, and which grew louder as he denounced the too common habit of making the saloon the meeting place of local unions; and the respectful hearing granted to a delegation from the Scottish Temperance League was also full of happy augury for the future. A high moral tone pervaded the whole of the address, which seemed to idealize the movement, and lifted it above the material and commonplace to a higher moral plane.

Low as are the wages in too many employments, it is the cry for shorter hours, rather than for increased rate of remuneration which is the striking feature of the modern unionist; it is leisure—leisure to read, to think, to be, for which the best of the unionists crave; it is the soul hunger, as well as the body-hunger which they are striving to satisfy.

Day by day the movement grows more international, and next year Chicago will welcome hundreds of representative working men from Europe who are prepared to attend the International Labor Congress which is to be held there, and it is to be hoped that American delegates will return the compliment by coming over to the International Congresses, which during the same year are to be held in Switzerland and England. Although women form so large a proportion of the wage earners, the number of women delegates present at this year's congress has been small. The most respectful attention was, however, accorded to their speaker, relative to the sub-contracting or sweating, to the appointment of female factory inspectors. America is ahead of us in this respect, but I believe that now the unionists have made up their minds as to the advisability of appointing women to these posts, the government will bend to their wishes.

A striking feature of the congress has been the demonstration in the City Hall, under the auspices of the Scottish Women's Protective and Provident League. The place was crowded from floor to ceiling, and the platform lined with representative men and women. The Countess of Aberdeen, honorary president of the League, made a telling address, and was followed by Miss Frances Hicks, a tailoress by trade, and Miss Clementina Black, secretary of the Women's Trades Union Association. The speeches of the evening were given by Mr. Ben Tillett, the docker, and Mrs. Sydney Webb, better known as Beatrice Potter, the girl who left her luxurious home, disguised merely as a poverty-stricken wanderer, and went about London searching for work, until she found herself in a sweater's den, where by practical experience she was able to study social problems and was forced to the conclusion that both trades unionism and state interference are pressing necessities. Organize! organize! was the burden of her speech. Organize! as the Lancashire women in the textile trades have done to the number of nearly one hundred thousand; organize! and wages will rise and approximate to those of men.

What a change time has wrought! The men are now all eagerness to organize the women, to admit them to all the privileges of their unions. Not content with one meeting on behalf of women, at the same hour a second was held under the auspices of the Glasgow Trades Council, and the same cry resounded there, organize, federate! women, unite!

Centuries of dependent subjection have made women diffident of their own power. Unionism amongst women makes but slow headway here; its pace is little quicker even in progressive America. I have been honored with the confidences of many wage-earning women and girls, representing varied industries in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Massachusetts, Illinois and other states. I have seen what unionism has accomplished for the very few, and I realize that federation of the worker is a pressing need common to all lands whether in the old world or the new.

THE WORLD ABROAD, OR TEMPERANCE NOTES FROM FOREIGN LANDS.

THE PRICE OF A DRAM.

In Rhenish Prussia, where they have no anti liquor laws in a comprehensive sense of the word, the municipal authorities of the smaller towns occasionally try to reclaim a drunkard by warning the local tavern keepers, but like other half-way measures that plan is apt to lead to unexpected results. In the hamlet of Herzogenrath, some twenty miles north of Aachen ("Aix la Chapelle") the rum-venders had been fined so often for selling liquor to an incorrigible toper that they at last declined his patronage in earnest, but advised him to supply his wants at a tavern on the other side of the Belgian frontier. The bibulous desperado decided to act upon that suggestion, and under cover of the next dark night crossed the border, and after glutting his thirst tried to regain his home with a jug full of brandy. By that time, however, the moon was up, and on a lonely hill-road the nocturnal wanderer was halted by a Prussian douanier, or revenue officer. Fearing that his freedom—or what our beer-sophists would call his "personal liberty" might be jeopardized by an arrest, the smuggler faced about and took to his heels, till stopped by a charge of buckshot. His pursuers soon reached the place where he was lying prostrate, with his fingers still clutching the neck of his jug, but when they tried to help him on his legs they found that he had taken his last drink.

HESTER STANHOPE REDIVIVA.

The spouse of Francis Joseph, whom an English journal calls the "Austrian Hester Stanhope," shares her prototype's horror of alcoholic liquors, and in the neighborhood of her fairy palace, on the island of Cyprus, the use of tobacco in all its forms is prohibited as strictly as that of intoxicating stimulants.

COMPOUND POISONS.

In a village near Arad, Hungaria, a Sclavonic peasant poisoned all the male members of a family by entering their cabin unperceived and putting strychnine into a jug of slibovitz, an intoxicating liquor prepared from distilled plums. As a rule, poison-mongers eschew the use of strychnine, because its intensely bitter taste is almost sure to warn the intended victims, and it would, indeed, be next to impossible to mistake that taste in an admixture with such fluids as milk, water, or sweet cider. But the palate of a dram-drinker is less fastidious, and the use of intoxicating liquors thus directly favors the purposes of criminals in this as well as in countless other respects; poisons of all sorts blend readily with fire-water.

THE AGE OF CONSENT.

The mayor of Jaroslaw, in Austrian Galicia, has been treated to a public ovation for his zeal in enforcing the law against the sale of liquor to minors. "It is not only our gymnasiasts (pupils of the high school) that law tends to save," he said in an address to his serenaders, "but all young men worth saving. In nine out of ten cases the first dram is forced upon reluctant victims, and the dose is repeated till a life-blighting habit has been irrevocably established. At the age of twenty-one sane individuals of our species ought to be able to judge for themselves and realize the consequences almost sure to follow the indulgence of the liquor vice. Those, who in spite of that knowledge consent to make themselves slaves of that vice must abide the results, and have no right to complain of their fate."

A MORAL TEST.

A gang of young anarchists at Ghent, Belgium, attempted to lynch one of their comrades, whom they suspected of having broken his pledge of secrecy, and who was saved only by the timely intervention of neighbors. The affair led to several arrests, and the examining judge asked the leader of the vendetta to state his reason for suspecting the fidelity of the plaintiff. "I suppose that question is a trap to get at our lodge secrets," said the defendant, "but I can answer it by telling the plain truth. The plaintiff is a drunkard, and we concluded that only the greed for liquor can make a man mean enough to betray his own comrades."

BEER BIGOTS.

The Anti-Semites of Munich supplement their impeachment of the Children of Israel with the charge that "the Jews, as a class, have generally abstained from the use of beer, and have thus demonstrated their antagonism to the tendencies of the Teutonic races." The logical outcome of that argument would be the project of the New York reformer who wanted every church to retail liquors for the benefit of its parishioners, and bishops to superintend the management of parish breweries.

AN ISLAND OF SORROW.

In the course of the last six hundred years the population of Iceland has decreased four-fifths. There was a time when the island contained flourishing villages and model dairies, and there is no doubt that the climate has deteriorated, but the change in prosperity may have also a good deal to do with the fact that the natives expend a considerable part of their scant income on brandy, tea and tobacco.

A CONGENIAL DIET.

The manager of a model dairy at Gravenhage, in western Holland, has abolished the practice of feeding cows, even in winter, on the grain refuse of distilleries, for the reasons that black cattle, horses and sheep will instinctively prefer the poorest herbage to alcoholized corn. "Pigs," adds the report, "seem to be the only animals naturally fond of mash-tub grain, or other distillery products."

THE ABSINTHE CURSE.

A French journalist publishes the results of a mess-room census which seems to imply that of two hundred and ten army officers of eight different garrison towns only thirty-four could boast habits of abstinence from absinthe or alcoholized wormwood. In scientific attainments the graduates of St. Cyr, are no doubt ahead of their veteran comrades, but how many of them would be physically and morally able to emulate the achievements of the First Empire? In the tedium of his St. Helena exile Napoleon now and then had recourse to stimulants, but he always took water with his wine and never touched anything stronger than claret. Many of his best generals shared that aversion to liquor. Marshal Lannes, the Roland of the French army, often declared that he had never found any beverage as refreshing as the mountain springs of the Cevennes. Lefebvre and Massena carried the simplicity of their habits to an almost Spartan extreme. Dessaix, like General Pilly, could boast that he had never been intoxicated with anything but victory; as a consequence, he managed to preserve his good humor under the most trying circumstances, till a few hours before his death at the battle of Marengo, when his comrades noticed that he had become strangely silent, "as if the gloom of his impending fate already overshadowed his soul." The first consul and subsequent Emperor invariably discouraged drunkenness, but with the restoration of the Bourbons, Bacchus, too, resumed his ancient sway, and at present France (with the exception of the southernmost provinces) is one of the most alcohol cursed countries on earth. Beer and gin have been added to wine and rum, and the total annual sale of absinthe exceeds 20,000,000 hectoliters, or nearly half a billion gallons.

EXCELSIOR.

Professor Salines, the chief of a geological surveying party engaged in the exploration of the Peruvian Andes, adds his testimony to the experience of many Arctic explorers who found alcohol an obstacle rather than an aid, in the struggle with the vicissitudes of an icy climate. Up to a height of 16,000 feet, he says, men of an average vigorous constitution show no symptoms of distress, but higher up the debilitating influence of intemperance begins to assert itself, and at an altitude of 19,000 feet, only habitual abstainers, combining that advantage with fairly sound lungs, can hope to breathe the rarified atmosphere with impunity.

GASEOUS POISONS.

In the large railway depot of Bucharest, on the lower Danube, the worshipers of tobacco look in vain for a "smoking room." "Persons addicted to the use of tobacco," placards in several languages inform the passengers, "may avail themselves of the spittoons provided for that purpose, but will not be permitted to make their fellow-travelers share the penalties of their habit, by filling the air with offensive fumes." That fair compromise, however, barely mitigates the evil. The ever-smoking Wallachian rustics keep out of the waiting-room, but besiege the platform, and in rainy weather crowd the halls and doorways, puffing away like volcanoes, and in the kindness of their souls offering matches to non-smoking strangers, who, they take it for granted, must have forgotten their fire-apparatus.

THE ENFRANCHISEMENT OF WOMEN.

BY ARTHUR HUNGERFORD POLLEN.

I. MORAL.

There have been people who have pretended to wisdom and taught that the body politic is no more than an aggregate of the individuals composing it. It would be about as tenable a thesis to maintain that the Sistine Madonna is no more than an aggregate of paint and canvas, and Westminster Abbey but so much stone, marble, mortar, beams and slates. To say this is to be blind to creative power, to ignore the birth of a new character that invests and vivifies bare elements in composition. The promise of Christ that where two or three were gathered together in His Name there would He be also was the revelation of a marvelous spiritual truth; an assurance impossible to reflect upon without something of an awful reverence for the conjuring power so directly given. But there is something further to be learned from it than the simple fact that it contains, no less seemingly than the nature of a law of human creation, what might be stated thus, "That in every combination of human beings there is first the sum of the individuals, secondly the character in which they meet, which is generally superior to the individual average, representing as it does the least common multiple of their consciences."

This is a truth which the world has perceived under different aspects and acted upon throughout the ages that are past. It has been embodied in such adages as "Vox populi, Vox Dei," "The people's voice is God's." Edmund Burke appealed to it when he said (apropos of the attacks made upon the American colonists during the war) that nothing could ever persuade him of the incurable corruption of any large public body; nor did he know the method of drawing up an indictment against a whole people.

And yet it is a fact that notwithstanding the sacred character of assemblies, in times past, and in our own venality, indifference to the public weal and dishonesty have corrupted the representative bodies of states.

Most men are more afraid of the public conscience than of their own, but when that has been wounded and seared by wholesale bribery, it ceases to demand a lofty standard of public virtue. In England, corruption in Parliament did not outlast corruption in the electorate; and, indeed, at no time, not even in the black age of George III's wholesale purchase of votes by office, titles and cash, did the bribery of Parliament approach the bribery of the constituencies in flagrant shamelessness.

But once new classes of voters were admitted to the franchise, too much in earnest about reform to sell their holiest birthright for any mess that offered, the venality of members ceased altogether, public opinion demanding a higher standard of honesty in representatives than would have contented the individuals contributing to it.

There are few states now in which a wider extension of the franchise amongst men remains to be made with any prospect of advantage, while in America it is probably a just criticism to say that whatever corruption there is in her politics is referable to the fact that so wide is her enfranchisement, that an element, corruptible because ignorant and unpatriotic, has been admitted to the electorate.

So great is the greed for power and office that candidates may be trusted to bribe if their constituency is willing to be bribed; and the citizenship, in the hands of uneducated foreigners or only half civilized Africans, represents no more than a negotiable asset. Such men have no love for a country which they have not learned to call their own; no reverence for a right coming to them unhallowed by tradition or knowledge of its power.

To exclude the enfranchised by a law of revision is impossible; to educate them should indeed be an object continually pursued. But this is a matter of time, and the evil is urgent. All over the world there is a gathering determination toward the elevation of the public conscience and standard—everywhere the old enemies of self-interest and the banded powers of the forces whose existence depends upon and insures the degradation of the human soul, bar the way, by the hold they have got over the electorate. An appeal to Cæsar is useless, for Cæsar is fuddled with strong drink and has bought shares in an opium shop, two music halls and a cigarette factory.

There is only one escape; the electorate must be reinforced by the only unenfranchised class. Fortunately for our purpose, it is a class untainted by alliance with the enemies of the race. It is composed of experts in the struggle of education, who have seen young lives blighted by the "legalized temptation" put before them, who know each move of the enemies that makes for the ruin of home.

It is to the citizen woman then that we must look for that purity in the public action which alone can make the socialist state of the near future a safe and successful creation, and to no one who looks at the almost fabulous advance made in the last quarter of a century can it seem likely that another will pass before so happy an enfranchisement is realized.

London, England.

MRS. LEAVITT IN SOUTH AMERICA.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—I gather up unmentioned odds and ends of my South American trip in this concluding letter of my world's work. A night's sail from Buenos Ayres in an elegant river steamer brought me to Montevideo, Uruguay, where Rev. and Mrs. Greenman made me a delightful home. Within four days I gave two discourses in the churches, one of which was to Spanish-speaking people; three evening lectures in English, two lectures to ladies, and held one meeting for organization. Mrs. (Rev.) Marinda Greenman was elected president of the union, Mrs. Martha Bourse, secretary, Miss Mary Bowen, treasurer.

Dr. Wood's persistent temperance work had produced results strongly felt to-day. Though his juvenile organization had apparently fallen quite to pieces, it will be the first work of the W. C. T. U. to gather up its units into a Loyal Temperance Legion. Dr. Wood's efforts and that of a few others show that persistent, continued and wise agitation are all needed to convert Argentine and Uruguay to total abstinence. It will, however, take a generation to do it. If never begun it will never be finished—the sooner begun, the sooner it will be finished!

I liked the city of Montevideo better than Buenos Ayres. It is higher, and the streets are broader, more airy. In both cities, and Rosario as well, the very poorest dwellings are better than the poorest in southern European countries; nobody lives in holes and clefts of the rocks.

The passage from Montevideo to Santos was made very unpleasant through ill-natured attacks on account of my temperance views, by officers and passengers. I followed my usual rule and waited for some one to introduce the subject. In this case I had not long to wait. I suppose I was the same person on that steamer, as on the more than one hundred others on which I had sailed, but this was the first time anger and rudeness had been manifested. As I recall the various conversations I cannot see that I said anything out of the way. I am inclined to think they supposed they would make quick work with me—"they" being men and English, I a woman and American. But as I, or rather the truths I uttered, remained on the field, unquestionably victorious, it was a greater strain than their tempers could bear. The scene finished by an extortion of money, which, though they had a technical right to it, was as immoral as theft.

Arriving off Santos, in Southern Brazil, a narrow but deep channel runs in between beautiful hills and terminates in a salt lake. In the lake is the island upon which Santos is situated. Poor Santos! It is a lovely little place, but nearly or quite a century of complete neglect of sanitation has made it a peat hole, where yellow fever abides the year round and increases to virulence in hot weather. As all the world knows, it has been a fearful epidemic this year. Many sailing vessels lie in the harbor without an inmate—seamen all dead, and surviving officers, unable to fill their places, wait at San Paulo till times improve. Three or four and in some cases ten times the usual period has been required to get through with cargo work for mail steamers, because of scarcity of men. Boats can scarcely be obtained and only at exorbitant charges.

None of the officers were going ashore. The purser declined to ask the agent of the line to assist me through the custom house and on board the train for San Paulo, or to ask him to send a person who would do it. I offered, of course, to pay for the service, though it is usually done gratuitously. As I knew no Portuguese, and the officials rarely know either English or French, it is difficult to see how I should have succeeded alone. But happily Mr. Thomas Hood, not a relative of the poet, a young Scotch commercial traveler, was to land at Santos and go on to San Paulo. Mr. Hood is a total abstainer, and told me during our journey to San Paulo that he had sympathized with me, and had thought how he should dislike to have his mother traveling about alone, liable to the treatment I had received.

For a few miles the country is barely out of the water. Salt marshes abound; slimy banks under bushes standing on stilts, left uncovered by the going out of the tide, look as if they might breed any deadly epidemic. At the foot of a sharp line of hills, the engine is detached, the train broken into sections, and so drawn up the sharp incline by three tremendous stationary cable engines, two on the incline and one at the top. It is a fine piece of work, but it appeared to me that Americans would have accomplished the same by simpler and less cumbrous machinery.

On arrival I went to a hotel, and found my missionary friends in the morning. My letters came after I did. My telegram had miscarried. In South America the post and telegraphic systems read well on paper, but in practice are very dilatory and uncertain. Not one of my telegrams in either country has been received in due time, and some not at all. It appears to throw suspicion upon a person to have letters addressed "Poste Restante," but perhaps this suspicious overcarefulness is better than the former mode of dealing with foreign letters. They were poured in a heap on the floor and those who asked for letters were told to help themselves. This was the custom when Rev. Mr. Chamberlain, my host at San Paulo, first went to Brazil. As a specimen of the struggles of Brazilian operators with English telegrams the following is good: A missionary sent to his wife the message, "I go to-morrow." The wife received the Portuguese words, "O gato morreu," which means, "the cat died."

Some good opportunities to speak were obtained, and some good meetings were held; among these were a discourse in the native Presbyterian church, a lecture to Brazilians, another to English. I had also the pleasure of speaking to the first "collegiate class" in the Presbyterian college. The meetings for ladies, both English and Brazilian, were sadly interfered with by the rain. This, together with timidity, scruples about taking the pledge by a lifelong total abstainer, and paucity of lady missionaries, prevented organization. I urged upon Dr. Lane, Miss Scott and Mr. Perkins, the trio who had the matter in their hands, to establish regular and thorough scientific instruction in every grade of their schools. Mrs. Hunt conversed with Dr. Lane upon the same subject during his recent visit to the United States. Something had been done before that, but to the present date, nothing adequate to the needs.

The only recreation I took in San Paulo was a morning at the rooms of Professor Derby, who is at the head of the geographical and geological survey of San Paulo, the leading state of Brazil, and probably the most richly endowed. Among the very beautiful things enjoyed were tissue paper slices of granite and other stones seen by polarized light. By this means wonderful colors are revealed. Professor Derby's helpers have made, by way of recreation, an extensive collection of moths and butterflies, some of which are of wonderful beauty.

The next point visited was Piracicaba, farther inland. I had been in correspondence with Mrs. Brelsford for about a year, and she had done excellent preparatory work. I spoke four times to Brazilians, once to English people, once to the pupils of the excellent school under Miss Watts' care, and to ladies, and then we had a meeting for organization. Mrs. Brelsford was elected president, Mrs. Bella Hamilton, vice-president, and Mrs. A. A. Smith, treasurer. This union was formed on Washington's birthday. On leaving, after three happy, busy days, Mrs. Brelsford handed me thirty dollars, a contribution to our work by the teachers and missionaries, very nearly equal to all other gifts in South America.

On my way to Rio de Janeiro, I stopped over at Capivary to attend by invitation the Quarterly District Conference. I spoke to the people one evening, and the next morning to the Conference upon the subject of the "Bible and Temperance." I paused again for a day at San Paulo, and went on with Rev. Mr. Kennedy to his station, Taubaté. Heavy rains had caused a washout on the railroad, around a part of which I wallowed with the other passengers, then sat on the corner of a goods truck the remainder. But we arrived in time for the work appointed for the day—a talk to the school at 2:30 p. m., and to the public, all Brazilians, at 7:30. The next morning I addressed the school again, by request making my theme tobacco. I spoke also to ladies, and formed a W. C. T. U. in the afternoon. Mrs. Jennie Wallace Kennedy was elected president, Miss Mary B. Kennedy, secretary, Miss Elizabeth Hoff, treasurer, Mrs. Minna Allquirn, vice-president. The same evening I lectured to the general public. The next morning I planned work with the officers for an hour, and was ready for the train due at ten o'clock.

All day the way lay nearly parallel with the sea, but back of a range of mountains, in a valley varying from half a mile to ten miles in width. The loftiest mountains in Brazil lie on the north, or inland side, at most picturesque distance from the road. Owing to the detention, I saw these to the best advantage, that is, in sunset light. But from the same cause I missed the very interesting and beautiful mountains we got entangled among and finally pierced.

After nine hours without speaking to anybody, at 11:30 the train rolled into the station at Rio and Rev. Mr. Tilly met me, having waited more than four hours. How could it have been done patiently? But he looked as though it had. After a full hour in a public carriage I was landed at the foot of a flight of ninety-six steps. Happily there were no stairs inside the house for me. None of my baggage reached me till the next morning.

I had been in a very suffering condition of health during my whole stay in Pernambuco. Exposure to great dampness on board a new steamer, but one that leaked badly into the cabins in rainy weather, brought on an attack of malarial fever, and made a burden of the very little work I was permitted to do in Cearo. A young man who does not allow a woman to speak in the church, although that church is only a hired hall, has not been consecrated, and is used for a day school all the week, gave the only assistance.

There were only two missionary families in the place, one American and the other English, in the employ of the former. Smallpox broke out in the latter, just on my arrival, and carried off the husband before I left. Happily it did no more mischief among the missionaries. The disease is almost always present in Brazilian cities. In this place a Brazilian family are ardent abstainers, the ruin of the head of the household having brought them to that stand. Some of the young men were heard to declare after the course of lectures in a public hall had concluded, that they were done with drinking. I could not form a union, nor is there a prospect of one. The missionary's wife and the young daughter of the Brazilian family referred to will do good work in persuading individuals to total abstinence.

In increasing weakness I went on to Para, where that stalwart evangelical pioneer, Mr. Nelson, is located. He again must take time enough from real missionary work to do much toward the support of the family. He prints a paper as well as edits it, has gathered a little church, and fifty or sixty persons meet every Sunday for divine service.

After a few talks to Mr. Nelson's congregation, and two excellently attended lectures to Brazilians, I was again forced to leave without seeing a union organized. But Mrs. Nelson has since formed one and is its president.

The air of the place proved to be very bad for me. That of Pernambuco suited me better than that of any other place in South America. The fever would not yield to the usual remedies, cough returned, and fresh attacks of other troubles suffered in the earlier parts of my journeys, came upon me. I was very ill, emaciated and suffering when I went on board the British cargo steamer, Basil, bound for New York. I was the only woman on board. The captain gave up his own good room on deck to me, everything and everybody was put at my command. I began to mend very soon, and was much improved before I landed in New York, after twelve days at sea.

The government of Brazil is perilously weak, and is too much inclined to resort to military force. This is repugnant to the best republicans among them. Finance has been very badly managed, and there is unheard of squandering and "grabbing." This has disheartened many true patriots. The just criticism of these is construed as hostility to the government, and is thought to conceal a desire for a return to monarchy. The different factions of the advocates of the Republic do not understand each other. There is a royalist faction plotting to restore the monarchy with the grandson of Dom Pedro on the throne, When the attempt is made, it will unite all republicans in one body, and will create civil war. But all efforts of the friends of monarchy to reëstablish it will only strengthen the Republic. The monarchy is gone forever. The following statement of Ruy Barboza expresses the feeling of most: "Our greatest wish in this moment is to model the new Brazilian Republic according to the constitution of the United States, and to develop and consolidate our friendship and commercial relations with that incomparable nation."

I cannot better express the conclusions I have reached in regard to the country than by quoting from Agassiz's "A Journey in Brazil": "There is much that is discouraging in the aspect of Brazil. . . . There is also much that is very cheering, that leads me to believe that her life as a nation will not belie her great gifts as a country. Should her moral and intellectual endowments grow into harmony with her natural beanty and wealth, the world will not have seen a fairer land. . . . Every friend of Brazil must wish to see its present priesthood replaced by a more vigorous, intelligent and laborious clergy"; and I must add, more temperate and virtuous.

The hope of Agassiz for the "moral and intellectual endowment" of Brazil is being realized to some extent by the mission schools already established, because in them all in addition to "sound learning," the Bible is taught daily. The best and largest of these schools is at San Paulo, under the Presbyterian mission. There is no plea for Robert College, Constantinople, nor the no less grand and useful establishment at Beirut, that could not be made for this college. It has already won the confidence of the people. From its various departments, eighty boarding and more than two hundred day pupils were turned away for want of room this year. Four hundred only can be accommodated now. That Brazil is American, is a republic, ought to strengthen every plea that can be made for Protestant missions here.

We do not sufficiently appreciate the possibilities of the future of Brazil. The United States alone has an equal, unbroken, united territory of fertile land. This vast domain, with its wonderful fertility, its variety and beauty, is fast filling with European emigrants from Norway to Italy. The Protestant missionary should meet them as they land with the Bible in their own tongue, just as should be done with the same class in the United States. God has given us the world to Christianize and men, women and money to do it. The only trouble thus far is that rich Christians in America and England have double locked their coffers against the calls of the Lord for missions, and have put the keys into the hands of Lust-of-the-eye, Pride-of-life, and the remainder of that family.

MARY CLEMENT LEAVITT.

Boston, Mass.

BREEZY ITEMS FROM SOUTH CAROLINA.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—While in attendance a short time ago at a state agricultural fair, I made a visit to the horses which always attract me, particularly since reading "Black Beauty," which I purchased by the dozen, to give my temperance boys. The grooms were saddling the horses. "Not to race them?" "Oh, no!" one of the managers assured me, "horse racing was not encouraged, it was only to be a trial of speed, in the interest of stock raising." Nevertheless the horses ran, and the men bet money and hats, and the women gloves and candy. One of the horses, who seemed to be the favorite, had a heavily weighted saddle placed upon her, which we thought unfair, but the manager said, "she had so many natural advantages over the others, she had to be heavily handicapped to make things at all equal."

So we thought Illinois would have to be handicapped when we read Sister Rounds' challenge to Ohio, after having given her glorious record of work done in '92. "Sixteen thousand paying members." I do not wonder the president shouts for joy. That would mean in my state, every saloon closed in a month. But let us reason about it and see if we can afford to enter the race with Illinois, without handicapping her. In the first place, Illinois does not seem to mean just one state. Is it not our temperance Mecca? Have we not put all that makes our organization the admiration and wonder of the whole world there? Are not our headquarters, our Temple, our hospital, our publishing house, our paper, all there?

Once upon a time, a great general about to attack a hostile force was urged to desist by his officers, who called his attention to the fact that the enemy greatly outnumbered them. Abruptly turning, the haughty monarch replied, "And for how many do you count me?" So we ask, for how many do you count our National President, and her grand executive board, who are in Illinois, because of the W. C. T. U.? No, Sister Rounds, we rejoiced at your report, and were as proud of your success as the organ blower was, who after pumping for Beethoven, said upon coming out, "Did not Beethoven and me do elegant today?"

We are proud of Illinois, for we have vested rights there that we have in no other state. I would not pluck a leaf from her laurel wreath, and if we had her president in my state for three months we might enter the race. As it is, the advantages are all on her side, and we do not dare. However, "the battle is not always to the strong, nor the race to the swift," and it would not surprise me at all if the poor, little Palmetto State, who is fighting the battle for prohibition single-handed and alone, without money or outside assistance, should reach the goal before some of the more highly favored states.

Vassalage to the Democratic party is intense, and it is regarded high treason to hint at a third party. So if we get prohibition it must come to us through the Democrats and in answer to prayer. The vote in favor of prohibition, at the primary election held last week, showed a net majority for prohibition of ten thousand one hundred and forty-one in the whole state. The cities gave a large vote for license, and are leaving nothing undone to overcome the large prohibition majority. "Western money is to be used freely," and the rummies are very defiant. Upon the day of the election the beer wagons were placarded with menacing prohibition sayings, and bands of music played in front of all the groggeries.

The young men who are conducting the campaign are Christian gentlemen, against whom our enemies have not been able to utter one reproachful word. They seek neither office nor emolument. Hon. L. D. Childs, the author of the prohibition bill, could have been elected governor (we temperance folks think) if he had allowed himself to be nominated, but he said he would not jeopardize the cause for the office, even if sure of getting it. We are proud of our prohibition champions. They are sans peur et sans reproche.

Eternity only will tell the amount of work done in this state, and done against such fearful odds. Our temperance brethren are gallant and generous enough to say to us: "But for the ten years faithful and untiring work of you ladies the temperance cause would not be to the fore as it is to-day." We have very few working members in the W. C. T. U., but if we weigh them instead of counting them we could hold our own even with the best.

I will speak only of some of the work done here in my own city, Charleston. The W. C. T. U. headquarters and home for the poor and friendless stranger has been carried on now for more than two years, sustained entirely through the efforts and contributions of a few faithful women in one of the unions of this city. This home ought to be supported by the state, as it is intended to give shelter, not to our own people, but to strangers from everywhere. Our superintendent of prison and jail work, Mrs. Jessie McOwn, manages to make her department include everything else. She goes to the jail laden with postal cards, stamps and paper, so as to help the prisoners communicate with their friends. If they need legal advice she calls in the aid of some of her lawyer friends The sick convict gets a relish prepared by her own hands, and they all look forward with delight to her visits twice a week. The fallen woman finds a friend who helps her to a better life, by finding a way of making an honest living Bible readings are held by her in the suburbs among the factory operatives, which have increased in interest so that there are as many outside as in. If she had the means provided for her to carry on her ever widening work, there is no telling what the result would be; but alas! alas! "My people do not consider," and doors which we W. C. T. U. women would gladly enter are kept closed for want of "the silver key" which is the open sesame to all progressive causes.

The young people's work has been for years (in this city) under the superintendence of Miss Lottie Olney, who, although a teacher, employed nearly all day, is president of the Y's, takes charge of the Loyal Temperance Legion, gets up medal contests, has mission classes on Sunday, and as her minister says: "Her church can always depend on her help." Her parlor meetings, which the honoraries take part in, are delightful entertainments.

At a Sunday-school convention in our state, a short time since, the lady teachers as usual were in a large majority, and attended prepared to report their work themselves. But no; such an unwomanly proceeding was not to be permitted; "the papers must be handed over to the brothers, to be read by them," (said Sir Oracle,) and meekly the sisters obeyed. But when it came time to ask for subscriptions towards paying a brother's salary, that job was not handed over to the brethren, but the chairman called out: "Come, sisters, speak out! I like to hear your voices;" and would you believe it, they obeyed again and promised to get up receptions, and all sorts of doings.

I have taken several hundred promissory votes for prohibition, which I hope will materialize at the ballot box. I have only worked in two states, besides my own this year, not feeling it right to leave here while prohibition was in the balance. I sent to the corresponding secretary my resignation as a National organizer.

Charleston, S. C. S. F. CHAPIN.

LETTER FROM ENGLAND.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—It is a long time since I sent you a contribution from this side, not, however, for lack of interesting and stirring events, but rather because they have been so many and so absorbing. I hope now, however, to resume, and to continue regularly the correspondenceship begun last year at the request of dear Miss Ames, whose loss must have been accentuated for you all by the departure of "Saint Courageous," whom we readers of the SIGNAL on this side the ferry seem to have known and loved, though having never met. Many a heart here went out in sympathy to your loved leader in her severe trial, the more so since her stay in this country is likely to be brief, and necessarily hedged around with privacy. Of all the many courageous leaders of the temperance hosts who have crossed the seas from your country to ours not one had a warmer or more loving welcome than our battalions stand ready to accord to Miss Willard, should time and circumstance bring to them a fitting opportunity. Should that not be possible a choice few yet cherish the hope of a more private yet equally gratifying meeting and handclasp with your chieftain before she departs.

A coming guest, John G. Woolley, will soon be here. For his presence, also, English temperance people are indebted to Lady Henry Somerset, and there is no doubt his campaign on these shores will give a great impetus to our crusade against the drink fiend. Lady Henry's sponsorship, aided by excellent credentials from D. L. Moody, Dr. Pierson, and others equally well known here, have prepared the way, so that already the time announced for Mr. Woolley's stay is filled with engagements for series of meetings in some of our largest centers. Two missions at least will be held in London, north and south, while others in the provinces and in Wales and Scotland follow on. Some who follow with delight his "Railroad Ties" and other writings in THE UNION SIGNAL, anticipate a rare treat from Mr. Woolley's oratory, and I hope to send you satisfactory accounts of his work.

How small the world is! and how world wide our sacred principles are. The other day in this room, as I bade farewell to Mr. W. Jennings Demorest, leaving after a flying visit to England, there came in a good friend of the cause, newly arrived from New Zealand. This gentleman had been resident in Sydenham, a town which has won some notoriety by reason of its licensing committee having closed all the saloons in the town, eight in number, under the New Zealand local option law. He reported the liquor faction in a ferment. The interesting point, however, was that here, face to face and hand in hand, were representatives of prohibition from the new and the newer worlds, discoursing of the same grand principle, and encouraging workers in the Old World to press on as we are doing, toward the goal of emancipation from the drink curse.

Mr. Jennings Demorest rendered good service while here by the issue of an article on "Licensing the Liquor Traffic an Atrocious Wrong." Through the Alliance press agency it was communicated to the general press and appeared—scathing indictment as it was—in some of our leading daily papers.

Lady Henry Somerset is making fine headway in organizing the work of the World's Woman's C. T. U. You have noted the opening of headquarters. In them a veritable hive of industry for the cause of women in many directions is carried on. The work spreads and is destined, without a doubt, to prove the most valuable addition to the temperance propaganda of recent times. There are those who look with little favor on Lady Henry's activities. They have sadly misjudged her, however, and I express no superficial opinion when I say her efforts already are owned and blessed of God, and are destined to lift the temperance cause among women to a higher level, and to carry it forward with an impetus that will find no difficulties, only obstacles to be overcome.

COLUMBIA'S EMBLEM.

BY EDNA DEAN PROCTOR.

Blazon Columbia's emblem,
The bounteous, golden corn!
Eons ago, of the great sun's glow
And the joy of the earth, 'twas born.
From Superior's shore to Chile,
From the ocean of dawn to the west
With its banners of green and tasseled sheen,
It sprang at the sun's behest;

And by dew and shower from its natal hour,
With honey and wine 'twas fed,
Till the gods were fain to share with men
The perfect feast outspread.
For the rarest boon to the land they loved
Was the corn so rich and fair,
Nor star nor breeze o'er the farthest seas
Could find its like elsewhere.

In their holiest temples the Incas
Offered the heaven-sent maize—
Grains wrought of gold in a silver fold,
For the sun's enraptured gaze;
And its harvest came to the wandering tribes
As the god's own gift and seal;
And Montezuma's festal bread
Was made of its sacred meal.

Narrow their cherished fields; but ours
Are broad as the continent's breast,
And, lavish as leaves and flowers, the sheaves
Bring plenty and joy and rest.
For they strew the plains and crowd the wains
When the reapers meet at morn,
Till blithe cheers ring and west winds sing
A song of the garnered corn.

The rose may bloom for England,
The lily for France unfold;
Ireland may honor the shamrock,
Scotland her thistle bold;
But the shield of the great Republic,
The glory of the West,
Shall bear a stalk of the tasseled corn
Of all our wealth the best.

The arbutus and the goldenrod,
The heart of the North may cheer,
And the mountain laurel for Maryland
Its royal clusters rear.
The jasmine and magnolia
The crest of the South adorn;
But the wide Republic's emblem
Is the bounteous, golden corn.

BY MRS. O. W. SCOTT.

CHAPTER VI.

Dorothy burst into her father's study, tears running down her cheeks, her voice choked with emotion, "Papa! papa!" she sobbed, "are you a crank? That bad, bad Mr. Pettigrew says you's a crank."

The minister held his arms open, and Dot sank into them, a limp, disconsolate little heap. She was evidently gotten up for some special occasion, and her father laughed quietly for a moment as he held her tightly and smoothed her tangled hair. Around her shoulders was a wreath of autumn leaves, tied with red, white and blue ribbon. Her waist was bound by a girdle of bunting from which projected a large toy pistol, and in the top of each boot were two tiny flags. "And what did you say to him, Dot?" Mr. Douglas asked at length.

"I didn't tell him one single word. I held my head right up—and looked at him with my eyes!"

"That's right, you mustn't try to answer gentlemen when you don't understand. He was just joking, and I don't mind it at all."

"She hasn't told you all there is to it," said Ted, who had followed his sister at a slower pace.

"You tell the story, then, while Dot dries her eyes," said Mr. Douglas, noticing that his small son was also in martial array, with an actual tin sword in his bunting belt. Ted sat down and folded his hands.

"Well, you see, papa, Harry Pettigrew's one of the boy 'publicans that march, and he let Willie take his cap, and we had a lot of things that was left over the 'lumination, so we had a procession. Willie had a harmonica, and Letty Reed had a bell and I had a drum and Dot carried the flag, and we was singing: 'Clinton B. Fisk, we'll take the risk!' that's what Letty's mamma told us to holler—and Mr. Pettigrew he came down the path in the orchard, and he patted Dot's head and says, 'Hullo, little boy,' and—"

"He's always calling me little boy!" wailed Dorothy.

"He says, 'Hullo, little boy, you're a good 'publican, I see,' and I says, 'No, sir! we ain't 'publicans.' Then he says, 'Oh, you're Democrats,' and then Dot said, We're Prohibitioners.' Then he laughed—with his mouth—and said, 'You're just like your father, and he's a crank!'"

"Yes, he did," cried Dorothy, with a fresh burst of tears, "and Mr. Pettigrew won't never, never go to Heaven!"

"What do you think a crank is?" asked her father, drawing her to his knee.

"It's a wicked, wicked man, that tells lies—and steals," replied Dorothy, promptly.

"Ho! she hasn't got it right, has she, papa? It's a man that don't vote with Mr. Pettigrew, isn't it?"

"You are nearer right, my boy, but you listen, and I'll tell you more about it. You see there are two great parties and each one wants to choose the president."

"Why do they?" interrupted Dorothy.

"Because it is a great honor, and the party that wins has a great deal of money—"

"Do they ever give it to ministers?" queried thoughtful Ted.

"No, the leaders have it, and those who get the work of government to do. These two great parties are afraid of the men who make, and sell, and drink the stuff that makes people drunk. So they let the saloons be, and men drink, and sometimes they kill their wives and children and sometimes they are insane, and sometimes they just lie around in dirt and rags, spending all they have for rum, and letting their little children go hungry and cold. So, men and women who believe that saloons must go, and that nothing can prosper until they go, have formed another party. The older parties don't like it, and they call those who join the new party 'cranks.'"

"Oh, yes, I see!" cried Ted, while Dot nodded wisely and asked, "Do you like to be called it real well, papa?"

Her clear eyes were upon him, and he could only say, trying to speak soberly:

"I've but just begun to be one, Dot, and I can't say that title is the nicest in the world, but I would rather be a good, thorough-going crank than a saloon prop. And we have a right in this country to join the party that we believe is doing as God would have it. Don't forget that, Ted, as you grow older."

"I'll 'member it too," said Dot.

"Ho! girls don't need to, I guess, do they, papa?"

"No, dear, girls don't vote. I meant that Ted should remember it always, and especially after he is twenty-one, when he can vote as God wants him to. He must be a good temperance boy, and then he will by and by help elect such men as will make good laws for the people."

Dorothy had been listening with wide open eyes as usual. "Me too!" said she, brightly, "you want me to do all those things too, don't you?"

"Girls and women don't vote, darling. We men take care of them, and make the laws for them. No, you can't go with Ted, but you can—"

The big eyes had been filling with tears, and the dimpled chin was quivering. "I must go with my Ted!" she interrupted in a tone of deep distress. "I can help to make folks good—I'm stronger'n Ted is, papa."

"Yes, but the law won't let my girlie vote," said her father gently.

"You can't because you're a girl," whispered Ted.

"Don't God love me? He never telled me so," and then with an outburst of sobs she clung to her brother's arm.

"Can't I tell her that I guess she can go with me?" he whispered.

"Yes, yes," said his father, adding mentally, "Who knows but she will? I don't!"

The children retreated to a corner, from whence they soon came with happy faces. "Ted says he'll give me half of his vote, papa," whispered Dorothy, with shining eyes. Then she ran down stairs and skipped into the kitchen, calling out: "Mamma, papa's a crank, an' Ted's a crank, an' I'm a crank."

A few moments later and the scattered forces were again united, tooting, drumming and shouting over and over the name of the valiant soldier and peerless patriot who said, "Prohibition is in the air. The nation's heart is beginning to throb to its music."

Mr. Douglas sat in deep meditation a long time after his children left him. We all have seasons when thoughts assume a kind of personality. They question, or plead, or blame, and we listen in silence and answer as best we can. So now the minister's mental speculations continued the conversation with Ted and Dorothy, but not with them alone. Other boys and girls with bright, honest faces fixed their eyes upon him until he recognized that he was confronted by the Coming Generation:

"It is high time you began to educate us for citizens. Are the law-makers thinking about us to-day? What kind of a country are they going to leave us? Are the saloons to be a part of our legacy? And what about the girls? Is it their country, or is it to be a man's country forever? God does love them, and Dot will have a great work to do for Him by and by. Will you give her a fair chance?"

Dear! dear! the minister was fairly bombarded with questions, and he arose to close his window through which came the real children's high-pitched voices, Dot's above all the rest. He took paper and pen thinking he must write to Austin Steele, his brother-in-law in Boston, and tell him of the change in his political faith. But a spell was upon him, and he wrote along the line of his mental awakening as follows:

"It has been said that the education of a child should begin one hundred years before he is born. What provision have we been making for the child of to-day, and what are we doing for the child of to-morrow?

"Heredity pertains to ancestral legacies of brains and tastes and appetites; but there are laws of heredity which control a nation and a state as well. The laws of a nation control the habits of the people. Habits of living are transmitted to the generations born under those laws. I have inherited my character as a citizen from influences set in motion a hundred years ago. My children and grandchildren will be better or worse for the laws being made in these days. These laws protect that which will degrade and impoverish my descendants. Under the present order the saloon curse will descend upon them full of untold horrors, and the child of a century hence, the blossom of our Christian civilization, must fall a victim to national heredity! But are not our wise legislators also parents and guardians of the coming generation? Are they not formulating laws for their protection? Have they not the world's millennium in view? No, they are pandering to the depraved instincts of the hordes who have in their veins not one drop of our national life, not one vague comprehension of our national ideal! Alas! children of the century swiftly approaching, if some mighty change is not wrought, and that right speedily, you will inherit the saloon, a 'mass of corruption,' protected by the old flag, which your ancestors of this generation haven't the courage to bury!"

At this juncture Mr. Douglas arose and walked back and forth across the room. A matter which he had been pondering several days was suddenly decided in the affirmative. He would preach to the voters of his congregation! He had questioned the wisdom of this decision, and in talking with his wife about it had said: "There is so much excitement just now that men are in no condition to listen to calm reasoning. They would get angry and antagonize me and my arguments. So I will wait until after election, and then begin a course of systematic instruction, following the line of my own convictions, until they can't help seeing that ballots are really the only weapons feared by the politicians."

And she had replied: "It was David of old who said: 'The King's business requireth haste,' but sometimes it is best to make haste slowly."

But now he went to the stairs and called "Mary." She soon appeared in the hall below.

"When I was in the army, I never failed to use my ammunition while the battle was raging. Do you understand?"

"Yes, you mean to preach that sermon before election."

Then he returned to his study and she to the kitchen.

We are not prepared to say whether the minister was rash or prudent in this decision. The habit of "leaning to the side of prudence" is so universal in temperance matters that nearly everybody has a natural bend in that direction; and when one does lean the other way ever so slightly, it is supposed to indicate an unbalanced mind!

But the advice of the wise and prudent was not sought on this occasion. God alone heard the petitions for strength and wisdom which went up from the study, and it is quite possible that He sanctioned His servant's decision.

One other query arose in our friend's mind, which might easily have proven a temptation: "What will 'they' say if you begin to preach the new doctrine so soon?" But remembering that it says of St. Paul a few days after his conversion, that "straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues," he concluded that a special course of study was not essential. In fact, like Paul, his mind was stored with facts.

But do not for one moment suppose that this sermon was "a magnificent effort" like that which had been reported in the Chesport Bulletin, and other papers in the early summer. There was not much oratory, nor were there many startling statistics and incidents. But there was a good deal of quiet work among the rubbish, and "Christ was preached" even as when Paul "confounded the Jews" who also belonged to a "good old" but sadly degenerate "party." Rumor had prepared the people for a first-class sensation, but instead they heard this tender, searching appeal, like the introduction of an old time revival. Toward the close, however, there was a somewhat startling "summing up."

*Copyrighted.

"Dear friends," said he, "we have been talking about this subject for years. We have, as Christians, written our preamble in the strongest possible language. We have said: WHEREAS, the liquor traffic is the avowed enemy of the government, of the church, of souls, of homes, of peace, health and happiness, of liberty, purity and of God Himself, and whereas, this enemy is growing bolder and more powerful every year; and whereas, we realize our danger and the fate which threatens our descendants from this awful curse, therefore,

Resolved, 1. That we will ourselves refrain from the use of intoxicants;

2. That we will do all in our power to induce inebriates to reform.

3. That we will petition all who are in authority to enforce the laws impartially.

4. That we will endeavor in every consistent way to secure better laws.

5. That we will scatter literature, and warn the young to resist all evil influences connected with this terrible curse.

6. That we will do what? Everything but cast our ballots against it!

"And why do I emphasize this? Because this country is controlled by ballots, and because a man's ballot weighs more in the decision of this question than all his words and deeds combined."

There was no doubt that these words produced a sensation, for there followed a silence which could be painfully felt. Nineteenth century Christians in their best clothes might not choose to be classed with those old time people already mentioned, but there were some who certainly "were cut to the heart, and gnashed on him with their teeth," figuratively speaking.

Many a furtive glance was directed toward Mr. Sloan's pew, but that dignitary maintained an impassive exterior, at least until after he had left the church. The Rev. Mr. Snow remarked to several of the brethren that "there was dynamite enough in such a sermon to rend the church," and Mr. Pettigrew was approached by a number of the curious and apprehensive who wished an explanation of their pastor's remarks.

But not all were offended. There is an undercurrent of feeling, stronger in these days than ever before, which recognizes the truth, and to which reformers can confidently appeal. As Lincoln said: "You can fool all the people part of the time, and part of the people all the time, but you can't fool all the people all of the time." So there were sympathetic faces turned toward the pulpit after service, but not many of the people were ready to embody their sympathy in words. Several men, however, came forward and shook hands cordially with their pastor, declaring he had spoken "God's truth."

"It isn't a bit stronger than what our bishops have said, but—" here the speaker's voice sank to a whisper, "this is just before election, you know, and we must count every vote if we hope to save the country."

Mrs. Reed—her "prophetic eyes" more luminous than usual, grasped his hand with a "God bless you, Brother Douglas," which was echoed with slight variations by those who belong to the "new school" of agitators. Mr. Pettigrew, evidently not caring to walk home with his pastor, as usual, had said to Mrs. Douglas with assumed carelessness: "If your husband is at home to-morrow evening, I think I'll drop in for an hour."

Quite late that evening the parsonage doorbell rang. When it was opened no one was there, but a bit of soiled paper weighted with a stone was found upon the step. It was written with a lofty contempt for capitals and pauses, and ran as follows: "Mr. minister douglas you must want to do some grate thing if you think you can skare men that ern a decent living keaping a saloon but no body cares for your blame talk but if you dont want your house blowed up you better stop or you may lose your blame hed."

POVERTY IN DOG-DAYS.

BY MARY E. MC DOWELL.

It was a hot day, one of those sticky days with an atmosphere of dense odors. Every one looked and longed for a storm. The leaden clouds rested down about the horizon sullenly waiting for some mighty force to move them to action. Human nature betook of the same sullen temper, so sluggish and heavy that nothing could enliven but a strong sense of duty or self-interest.

It was on such an August day that a kindergartner, after six weeks' absence for needed rest, left her country home in one of the loveliest suburbs, to visit her flock. If you care to follow her you would find yourself in the World's Fair city in a quarter where colonies of all nationalities center where there are seven thousand children of school age, and seating capacity for not quite three thousand, where no one heeds the compulsory educational law, knowing by experience that it is never enforced.

Look down P. street, see the children—Italians, Jews, Irish—an eager crowd gathering from gutter, alley and tenement. You can hardly see the kindergartner she is so surrounded. Her own flock clings to her hands and skirts, while she gives flowers to those she knows, and promises that next week every clean face shall win a flower, and only clean faces need expect them.

Several disappear and soon return with a well cleaned circular space about the nose, but alas, for the neck and ears. See Tony, one dare not kiss that face, though the pleading brown eyes are tempting. Those same eyes can dart malice and hatred, as well as love, his playmates would tell you. Those little hands so busy picking fleas from a pup as dirty as his master—hands instinctive with power to be doing something, now idle all day, because the kindergarten is closed.

Not idle, we should say, but worthlessly employed, for Tony and his mates are gaining a street education fast indeed. What will be his diploma? Where his graduation? These questions ask themselves, when our kindergartner tells that his father is in Joliet for one moment's passion—"murdered a neighbor," they say.

Here we are reminded of one of Heber Newton's thoughts upon the kindergarten; he says: "The kindergarten is only a vicarious mothering for those whose homes lack this divine nurturing, a brooding over this void of unformed manhood and womanhood by a loving woman, bringing order out of chaos, and smiling to see it very good," and in this faith we turn from Tony hoping that the kindergarten may develop self-control and save the impulsive nature from an inherited fate.

"Where is Leo?" (dubbed Sullen Mary in the first weeks of her kindergarten life) the kindergartner inquires as she looks for her most perplexing child.

"In her house," says Mary Rozy, and runs away to fetch the lawless Leo.

While she waits an Irish boy of ten summers is seen near by on a step reading a nickel paper story—he looks up and says, "How-de do?" but is soon lost in his story again.

"A good story?" the kindergartner asks.

"You bet!" is the short answer.

"May I see it?" she then said, and he cheerfully handed it over, showing perfect unconsciousness of its vileness.

Here was another social problem; how was she to meet it, so as not to lose the frank confidence of the boy? She determined to supply better reading of an exciting nature, one of Oliver Optic's naval stories, perhaps, and then turned her attention to Leo, who was pulling at her hand.

An American woman near said, woefully, "You can't do anything with these dirty things, they've all gone back since the kindergarten closed."

Now the closing of the kindergarten was no fault of the listener, for she longed for strength to keep it open summer and winter, so this was the last straw, and the hopeful kindergartner felt both blue and hot. In a moment she was shamed, and new courage came as she caught sight of the "silver lining" tugging at her hand. It was Leo; what a contrast between this bright, beaming face, and the dark, sullen one of their first acquaintance. "Yes, the work did pay," she said, as she shook hands with her loving little Italian friend.

"My babies gone dead," she said solemnly; "you come to my mother." So hand in hand they climb to the third story rooms over the rag shop. You turn from this social slum, wondering if Christ does not protest against the Christianity that cleans the avenues and suburbs, but leaves the P. streets foul and feverish. P. streets need more trained young women, college women with a knowledge of political economy and a theory of sociology. The children of these streets need the young women who for love or money will take the kindergarten as a calling.

The needs of these communities speak to us with Christ-like pleading, "Inasmuch as ye do it unto the least, ye do it unto me."

Evanston, Ill.

DR. J. H. BARROWS, at the late Christian Endeavor convention expressed the sentiment of the higher type of American citizen in these reverent and inspired words:

"It would be easy for the Biblical student to find appropriate Scriptural words to write on every structure in the World's Fair. Below the gilded dome of the Administration Building, the master work of one of the architects of this city, I would inscribe the words of Isaiah, 'The government shall be upon his shoulders;' over the Machinery Hall, I would write, 'Every house is builded by some man, but He that built all things is God;' over the Transportation Building I would write, 'Make straight a highway for our God;' over the place of Fine Arts, 'The gate of the temple which is called beautiful;' over the Agricultural Hall, 'Behold a sower went forth to sow;' over the Electrical Palace, 'His lightnings enlighten the world;' over the Woman's Pavilion, 'He stretcheth out his hands to the needy;' over the Horticultural Building, 'I am the rose of Sharon and the lily of the valley;' over the building of the United States Government, 'He hath not dealt so with any nation;' over the unique and beautiful Fisheries Building, 'And the fishes of the sea shall declare unto thee;' over the Mineral Palace, 'In his hand are the deep places of the earth;' over one of the resplendent gates of the Exposition grounds I would write the prophecy, 'The kingdom of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ;' and over every closed gate on Sunday morning, I would inscribe in letters of gold, for all eyes to see, the immortal statute wherein is wrapped up the Christian future of America and of the world, 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy.'

Verily, verily I say unto you, he that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do; because I go unto my Father.—John 14: 12.

At last the beautiful marble corridor leading to Willard Hall resounds with the blow of the artisan's hammer as his chisel deftly cuts into the hard, polished stone the names of unions, societies and individuals who are to be recorded in this imperishable manner in the great roll of honor in Willard Hall as those who gave one hundred dollars or more towards the erection of the Temple. If any mistake occurs now it will be the mistake of centuries. We hope all names have been given correctly. I wish we could have the name of every individual and union with town and state printed and sent to us who are members of the roll of honor. This would insure absolute correctness, nothing else will, as so many persons' handwriting is difficult to make out. The first letters, chiseled on the marble within the corridor, surmount the entrance vestibule door, and typify the spirit of the white ribboners: "Not willing that any should perish."

The corridor has been set apart to record the names of unions by states who have given $100. The following legend is cut on a band of buff marble, a foot wide, which separates the upper from the lower white marble tablets: "Above and below are recorded the names of the unions in the commonwealth of the United States who have helped build this Temple." These words are spread over a distance of sixty feet; each letter is three inches long, and the sentence is carved on both sides of the corridors.

An expert accountant is now at work on the treasurer's books, making out a correct list of the unions in each state who have paid $100 towards the building. It will be a surprise to the members of the W. C. T. U. in each of the states to know how few unions have as yet paid in full one hundred dollars to the building of the Temple. The first state that has its name carved on the marble is the grand old reform state of Massachusetts. A large tablet has been set apart for this state, on which the names of scores of unions can find a place, but so far, only thirteen unions are recorded on it as having paid in full $100, although many more are at work raising a like amount. Malden union has the honor of heading the list, as it was the first in the state to pay $100. Next week we will give in full the names of all unions as they are recorded on marble in the Willard Hall.

It seems that $100, sent by the Marion, Iowa, W. C. T. U. last April through Mrs. L. D. Carhart in memory of her aunt, Mary V. Spearman, was credited as the gift of Mrs. Carhart, when it should have been credited to the Marion union. Another mistake has occurred in this column. The Eau Claire, Wis., West Side W. C. T. U., sent $100, which was credited to the Eau Claire union. The unions of North Carolina have sent $37.75 to the Mrs. Woody tablet. Mrs. T. C. Riley has just sent the last installment due on the $100 pledged by the W. C. T. U. of Evanston, Ill. One of the members of this union, Mrs. Geo. Keyes, filled her mite box four times and placed it to the union's credit. The Carrolton, Ky., W. C. T. U. sends $41.37, which completes its $100 pledge. West Peotone, Ill., W. C. T. U. has just sent $18, which completes the $100 pledge.

Fifty dollars come from Ashland, Ore., W. C. T. U. The money was sent by Mrs. B. H. Hatch, corresponding secretary. It was the proceeds of a dinner given on the Fourth. Mrs. H. says: "If this is not blood money, it is sweat money coming from the toil of a few. We are sorry we cannot send more at this time, but our expenses were quite heavy, but what we have is cheerfully given to the grand and beautiful Temple, because of the cause it represents." Grant Park, Ill., union sends $41 which completes its gift of $100. The Grand Crossing, Ill., W. C. T. U. has just completed its pledge of $100, by the payment of $15. Twenty-five dollars have been received from Pana, Ill., union, which is the last installment on a $100 pledge. Fifteen dollars have been received from the Social Temple of Rockford, Ill., completing the pledge of $100. Pewamo, Mich., W. C. T. U. sends $10.75, first installment on a $100 pledge.

Little Foster Curry, Ogden City, Utah, four years old, sends $2 to help build the Temple, saying: "I hope it will make little boys and girls good." Little Ray Garner, of Le Mars, Iowa, sends $1, which he earned by selling rags, iron and rubber. Another little girl who saved her pennies for the Temple and sends $1 is Anna Warffuell, Wheeling, West Va. Mrs. Fantis, Newport, Ark., forwards $1 saved for the Temple, she writes, by a hard-working little boy, Willie Olinger, who has now moved to Harriman, Tenn.

The following sums have been received for the Madam Willard memorial window: Ten dollars from the Cadiz, Ohio, W. C. T. U.; $10 from New Windsor, Ill., W. C. T. U.; $1 from Rev. Ada C. Bowles, Gloucester, Mass.; $1 from Annie B. Westgate, Boston, Mass., and $20 from the Central W. C. T. U. of Denver, Col. The following for the Whittier window: Five dollars from the Central W. C. T. U. of Denver, Col.; $1 from Mrs. Edwin Bailey, North Scituate, Mass.

A two-cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, the Temple, Chicago, will secure a mite-box, descriptive card and bulletin; remember, all who fill a mite-box ($3.65) before next April will receive a photographic group consisting of Lady Henry Somerset, Miss Willard and the founder of the Temple. All drafts should be made out in the name of Miss Esther Pugh. All matters pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Carse.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

On leaving home, August 27th, we arranged a cipher for cabling what sort of voyage we had experienced, when we arrived in Liverpool, thus: "Perfection," "Mediocre," "Miserable." With unspeakable gratitude we sent off on the morning of the Saturday following that on which we had left New York, the word PERFECTION. It was the most rapid passage ever made by a Cunarder, everything went well; the breezes favored; the steady, determinate pulsation of the screw never intermitted a single beat; no qualm of seasickness visited either Anna Gordon, who is usually well at sea, or myself, who am the poorest sailor on record. Arthur H. Pollen, tutor to Mr. Henry Somerset, sailed with us, and no brother could have been more kind—our readers know him by certain delightful articles, especially the one in which he described his six years spent with Cardinal Newman. Other pleasant personalities might be described, especially that of gallant Captain Hains and Rev. Mr. Ives, of Brooklyn; but on looking over the list of passengers we had the happiness to find the name of Rev. F. B. Meyer, and an interview with him on the evening before we reached our destination formed the most interesting incident of our voyage.

I knew that Mr. Meyer had been in Northfield conducting Bible readings in that great summer camp of Christian workers during Mr. Moody's absence. Mr. Pollen had given to Mr. Meyer the memorial number of THE UNION SIGNAL, which had arrived in time for us to carry away copies from our native shores. I had heard already of the tender, reverent words he had spoken concerning that memorial, and so we met not only on the footing of two Christian workers, long known to each other through the press, but with the added sense of sympathy, on his part, in the greatest loss my life has known.

In May last I had found the little book entitled "Present Tenses of the Blessed Life," which among the many that Mr. Meyer has written, has helped me most, and has been sent by me to friends in all parts of the world. Sitting in the music room of the superb steamer, Etruria, on the last evening, speaking to him of the good that book had done to me and to many, hearing his brotherly words of sympathy and kindness, it occurred to me to make him the subject of an interview. To this he submitted with the most genial grace, and at the close said with a twinkle in his eyes, "I have never been more kindly handled by that dreaded being, the journalistic interviewer;" whereupon I told him that if I had learned nothing out of his life except the two pivots on which turn the meanings of the little book, "Present Tenses of the Blessed Life," I should think I ought to be considerate toward him even in the pitiless character to which he had referred.

I must give these two pivots once more for the good of all who read, first: 1. It is important for us to remember that our position does not depend on our experience of it, or on our emotions. 2. We must learn to live in our will and accustom ourselves to realize not what we are to God, but what God is to us.

It is known to Christian readers that Rev. F. B. Meyer has become the successor of Rev. Dr. Newman Hall, and that Mr. Meyer, though a Baptist minister, is not ultra on the cardinal doctrine of that creed, but is willing that those who are added to this great historical church of Newman Hall's where immersion has never been a pre requisite of membership, shall choose such form of observing the holy rite as satisfies their consciences. I think a baptismal font has been added to the fixtures of the church since Mr. Meyer became its pastor; in fact we learned from him that the Episcopal service will be read, at least in part, so that his might fairly be called, as probably most churches will be within a hundred years, an eclectic establishment rather than one wholly devoted to any specific form of faith or mode of action.

It seems that Rev. F. B. Meyer was born in London in the year 1847. His ancestors were Germans, his father a Baptist, but his family were mostly Church of England people; they were manufacturers, and belonged to the well-to-do class. He attended a boys' school at Brighton, and spent a few years in early life in business pursuits in London, then entered Regent's Park church to receive special training for the ministry, and there also he took the B. A. degree of London University. His home was one of devotion to God; the sweet and wholesome atmosphere of prayer and love surrounded him from the beginning.

In 1872 Mr. Meyer became pastor of the pretty Gothic Baptist chapel of York, where he enjoyed a happy and successful pastorate, during which the membership was greatly increased. In the spring of 1873 Messrs. Moody and Sankey paid their ever-memorable visit to England. As many Christian people know, the two men who had invited these evangelists from America, Rev. W. Pennefather, of London, and Mr. Cuthbert Bainbridge, of Newcastle, had both passed away before their arrival. Being anxious under these circumstances to set their faces northward, they accepted an invitation to York, extended to them by the secretary of the Y. M. C. A. of that city; here they labored for several weeks, and the tide of blessing soon began to rise. Mr. Meyer was one of the first to welcome them, and entered into their plans and methods with all the ardor of new-born zeal and the unction of a truly consecrated spirit. It was indeed to him a new epoch, the results of which have been manifested in his ministry up to this day.

In 1874 Mr. Meyer went to Leicester and became the pastor of the Baptist church in that city; here he first learned to love the "working class," as they are called in England. "Seeking to save" in his downright practical fashion, he formed the practice of visiting the jail to ascertain what became of the men who had worked out their time and had neither occupation nor friends. Naturally enough he discovered that if there was a class on earth of whom it might be said with truth that they were sheep having no shepherd, this was that one. It seemed literally as if their hand was against every man and every man's hand against them. The community had no faith in them whatever, and in themselves they had little or none. Mr. Meyer began by inviting these men to his own house, in which the garret was fitted up with bunks, and he sought to get something for them to do, devoting his own back yard to this purpose and feeding the men in his own cottage. To any practical mind this is precisely the thing for a Christian to do. "Why should we give of that which costs us nothing?" "Who bestows himself with his alms feeds three, himself, his hungering neighbor and Me." So said Christ in every deed.

"But some doubted," as some always will; certain well-to-do and comfortable Christians felt that they could not have these men coming to their church. As a matter of course they were influential, having much to do with the salary of the minister, hence by a very practical series of manœuvers it came about that the Rev. Mr. Meyer did not remain with that church, but went out alone, and set on foot a movement which, while it did not interfere with any existing church, was yet one of the best contributions we have yet had toward the solution of the vexed problem, How shall we reach the masses?

The noble pile of buildings known as Melbourne Hall, whose dome is seen from afar as one approaches the town of Leicester, is a standing witness to his work. It is a large, octagonal building whose audience room is capable of holding one thousand four hundred persons, and from the time of its opening in June, 1881, it has been crowded each succeeding "day divine," the aisles being filled with chairs. The hush in this large congregation and the attention and responsiveness is remarkable. It goes without saying that all the seats are free and open, so that class distinctions are abolished and the poorest are enabled to occupy any seat they are in time to secure,—for the only aristocracy that prevails in Melbourne Hall is summed up in the old proverb, "First come, first served."

There are two thousand three hundred scholars in the Sunday-schools, superintended by Mr. Meyer with two hundred other teachers to aid him. Meetings of religious, educational and philanthropic character are constantly held, there is a large Band of Hope and many temperance meetings, as Mr. Meyer is devoted to our great reform. There are open air and mission services, a coffee and reading room, and other methods of attracting the people to good things, so that the building is never closed, and we predict that the time will come when there will be an uprising in America that will declare the churches shall not be closed, but their doors of Gospel grace shall stand open the year around, and they shall be the veritable People's Homes.

More than five thousand discharged prisoners have come in contact with Mr. Meyer in his special work called "The Prison Gate Mission." This work led to his instituting a fire-wood factory for giving employment to the most promising cases; also the Working Boys' Home, at which latter place Mr. Meyer may be found in the early morning conducting daily family prayer with his lads. All these institutions are supported by the unsolicited assistance of Christian people. I wish we might remember more than we do that it is Christian people for the most part who carry on the helpful works by which the sorrows of the poor have been ameliorated. It is not the Atheist, the Positivist, or the Free Thinker who furnishes us with everyday illustrations of the Golden Rule in action. This is one of the strongest proofs to any one who chooses to think about it of the transforming influence of Christ's gospel on the everyday man and woman.

Mr. Meyer is not inclined to talk about the little books that he has written on the Christian life, temperance, and other subjects. All the more do I wish to speak of the "Seven Rules for Daily Living," "Why Sign the Pledge?" and "The Perils of Young Girls." Mr. Meyer told me that he had always tried to be what the Arabs call "a brother to girls," because in his early ministry he learned of working girls who went along one street to their place of employment and came home another way, varying the method as much as possible, because if they had good looks, a good figure, or any token of what is called "style" (whatever that may be), they were followed up by evil-minded men. He knew how hard it was for an unprotected girl in a great wicked city, underpaid and overworked, as she was likely to be, to "hold her own" against odds greater than we can conceive whose lives have always been enriched and sheltered. He said above all mottoes he cherished this one, and I wish our editors would have it set out in capitals for all who read:

"WHEN YOU'RE NEAREST GOD YOU'RE NEAREST MAN."

He has been a temperance worker from his earliest recollection, a teetotaler from the beginning, never knowing the taste of wine. When he started as a minister, R. T. Booth, of America, came to Leicester, and ninety thousand men signed the pledge in 1883. "I call my work with that earnest American brother 'deep sea fishing.' I was with him in all his zealous efforts. I believe in prohibition as the ideal, and would always work and speak in that direction, but for us in England who are so vastly behind you in America, Sunday closing (which is prohibition for one-seventh of the time), and the Direct Veto, which gives to every community the right to abolish the public-house, are the lines on which, as I sincerely think, we work to best advantage.

"How do you stand on the subject of the ballot for women?" was an inevitable question. He said, "I would give the bollot to every woman who pays rates;" hence, the sex question does not enter into Mr. Meyer's view of the subject, but (as is most natural in a country where, as Tennyson says, "it seems as if the very horses as they trot say, 'prop-per-ty, prop-per-ty,'") 'money is made the basis of the relations of every human being to the government. This is an anomalous position for one of such fine brain and genial heart.

The latest work of Rev. Mr. Meyer, aside from conducting the Moody Mission at Northfield in conjunction with our own Rev. Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, with whom he says he always agrees (which to my mind is the highest compliment to both), is the pastorate of Rev. Dr. Newman Hall's church, as has already been mentioned, and into which he intends to introduce the same methods which have already worked so well at Melbourne Hall; but perhaps the love of his heart is most deeply centered in what is known as the "Keswick conference." Well do I remember touring among the lakes of Cumberland, the poet's country, watching "How the waters came down at Lodore," and visiting the shrines to Robert Southey's memory. This was four and twenty years ago, but now it seems that tender and God-smitten souls have founded there a summer camp which is the center of teaching the cultivation of the inner life, and the indwelling of God.

Interesting as he was on all the other topics treated, nothing lighted up his genial face so much as the question that he asked me, "Are you one of God's bullets or one of his eagles?" "Please give me a definition of each," was my evasive Yankee reply. Whereupon he said: "The bullet is a force, and there may be times when it is a force for good, but it is moved from without; the eagle with every bone and feather filled with air is moved from within and flies into the Empyrean independent of exterior powers."

"Until ten years ago," he said, in his kind, brotherly way, "I was a Christian of the bullet order, and I think that without egotism I may say I was a force; I hope I am none the less, but greatly more so now that the formula of my life is reduced to these six words, 'I will to will God's will,' for the will is the ring on which all the keys of our nature are hung. When you have totally given the will you have totally given all to Christ, and He opens with His keys all the other faculties of your being—the reasoning, the affectional, the imaginative. The eagle moves freely and unconsciously because it is full of the pure, elastic air by means of which God sets it afloat and holds it up in the sky; it never wearies for He provides a motor that is exhaustless and near to it as its own heart beat.

"Ten years ago, three young fellows were brought to Christ by Mr. Moody, and they were resolved to go out not knowing whither they went so far as finances were involved, and work among the Orientals. They had a fervor and power to which I felt that I had not attained, although I was converted before I could remember. My mother was one of the sweetest Christians that ever lived; when a little boy they say that I took a big apple in both hands and wondered how it grew, and mother said, 'Why, my boy, it grew inside.' So it was with me, and my Christian experience has deepened with every added year; but there was in the fervor of those young men something that sent me to my knees saying, as I told you, 'I will to will the will of God,' and from that day I have been different."

Happy and beautiful life of our heavenly-minded Brother Meyer! God send it forward through many gracious years of truth and kindness along the King's highway.

THE COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION.

Nothing is further from our purpose than unjust or even unkind criticism of the Columbian Exposition. If we err, we wish it to be on the side of charity; and if we think better of the directors than they deserve, we prefer this error to one in the opposite direction.

But we cannot abandon our common sense and trample our principles under foot for even the great Columbian Exposition. We recognize the difficult position of the directors, overshadowed as they are by the dense evil influence of the Chicago press. It is to this, and to the prevailing mammon worship of our times that we attribute the strange obliquity of vision evinced by the authorities of the Exposition.

Our readers will remember the chorus of abusive and insulting derision launched upon Congress for its action on Sunday closing. Some in their wrath talked about refusing the gift of money, unless the Sunday closing mandate should be rescinded, but the directors made no such error. They gave out that it was always intended to respect Sunday; indeed, the Exposition was to be a great religious teacher, and some portions were to be closed. It was a misfortune that the directors had so completely concealed their intentions that the Chicago press joined in a passionate clamor for an open Fair. Evidently there should have been a better understanding between directors and editors or all the talk about a partial closing is an afterthought, a concession reluctantly made to an overwhelming national sentiment. What is really wanted by those who claim to voice the sentiment of Chicago is just what is seen in the Chicago Sunday papers—an enterprise, an outlay and a push immensely greater on Sunday than on any other day in the week. It does not seem to have occurred to the Columbian authorities that there was any other kind of a Sunday except a day to have an unusual crowd, and when the Congress of the United States committed the impertinence of interfering with the Chicago program, and closing the gates on Sunday, a perfect howl of surprise, disgust and indignation rose from the Sunday newspapers, and we are compelled to say, also from the people whom the Sunday newspapers had educated.

The latest aspects of the case show a quiet but persistent effort to secure lists of petitioners, asking a repeal of that portion of the Act of Congress by which the gates of the Fair were closed on Sunday. In this effort the Sunday press will bear a willing and efficient hand. The Illinois state convention of liquor dealers at its late meeting lent aid to the movement.

In view of the sentiment of the country expressed in Congress and by the various religious, educational and industrial bodies, the effrontery of this effort is something approaching the sublime. We are asked to believe that an open Fair on Sunday is in the interest of "pure religion." We are pointed to the poor who will be deprived of the beneficent influences of the Fair unless it can be open on Sunday, but we hear no hint of free admission or reduced rates. We are gravely informed that visitors from this and other countries, if they cannot be admitted to the Fair, will throng the saloons and other resorts of vice. The following sentence is too perfect in its way to be abridged, so we present it as a sample of the literature sent abroad in this interest:

"That the largest opportunity should be given for admission to the grounds and buildings of the Fair on this day, and that some marked distinction should be made so as to have Sunday stand apart as a special day, such as stopping all machinery and labor connected with exhibits and allowing exhibitors who so desire to cover their displays."

The amount of "pure religion" secured by the poor and by those who would make trouble for the police unless the Fair is open, by contemplating the motionless machinery, and the "covered displays" will have to be estimated by some new scale and unit of value.

But the real pith of the petition resides in the last item which asks that "the whole matter of a Sunday, as well as a week day Fair, should be left by Congress in the hands of the regular World's Fair authorities." In other words, "Let us alone." Let the Fair be an expression and exhibit of the moral tone of Chicago, with its many theatres and nearly seven thousand saloons defiantly trampling upon divine and human law alike, with its brazen and defiant gambling!

We gladly record our admiration of the enterprise and comprehension of the directors, albeit too much "bigness," we fear, has been attempted. But we regret more than we can tell the strange short-sightedness respecting moral issues which they display.

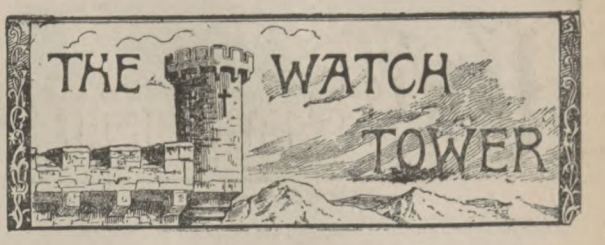
COMPENSATION.

Some years ago there was considerable discussion in the United States of a proposition to get rid of the saloon by buying out the proprietors. It was brought forward in various attitudes, sometimes as an act of justice, at others a matter of good policy. In 1886 Mr. John B. Finch prepared and published a careful argument against the measure. But the enormous and unexpected success of the liquor traffic under high license has put far away any thought of closing out the business in any way, while the sleep of the "temperance men" is too profound for even dreams. Prohibitionists never had any admiration for the proposition, and cannot be expected to treat it with favor.

Meantime, other parts of the world are practically settling the compensation question. This is notably true in Australia. In some of the provinces the people are so unanimous and so eager to abolish the traffic that they consent to pay enormous sums to accomplish their purpose. In Geelong less than twenty saloons were retired at an expense of twenty thousand pounds. In Ballarat £7,764 were paid to seven "publicans," and thirteen others are to be bought off to complete the contract. Other provinces regard with dismay the results of hasty legislation, and it is said there is some genuine repentance in progress there. What the issue will be we are not prepared to say.

In England events hasten with less precipitancy. A decision lately made by Sir Frederick Bramwell meets the approval of the reformers in England. He decided that "the London tramway company had no claim to compensation for good will. It could only claim for its rails, buildings, and other material possessions, and had no claim as a going concern. The evident intention of the act of Parliament was that the tramway company should have twenty-one years to make what profit it could, and that then the undertaking should pass to the municipal authorities, on payment of what may be called the 'dead' value of the company's plant." This is regarded as good law by the Prohibitionists of Great Britain. They allow the publican to carry on his business during the twelve months his license runs. At the close of that period the license no longer exists and nothing is left to be bought or sold. It is a piece of waste paper, nothing more. All those forms of business which call for a formal permission to exist are subject to the same law. We hope the English jurists will with great unanimity sustain this decision.

THERE are perhaps no deeds that call forth from the human heart such genuine and universal admiration and praise as those which are patterned after the actions of Him who went about doing good. Philanthropic organizations win high commendation from the world, but it is the personal endeavor for suffering humanity born of self sacrificing love that commands the highest admiration and the deepest reverence. A little white covered book is circulating quietly about, that could it speak audibly would tell a touching and beautiful story. Its name is "Hospital Leaves and Lyrics." Its compiler is Mr. C. G. McCulloch, of Chicago, "the flower and leaflet distributer." The field of his labors is in the hospitals and infirmary. There where sin and sorrow and pain are ever present, Mr. McCulloch sends many a ray of light by gifts of flowers, fruits, jellies, weekly papers, booklets, Bibles, playthings, scrap books, and pictures. These are gathered from such sources as the park commissioners of the city, fruit dealers, publishers, and friends everywhere. The book referred to above is filled with exquisite poetical selections. Its entire business management is conducted in the same spirit as the rest of this beneficent work, since the sale of each book puts one, free of charge, into the hands of some "shut in." In his report of work done the "distributer" says: "More than all, many of the sick, discouraged 'shut in ones' have been helped to look up, and 'begin again'; many have seemed to have begun a Christian life here; and many more have seemed to dedicate their neglected lives to duty and to God." Surely our friend is daily "putting a shine on his heavenly crown."



"What though your soul be filled with pain
By sin oppressed,
God brings the sunshine after rain;
His blood can cleanse your soul from stain;
Ah, He knows best."

Miss Eleanor Ormerod has the honor of being the only lady entomologist in England. She is considered an authority on the subject of injurious insects and their prevention. She has at the same time a wonderful talent for drawing, modeling and coloring from all forms of plant life.

In one of the towns of Connecticut the public archives still show that a motion was made and adopted by the "school trustees" within a couple of generations past to the following effect: "It is the sense of this meeting that it would be a misuse of public funds to teach girls the back part of the arithmetic."

A correspondent writes: "I am moved to give the following incident for the benefit of our National organizers: In a little village visited by Mrs. Helen L. Bullock, on one of her trips, a well-meaning young man, who a short time before had opened a tobacco store, heard her excellent lecture upon narcotics, and being convinced by it of the evils resulting from their use, at once abandoned his business. So our sisters may take courage while they scatter the seeds of temperance truth, for they know not how many fall upon good ground."

The following incident shows what law will do when it not only prohibits but suppresses: A lady alighting at one of the depots in the great and wicked city of Chicago, approached the driver of a hansom cab and proceeded to enter his vehicle, giving him the brief instruction: "Woman's Temple, twenty five cents." The day was rainy and the man said: "I do not care to take you for the usual fare." "Very well," responded our friend, in her business like way, but she reëntered the depot and soon came out again with a burly figure in blue beside her with whom she had had a dialogue after this order:

"Is not twenty-five cents the regular fare for a hansom cab for a mile?"

"Yes."

"Does it make any difference because the day is cloudy and it threatens to rain?"

"Nothing makes any difference. That is the regular fare."

"Will you be kind enough to come with me and state this to a driver who has refused to carry me for that amount?"

"Certainly."

But there was no need of the services of a policeman. Cabby saw the point, opened the door of his hansom, touched his cap, the lady nodded, stepped in, and away they went without another word.

The Western Christian Advocate is responsible for the statement that one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal church expressed the pious wish that the Lord would mercifully permit him to die before he was obliged to preside over a General Conference in which women sat as delegates, and that another declared his willingness to be cut in pieces, inch by inch, if thereby he could delay fifty years the admission of women. We are sorry for these brothers, profoundly sorry for any one who fails to see in great world movements something more than mere human purpose, who doubts that "God reigns." It is especially sad where the doubter is a high official of the Church of Christ. Yet it is not the first time that such a one has needed a Gamaliel to remind him that "if this counsel be of men, it will come to naught; but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it." We claim no divine message other than any Christian may obtain from his Bible, but we confidently assure these distressed brothers that women will never sit as delegates in the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal church unless God wills that they should; in which case we cannot suppose that these bishops would desire to die rather than live to see His will in this particular "done on earth as it is done in heaven." Much less would they offer themselves as martyrs to postpone the accomplishment of that will fifty years.

MINNESOTA.

SIXTEENTH ANNUAL CONVENTION.

Four beautiful fall days, such as Minnesota climate often affords us, were those during which the sixteenth annual state convention was held. Never did we meet in a lovelier place than Stillwater, which is "all up hill and down, but mostly up," affording picturesque views of river and town and other hills beyond. And never were we entertained by a braver band than the eighteen women of the Stillwater union, who promised to care for the 400 of the convention, and loyally kept their promise. No word of faultfinding was heard, but only admiration and gratitude.

The opening of the convention was preceded by a prayer meeting led by Mrs. Neal, of Minneapolis. Mrs. Hobart then called the convention to order. The roll-call of officers and superintendents was responded to by appropriate Scripture texts; minutes of executive sessions were read, committees appointed, and the seating of the delegates by districts attended to. The remainder of the morning was taken up in reports from district presidents and superintendents, and this was also the order of the afternoon. The morning of the second day invitation was received from the warden of the state prison located in Stillwater, to visit that institution, and accordingly the convention adjourned to go in a body.

Guides kindly piloted the visitors through the buildings, answering questions and imparting such information as they could, and it being near the noon hour, the ladies had an opportunity of seeing the men come in to dinner, after which they went back to their own at the church.

The afternoon was devoted to the conference of the Y's of the state, who conducted themselves in a manner that rejoiced the hearts of their mothers. The future of the temperance work in the state looks bright, indeed, when the faces of these girls and young women are before us, alight with earnestness, enthusiasm and devotion. God bless our Y's, and make them a thousand times as many as they are.

Thursday morning was largely given to reports, and a discussion as to the advisability of adjourning in the afternoon to attend a lecture upon cooking in the Opera House. It was finally voted to adjourn for an hour and a half immediately after lunch, which was accordingly done, and the ladies went in a body to the Opera House a few blocks distant, their earnest faces turning with interest to the stage, upon which was a table containing a gasoline stove and the necessary articles for making bread. Dr. Mary Whetstone read a paper, after which Miss Mary Thompson, principal of the Minneapolis Central W. C. T. U. Cooking School, lectured upon the process of bread-making, illustrated by performing the necessary steps as she talked. Out came note-books and pencils, down went facts and figures, until one might have supposed the audience were a lot of school-girls taking their first lesson, instead of busy mothers and housewives, the large majority of whom had doubtless baked hundreds of loaves. Yet they wanted to know if science had discovered anything new in this line, and take the knowledge back to their families. For home and family are ever uppermost in the hearts and minds of these true women, even when "in convention assembled."

Upon returning to the church, the program which, owing to these adjournments, had fallen far behind, was resumed, and as rapidly as possible carried through. Later a motion was adopted that hereafter in the annual conventions, no invitations to visit anything outside be accepted until the program is finished. While realizing the kindly interest that prompts these invitations, they cannot be accepted without detriment to the work of the convention.

Friday morning, the last day, was one of especial interest because of the election of the general officers and delegates to the National Convention. The president and secretaries were reëlected. Mrs. Sickles, of Minneapolis, was elected treasurer, and Mrs. Fannie Ames was chosen for vice president.

The reports which had been crowded out were now heard, and late in the afternoon the convention adjourned.

On the whole, it was a quiet, working convention. Mrs. Hobart presided throughout, with her usual quiet dignity, giving every woman the largest possible liberty of speech and action, using none of the time for unnecessary remarks, and keeping the business well in hand. Looking at her pale face and frail body, it seemed almost incredible she could endure such fatigue.

The evenings of the convention were occupied by public meetings well attended. On the first, Mrs. Jane M. Kinney, National superintendent, spoke on penal work, a subject that must have had peculiar interest in Stillwater, while the visit to the prison next morning no doubt served to intensify the impression of her earnest words. Mrs. Kinney was present throughout the convention, making warm friends and will be heartily welcome always in Minnesota. Wednesday evening the principal address was by Miss Clara Parrish, organizer for Illinois, a bright, energetic speaker. Thursday evening the Opera House was secured for a Demorest silver medal contest, the house being well filled and the prize taken by Miss Mary Goodrich.

Friday evening the "feast of reason" closed by an address by Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap, the logical. For over an hour and a half Mrs. Lathrap held her audience, reasoning and expounding the law, and ever and anon sending out a keen shaft of wit.

At the close of her address the prize banners were awarded, and then Miss Parrish did a rather unusual and wonderfully effective thing. She asked the eighteen women of the Stillwater union to stand. As they arose they were enthusiastically cheered; then Miss Parrish, desiring them to remain standing, asked all the men of Stillwater who would stand by these women, to rise. A dozen or fifteen were on their feet in a moment's time, and ladies who were waiting in readiness quickly took their names as honorary members. In response to the next appeal several young women and girls arose and gave in their names for membership. Thus the little union was strengthened and encouraged. After singing the audience was dismissed, good-byes were said, and earnest wishes expressed that we might all meet again next year in St. Paul.

"God be with you till we meet again,"

NOTES.

The increase of membership, according to the report of the corresponding secretary, was about 200.

A rising vote of thanks was given Miss Henderson, the retiring treasurer, for her efficient labors during the past fifteen years.

The resolutions committee did excellent work in abbreviating the somewhat lengthy resolutions of other years, confining them to the smallest possible space and number of subjects.

The memorial exercises were necessarily brief, but yet expressive of tender remembrances of those gone before. Mrs. Lathrap gave a loving and appreciative tribute to the memory of Mrs. Mary T. Hill Willard.

Among the resolutions was one indorsing the White Ribboner, our state organ.

NEW HAMPSHIRE NOTES.

"Beautiful hands are those that do
Work that is earnest, brave and true,
Moment by moment the long day through."

The little hands at Salem Depot have been very busy, and as a result there is a new bed-quilt at the Mercy Home. The youngest seamstress in making this precious gift was only three years old. Thus are the beautiful little hands being consecrated to His service as well as those grown weary and feeble with age.

Mrs. N. H. Knox' address will be for the present at Wahpeton, North Dakota.

Mrs. A. S. White has been spending her summer in her cottage on the shores of Lake Sunapee, and as she has watched God's sunlight play upon these varied colored waters, she has been planning how our temperance work could be pushed, and praying for its success.

When it was decided that the Baptists of New Hampshire should hold their first grove meeting at The Weirs, an invitation was extended to the New Hampshire W. C. T. U. to occupy one day, which proved one long to be remembered. At 9:30 the exercises were opened by Mrs. Knox; Mrs. M. W. Richardson, of Amherst, led the opening prayer service, Mrs. Hatch, matron of the Mercy Home, told of the work being done there, and the needs of the Home; Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson, corresponding secretary of Massachusetts W. C. T. U., told in a very interesting manner of the work to be done by the women and of much that had been accomplished. The superintendent of evangelical work, Mrs. A. W. Phillips, led the devotional hour. In the afternoon, ex-Gov. D. H. Goddell had the stand and spoke with his usual zeal upon the temperance cause and work. The Demorest medal contest was in charge of Mrs. Josephine Austin, state superintendent of contest work, Littleton. The judges, after great difficulty in deciding, awarded the prize to Miss Alice Floyd, Lakeport, Rev. M. B. V. Knox presenting the medal. There were generous collections received at both sessions, and a unanimous vote and resolutions were passed expressing regret at the departure of Dr. and Mrs. Knox for their western home. For eleven years Mrs. Knox has been our state president. Miss C. R. Wendall was placed in charge of the work until the annual meeting in October. The cordial invitation to occupy a day at the grove meeting in 1893, from the Baptist association, was gratefully accepted. There is great interest felt as to who will fill our president's place in the years to come. She is so firm and yet so gentle that she is universally beloved.

The Henniker union is composed mostly of adults, there are few if any young women in their midst. Many pay their dues yearly but do not attend the meetings. In the past four years they have maintained a Band of Hope through the summer, ending in the fall with a supper and a little entertainment. For various reasons it has not been continued through this season, though the young children are anxious it should be. Where are the leaders to march these little ones on to the glorious work that lies undone? No greater work can be done than in teaching the children.

The state convention will be held in Laconia the second week in October.

Miss Lucy J. Holmes, Derry, so well known to our workers, is at the Mercy Home in Manchester, acting in the capacity of resident teacher.

Our dearly beloved poet, John Greenleaf Whittier, died at Hampton Falls, where he had been sojourning for a time. He was our true friend; from his simple faith in God we should gather great strength and learn a lesson. Does he not tell us,

"I would rather walk with God in the dark
Than go alone in the light;
I would rather walk with Him by faith
Than walk alone by sight."

His last hours were conscious and peaceful, verifying that sweet assurance which he has breathed out in verse:

"I only know I cannot drift
Beyond His love and care."

At the grange fair at Tilton, September 14 and 15, the various W. C. T. U's in the state had a restaurant tent, of which a full report will be given in my next letter.

A mass-meeting was held in Phenix Hall, at Concord, in August, to plan for the fall campaign and secure a corps of strong temperance men. Speeches were made by an able orator from Maine, who strongly advocated prohibition. Father Sculley, of Cambridge, made an address, viewing the temperance question from an educational standpoint, that was worth going miles to hear. He was followed by ex-Mayor Johnson, from Massachusetts, a well-known temperance worker. Mr. Charles Hamman offered resolutions, the purpose of which were that, four men in every county in New Hampshire be added to the state temperance committee, their work to be to put before the people a purely honorable temperance ticket.

The annual meeting of the Hillsboro W. C. T. U. was held in the Baptist church at Greenville. The exercises were of more than usual interest throughout the day and a Demorest medal contest was held in the evening, arranged by the local union; a paper upon the subject, "Is the Popularity of a Cause a True Test of its Righteousness?" by Mrs. E. H. A. Wallace, was very fine. It was followed by a discussion on the training of children, by Mrs. J. F. Grimes, of Hillsboro Bridge, which was well received. Addresses to the children present were given by Mrs. James Lewis and others, forming one of the pleasantest hours of the day. Reports from several unions were very encouraging, showing that the work is advancing. The officers for the last year were reëlected and stand as follows: President, Mrs. Emily K. Jewett; secretary, Mrs. S. A. Carlton; treasurer, Mrs. M. A. Chase.

The eleventh quarterly convention of the Strafford W. C. T. U. met at Durham. The devotional exercises were under the guidance of Mrs. L. E. Hall. Mrs. Durham gave a hearty address of welcome. The noontide hour of prayer was led by Miss McIntire, as was also the Bible reading. All were strengthened by this close communion. It was an extremely warm day and the attendance was not large, but the two or three gathered together in His name felt the presence of the Heavenly Father. In the afternoon Miss Burrell, of Durham, read a paper on Sabbath Observance, especially relating to closing the Exposition in Chicago in 1893. Mrs. Fetts and Miss Wendall spoke very earnestly upon the amount of alcohol in patent medicine and the necessity of bringing about a reform in this matter. Good reports came from the Y. W. C. T. U. of Dover and Great Falls. Dover has a new L. T. L.

Miss Wendall asked the ladies to gather and press wild flowers from their locality to send to Miss Casseday. Two ladies presented the claim of support for The Outlook, our state paper. The editor seemed especially anxious that no draft should be made upon the state treasury for it. Mrs. Hall asked why the responsibility of the mother should be so much more talked about than the father, which resulted in a spirited discussion. I wonder this subject is not more thoroughly and more often discussed. A mother may use all her influence to purify the life of her child, but if the father's lips are blackened by vile language or yellowed by tobacco juice, or his limbs are weak and trembling from too much strong drink, what can a mother do?

The last convention in which Mrs. N. H. Knox took an active part was that of Belknap county, at Gilford, before leaving for her home in Dakota. She conducted the question-box and gave an address upon the Mercy Home. A union was formed in Gilford with Mrs. Alice Phillips for president. Rev. M. Phillips, of Gilford, conducted the Bible reading, and Mrs. Brown, of Laconia, the devotional exercises. In the evening the Demorest contest passed off finely, Lenora Brown winning the prize.

A first Demorest medal contest is hard to start when the people have not read up the matter and are in ignorance of how it is done; they seem to fear we are laying a trap for them; they cannot comprehend how a man can be so generous and disinterested.

It was expected that our Merrimac county president sailed from Antwerp, Saturday, September 17, and arrived in New York September 28. God bring her safely to her pleasant little home in Concord.

The Merrimac county convention was under the direction of Mrs. Lucy R. Cross, of Concord. At their annual meeting in Hopkinton, September 6, the following officers were chosen: President, Mrs. C. W. Pratt; secretary, Miss Clara Rowell. Mrs. F. H. Bailey, in behalf of the Hopkinton W. C. T. U., of which she is president, gave an address of welcome, in which she presented the rather startling question in regard to the fruit juices, whether the church member had a right to partake of the juice of the grape at the communion, and then censure her child for partaking of the unfermented juice of the apple.

She laid the question before the convention for consideration. "Cannot He be kept in remembrance just as truly with bread and water, as with bread and wine?" Have we the right to distinguish between the juices, fresh from the press, of any God-given fruit? Mrs. L. R. Cross responded to the address of welcome. Miss Florence Goodrich conducted the devotional exercises. An address, "What can we do for the Children?" was read by Mrs. H. E. Thayer. Reports were heard from the various unions. The ladies of the Hopkinton W. C. T. U. entertained the guests, many remaining over night. In the evening, Mrs. E. K. Jewett lectured on narcotics.

The Nashua ladies are earnestly working against the starting of a brewery in their city. A protest against it has been published and presented to the board of trade. They are trying to arouse public sentiment against it, with what success remains to be seen. At their parlor meeting about one hundred and fifty were present, one lady giving her house and grounds for the occasion. Music and recitations filled the order of exercises. The Demorest medal contest was a success in every way, and another is contemplated.

MICHIGAN ETCHINGS.

This is the presidential year, and the air is full of hurrahing, and while we would not do such an unwomanly thing as to shout audibly, yet in our hearts we have given three cheers and a tiger for the very munificent gift that has come to us as a state W. C. T. U. This is a lot in beautiful Hackley Park, a few miles out of Muskegon, on the shores of Lake Michigan, which art and nature have combined to make beautiful for situation, and more than this, $1,000 towards a building, which, with an added sum from the state, will give us a building for summer assemblies creditable alike to us and them. Mrs. Lathrap writes, "Ours is one of the finest lots on the grounds." So rejoice with us in our summer good fortune.

We had our first meeting this summer. The neat programs read: "State Woman's Christian Temperance Union Day; leader, Mrs. L. F. Morehouse, president of the ninth district"; the other attractions were, our state president and Miss Griffin, of Alabama, for speakers, and a medal contest at which Miss Newcomb gave an address on physical culture. Thus, with the many other states, we fall into line as all-the-year round educators.

During the campaign for constitutional amendment in Michigan, we were greatly helped by Rev. John H. Lauritzen, of Port Huron. He is now at Knoxville, and has just published a song book, a compilation of many familiar gospel hymns with both German and English words, called Der Amerikanische Chorsaenger.

Our state minutes are out. In our president's address are these words: "The battle is on; the forces are afield at the call of God and truth; the issue made against the liquor system will not down at any man's bidding; against the red flag of the saloon treason we place the white rose, and white ribbon of prohibition, and push the fight to the finish." And thus as a state we stand.

MRS. Wheeler, the retiring secretary, in her report retrospective of the past eight years said: "Then there were 174 unions, membership 5,355, now there are 448 unions, numbering 8,717; then fifteen departments, now twenty-eight. A steady advance gained and held."

A very thoughtful paper by Mrs. May, state treasurer, has this for us: "Our work is, as it should be, constantly broadening, not simply in the multiplicity of departments, but in the amount of work done in those departments, and we all know increase of work requires increase of money that some one must pay. But great reforms are never brought about by narrowness of spirit, and an unwillingness to look beyond our own needs and aims. The superintendents' reports show good work, and most of them are reappointed. Mrs. H. N. Newman, Jackson, is superintendent of flower mission; Mrs. Margaret Taylor, Lapeer, is superintendent of state and county fairs. In report of flower mission, these two items are worthy of special notice: Number of signers to the pledge reported, 508; number of bouquets distributed 17,599; number of unions who take up this department, 192. The report of state and county fairs gives amount of moneys raised, $450.56; temperance papers distributed, 1,905; leaflets, 15,498.

One of our W. C. T. U. workers, Mrs. Hawkins, leaves Flint this week to go in the Deaconess Home at Chicago. A few of her comrades gave her a surprise tea, a unique feature of which was a cake basket, with favors tied with white ribbon, each one containing some sentiment on temperance by leading men and women; conspicuous were the quotations from Mrs. Lathrap, Miss Willard, Mrs. Buell; these were kept as souvenirs of the occasion. Our gifts were flowers and Dore's Bible Gallery.

The month of gathering the golden grain reminded us of work done, well done, and in the field of the world some of our workers were gathered home—Madam Willard, whose loss was mourned wherever our white ribbon goes. A brief line from the Leavitt union says that they mourn the loss of their treasurer, a sincere Christian and an earnest worker. Over ninety from the state during the year are classed by the editor of state minutes under this comforting text: "And they shall see His face and His name shall be in their foreheads."

Escanaba, twelfth district, reports interest at a union meeting. Both Episcopal and Presbyterian ministers made eloquent addresses. They have given one social, one musicale, one literary entertainment since last February. With these and by soliciting they have raised $1,400, have bought a corner lot and will soon erect a public reading room, gymnasium and hall and headquarters for our union. At a fair held in the spring, $650 were the net proceeds. Lumbermen and hardware stores help in furnishing the material. Mrs. Court writes: "We feel that God has given us this work to do and that He will give us strength to do it." Now, sisters, is this not an inspiring breeze from the North? God bless them all!

Caseville union writes of the good work of Mrs. M. M. Weeks for the L. T. L., giving her illustrated lecture. They have held two Demorest contests, and have six silver medals within four miles; hold mothers' meeting monthly, and find them very helpful. A line from the eighth district's new president says: "The county president and myself were at the organization of a new union in Saginaw, West Side. It is named for Lady Henry Somerset, and fifty-four joined." From the sixth district comes word of two unions formed since the state meeting. Dr. Reynolds, of Pontiac, is doing educational work with his new paper, The Living Issue. Oakland county convention is held this week at South Lyon.

From fifth district we have a report headed, "Annual Convention of School of Methods, Ottawa County," which was held at Coopersville. Thirty-seven voting delegates from the eight unions were present. One hour each day was given to devotional service; scientific temperance and social purity were presented by papers, discussion following each. Mrs. A. S. Benjamin gave each day a parliamentary drill, and on the first evening outlined the beginning and continuous work of the W. C. T. U. Other departments were presented, notably franchise in the form of questions, ably answered by Mrs. Benjamin, subscriptions taken for THE UNION SIGNAL and the Michigan Union. Holland union has sold 100 copies of district minutes, and raised $27 for the Temple. Miss Frances Griffin, of Alabama, occupied the last evening.

Allegan county also reports a convention held at Hopkins, fifty-six voting delegates and many visitors were there. The active membership in unions in county numbers four hundred and sixty-seven, honorary, fifty-three. Papers were read upon "The Mother's Duty," "Temperance in the Home," followed by discussions. The evangelistic and social purity work reported by Mrs. Millspaugh is worthy of special mention, on account of so much work done to uplift humanity. On the first evening the Demorest medal was won by Miss Gertie Andrews, Shelbyville. The music on both evenings was from "White Ribbon Vibrations." Miss Griffin, the gifted Southerner, gave an address on the latter evening.

Our district presidents are "many gifted" women. Mrs. Brown, of the third gave us each as a souvenir, a little book she has prepared, entitled, "Helps to Bible knowledge for Sunday-school scholars," including books of the Bible, classified genealogy and biography of the judges and kings of Israel. The superintendent of press work in the second district begins her report thus: "The work of saving souls in this district is being carried forward." The Addison union has just decided to pay $110 for a ten years' lease of a new hall there, to be known as the Temperance Hall, and used for our work. And so we come to the first district and find they have been giving an object lesson at the great Exposition, the following unions joining with them: Western, Central, Eastern, Woolfenden, Plymouth, Newcomb, Cushing, Lathrap. As the result of their united efforts, a paper comes to me called the Exposition Expositor, which says: "The charming white and gold booth of the W. C. T. U. is on the second floor, presided over by ladies of the city who give you a cordial welcome. The front of the booth is three arched, having a literature table with pictures of prominent workers. One side says 'L. T. L.,' the other 'E. S. A.,' both with literature of their department. The banners brighten the interior, and there is a free distribution of reading matter bearing on every phase of temperance and suffrage work." Among visitors of note were Mary T. Lathrap and Mrs. Jennie Voorheis.

MRS. C. H. JOHNSON,
State Reporter, Flint.

TEXAS.

THE ORIGIN OF ONE UNION.

Our state president, Mrs. Helen M. Stoddard, after camping out on Padre Island, for some weeks, starts out on her work as brown as a gypsy and full of love for her roving life so filled with blessings.

The first meeting of the season was a school of methods at Corpus Christi. There were business meetings every day, and addresses every evening. Many good papers were read and much time was devoted to the study of Texas laws which are so flagrantly violated. An L. T. L. was organized. A parlor meeting with delightful program was held. The last day of the session was enlivened by the presence of Mrs. Mary Dohoney Carter who came from Flower Bluffs bringing an adopted baby which she desired Mrs. Stoddard to consecrate to W. C. T. U. work in Mexico. Its mother is a Dane and its father is a Spaniard.

At Kennedy Mrs. Stoddard organized a small union and an L. T. L. At San Antonio she was delighted to find the West End church prettily decorated with flowers and mottoes and almost full of people. She gave an interesting address on scientific temperance, illustrated by charts. The next morning an L. T. L. of forty-two members was organized in West End. Friday evening a similar address was delivered in Travis Park M. E. Church, South, in the city. Saturday morning was spent in calling on the various ministers and trying to see what could be done toward organizing other unions and L. T. L's.

Sunday morning Mrs. Stoddard told the children of the West End Sunday-school all about the Temple, exhibiting a large engraving of it. As the pastor was absent, she was invited to speak at eleven o'clock, and gave us a most helpful Bible reading on Mary and Martha. Sunday afternoon an L. T. L. of twenty-one members was organized at Travis Park church, and on Monday another of thirty-two members was started at the "Protestant Home for Destitute Children." Almost a hundred new recruits are thus enrolled in this grand army.

Later we visited the old union and Mrs. Stoddard gave an exposition of the last chapter of Proverbs, and several of us gave our experience in W. C. T. U. work. There were a number of visitors present who seemed to have come out of curiosity. A number united with the W. C. T. U.

Tuesday afternoon was appointed to organize another union, but as there were so few present nothing was done. Mrs. Stoddard feels that there is room in this Sodom for six or eight unions and nearly every department could be taken up. If this could be done and we should have a mass-meeting every quarter, a temperance sentiment would be aroused here which does not now exist. Mrs. Hattie Rountree was appointed city superintendent of L. T. L. work. While here Mrs. Stoddard received official notice of the resignation of Mrs. Elizabeth Strong Tracy as state reporter for THE UNION SIGNAL, and appointed the undersigned as her successor. I hope the various unions will take notice of this and send their reports promptly that our column may be filled with fresh news items. Please be sure to put on the address, West End, San Antonio.

These news items not having been received in time for this letter, perhaps an account of the origin of our West End W. C. T. U. will be of interest to THE UNION SIGNAL readers. Several months ago my husband told me hurriedly one evening that a friend of ours had been drunk on the street. He had been very sick with la grippe, and while suffering intense pain his brother had given him whisky. The old appetite of a dissipated youth was aroused, and this devout Christian went on a spree of more than a week's duration. It was a great shock to every one.

When I heard it I knelt and commenced to pray, saying, "How long, O Lord! how long?" If some one had been standing by me the answer could not have been plainer or more immediate, "Just as long as Christian people like you do nothing for temperance." I ceased my wailing and solemnly vowed, God helping me, I would do something for the great cause. After consulting with the president of the city union, organized so long ago by Miss Willard (and of which I have been a nominal member for more than a year), I was requested to organize a union in West End, a suburb of San Antonio.

Many obstacles presented themselves, but finally, with the assistance of two friends, we secured thirty-one names, and organized a union June 30. As I went round securing names, several women said to me, "I don't deny that it is always in the house, but I never touch it." Another said, "If it hadn't been for that business I should have had a nice home long ago." Another tried to discourage me in every way, though she had been a temperance worker in the North. At last she said, "Oh, you can't do anything for temperance in the South, anyway." I did not intimate to her that there was not a drop of other than southern blood in my own veins, but quietly proceeded to enlighten her mind on the subject of temperance work in the South. And thus our union was started.

MRS. CORNELIA KEITH CARTER,
State Reporter, San Antonio.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

A "SHUT-IN" sister of Wisconsin has made thirty scrap books for prisoners this year.

MRS. ALICE WILLIAMS, one of our National lecturers in the purity department, meets the approval of her audiences and is a refined and gifted speaker.

THE pleasant little country town of Richwood, O., has a new and moving union of twenty five members, organized and presided over by Mrs. Anna Dunham.

SIGNATURES to the World's Petition are coming in. A member of the Palmyra, N. Y., W. C. T. U., aged seventy-five years, has been instrumental in securing the names of most of the reputable citizens of that town.

CAPTAIN FRANK BURT, the Prohibition nominee for governor of West Virginia, is an old time soldier and is putting all the energy and consecration of thirty years ago into the battle of to day for home and humanity.

MRS. DORA A. EVANS, of Kansas, has just closed a series of successful meetings in Sheridan county, organizing Sheridan, Beckton and Big Horn, and leaving arrangements for a county union almost completed. Her work is highly commended.

THE Pansy Society of America is organized to plan the adoption of this sweet-faced posy as the national flower of America. Anybody can belong by sending name and address to the national secretary, Maud Russell, Canton, South Dakota, with one cent or stamp for registry.

SINCE February of the present year, Mrs. M. J. Borden, president of New Mexico W. C. T. U. has, with one exception, visited every local union in her territory, some of them two or three times, and has organized two new unions. In doing this she has traveled three thousand miles and given thirty addresses. The local unions throughout the territory stand by the work nobly, many times under trying discouragements.

THE second annual county convention of the Whatcom county, Washington W. C. T. U. was held in Lyndon not long ago. Seven unions were represented. The session was thoroughly harmonious, enjoyable and profitable. The L. T. L. half-hour deserves especial mention. Little Fay Coberly, age eight years, presided with much dignity, showing what even a little girl may do. Several new lines of work were adopted. Mrs. E. C. Graves was reëlected president.

THERE is no place in the United States where prohibition is needed any worse than in Utah. Rum is sold everywhere; there are fifty saloons in Ogden alone, and it is sold at almost every drug-store as well. There is little to encourage the temperance workers there but the recent action of the Mayor and chief-of-police in closing a variety theater and other low dens and ordering the inmates from the city has received an emphatic vote of thanks from the W. C. T. U.

AN interesting correspondent reasons thus: "Whichever way we look at the license question it appears to be wrong. If the system was lawful we would have no cause to complain, but we have a right to question the legality of a system that allows people to take their liquor upon the authority of a corporation. Where there is no prohibition all business is upon equal footing before the law. With little trouble or expense the whole matter might be contested in a court of justice by some one refusing to pay for his license."

SOMERSET PARK, named in honor of Lady Henry Somerset, is the seat of the W. C. T. U. assembly at Lake Helen, Florida, a beautiful resort, and the address made there by our white ribbon leader in the state of Florida, Mrs. E. A. Hill, was full of good points and gives us new hope for a forward movement in the beautiful state farthest south. Mrs. Hill bade them take as their motto in carrying out successfully this new enterprise, the three "P's,"—pluck, push and perseverance,—which she says are more patient and powerful than any panacea from the druggist.

THE W. C. T. U. and the L. T. L. at Gallipolis, Ohio, wore a badge for twenty days in memory of Madam Willard.

MRS. A. H. COUGHLAN, formerly president of Adams, N. Y., W. C. T. U., a tried and proven worker, is among those who passed onward during the summer.

THE Greene County, Ind., W. C. T. U. had a booth at the county fair, where they distributed literature and sold lemonade, coffee, sandwiches and ice cream. They also had an automatic drinking fountain.

Y EVENING at the Minnesota state convention was of especial interest. Miss Clara Parrish, W. C. T. U. organizer of Illinois and a prominent Y worker, gave the principal address, which was enthusiastically received.

MISS SWARTZ, state evangelist of the W. C. T. U. for South Dakota, has been in Pierre for two weeks. Her Bible readings given every afternoon at the Congregational church have been very instructive and helpful.

THE resolutions adopted by the Lycoming county, Pa., convention last month aside from those of thanks, included special indorsements of young women's work, Sabbath observance, narcotics, mothers' meetings and social purity.

MISS DELPHINA ELLIS, Newberg, Ore., is a sweet, Christian spirit who has been shut in for sixteen years. She arranges beautifully coast foliage, lichen mosses, mistletoe, sea moss and shells, the only work her frail hands can do, and will gladly fill orders.

THE annual convention of the fourth district Michigan W. C. T. U. will convene at Cassopolis, October 12, 13 and 14. Mrs. Dr. Goodwin is chairman of entertainment. Rev. Henrietta Moore, of Ohio, and Miss Frances Griffin, of Alabama, will occupy the first two evenings.

THE night of October 20th is W. C. T. U. night at the St. Louis Exposition. This is the first time the W. C. T. U. has had a night. All white-ribbon women, therefore, who intend visiting the Exposition are urged to time their visit so that they will be present on that evening.

THE Fairmont, Nebraska, W. C. T. U., is mourning the loss of its beloved recording secretary, Mrs. Chas. Treadwell. She fell asleep on Sunday morning, September 11, after terrible suffering since the Fourth of July, at which time she was burned by a fire-cracker thrown by some unknown hand.

TENNESSEE state convention will be held at Nashville, October 11, 12, 13, the dates having been changed. Owing to previous engagements, Colonel Bain will not be able to attend as hoped, but notwithstanding this disappointment, the array of talent promises an especially interesting session of the state W. C. T. U.

Convention Corner.

ACCOMMODATIONS AT DENVER.

Letters are constantly coming to the entertainment committee from persons desiring to attend the convention as visitors, relative to accommodations. Many want entertainment at one dollar per day and some at four dollars per week, within walking distance of the place of meeting. As it is about impossible for one person to answer all letters of this nature that come, a general statement will have to suffice. Hotel rates have been secured and published, on convenient car lines, but usually at such distances that walking a number of times daily is out of the question; excellent places can be secured at very reasonable rates. To those wishing to secure any of the places scheduled, the better way is to communicate directly with the places specified and the sooner the better. Within close walking distance are desirable places and prices not at all exorbitant. Where persons take rooms far out, there are excellent restaurants, some on the European plan, not far from the church. Delegates of course will be entertained free.

Hotels and hotel rates for visitors at the National W. C. T. U. Convention to be held in Denver, October 28 to November 3, and for delegates preferring hotels, are given below.

One noticeable feature of Denver is the large number of family hotels or first-class boarding houses, not devoted to the transient trade. These have been taken into consideration as well as the regular hotels within a convenient distance of Trinity M. E. Church, in which the Convention is to be held, and convenient, also, to rapid transit by cable and electric lines.

Brown's Palace, very close to the church, will furnish entertainment at $3 and $4 per day according to location of rooms. This includes meals, as the hotel is conducted on the American plan. The Palace, just completed and furnished, is probably the finest west of Chicago, and superbly located. These rates are given upon the contingency of securing not less than fifty guests.

The Albany, corner of 17th and Stout, offers most reasonable rates, considering the excellence of the hotel, its advantageous location and admirable management. Room and meals, $3 per day, two persons occupying a room, $5 per day. The Albany is a favorite place for conventions. The use of the club rooms will be donated to the executive and delegates, if the Albany is chosen as headquarters. Its distance from the church is about four blocks and the managers are noted for their attention to the comfort of guests.

The Gilsey, 18th and Stout, will furnish rooms by the week, price $4 to $6, two occupying a room will pay nothing extra. Meals, short order. The proprietress is willing to do everything possible for the guests.

The Albert, 17th, between Glenarm and Welton, and distant three blocks from the church, offers pleasant and newly furnished rooms for $1, $1.25 and $1.50 per day. An attractive café gives meals at $1 per day; no bar.

St. James Hotel, Curtis, between 15th and 16th, makes reasonable rates. Cars pass the door.

Broadway Hotel: Rooms and board, $3 per day; two occupying the same room, $2.50 each; very convenient to L'Imperial, Court Place and 14th, and other family hotels conveniently located, will make reasonable rates, conditional upon having rooms to spare.

The Woman's Christian Association furnishes rooms and board at exceedingly moderate prices.

The Woman's Exchange—auxiliary to the W. C. T. U.—is conveniently located, furnishes meals on the short order system, and is convenient to many places where rooms can be secured.

The Cooper, 1404 South 13th street, can accommodate twenty-five people, four in each room if desired, with room and board at $1.50 per day.

Curtis Block, 1518 Curtis street, guarantees first-class accommodations at low prices, with or without board. Table excellent.

Glenarm Hotel, corner 15th and Glenarm, three blocks from the church, submits a rate of $2 per day each, room and board, where two occupy a room, and $2.50 per day for one person in a room.

The Earl, Tremont near 14th; first class entertainment, about $2.25 per day.

1958 Logan Avenue. Can accommodate four persons in two rooms. Terms, $1 per day. The Gilman near by furnishes meals.

The Tyrone, 22 W. 12th Avenue, two persons in one room, $1 per day each, room and board.

The Dinsmore, 1148 Broadway, $2 per day, room and board.

Ramona, $2 per day, room and board, corner 14th Avenue and S. 14th street.

Capitol Hill Hotel, rooms $3 per week; meals at Euclid Place, directly opposite, $6 per week.

The Holland, 18th and Pennsylvania, room and board, $2 per day.

On car lines, Mrs. Kreuzer, 2445 Clarkson street, two in a room, $1.25 or $1.50 per day each, room and board.

Mrs. C. Kelsey, 1657 Humbolt street. A party willing to share rooms can be accommodated with rooms and board at $1 per day each.

No. 19, 24th Avenue, can accomodate two at $6 per week each.

2160 Downing Avenue can entertain from ten to twenty, at $1 per day for room and breakfast; 22d Avenue car.

440 South Broadway can room two ladies at 50 cents each; reasonable restaurant near by.

1270 Logan Avenue, three ladies, room 75 cents each, but no board.

432 S. Broadway, "Jefferson Block," twelve ladies, two in a room, 25 cents each per day. In same building meals furnished at 25 cents. Car line direct and convenient.

All who come can be accommodated, not perhaps at eastern prices, but the advance will be very slight, and places are selected with a view to comfort and attractiveness. Other localities are being listed as rapidly as possible and will be in the hands of the information bureau so that there will be no difficulty in finding them. The committee should know as soon as possible the number of delegates and visitors.

RAILROAD RATES.

After weeks and even months of effort to secure satisfactory railway rates from the various traffic associations and outside lines, I am able to make what I trust is only a progressive report, my hope being that later on even better rates may be given us. The traffic associations would allow us only the usual excursion rate—one and one-third fare. After numerous and repeated efforts to secure better rates the Chicago & Alton consented to give us one fare. The result is that the official route to Denver and return is via the Chicago & Alton and Union Pacific lines. Rates from Chicago to Denver and return, $35; from Bloomington and St. Louis to Denver and return, $32.50; and the above rates may be used as basing rates, with the understanding that if any other line or combination of lines makes or offers "officially" a less rate we are to have the benefit of the very lowest rates in effect via the official route at the time of departure.

The following lines have agreed to give "one fare" for the round trip to Chicago, Bloomington and St. Louis in connection with above rates: The Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis system; the Monon; Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton; the Ohio & Mississippi; Lake Erie & Western; Toledo, St. Louis & Kansas City; Indianapolis, Decatur & Western; Cincinnati, Hocking Valley & Toledo; Queen Crescent, and others. Eastern roads will give one and one-third rate to Chicago on the certificate plan.

The chances are that the rates from Chicago and St. Louis will be considerably less than those named herein.

The official train will leave Chicago, Tuesday, October 25, 1892, at six p. m. Tickets will be on sale October 20 to 25, inclusive, and good for thirty days returning. The Chicago & Alton Railroad Company deserve the patronage of all delegates, members and others. In selecting a route to Denver please see that your ticket reads via the official route from Chicago, St. Louis and Bloomington, i. e., via the Chicago & Alton and Union Pacific. The tickets should read "to Denver and return." Free chair cars will be provided. You will be able to secure as low a rate by this route as by any other. The promptness of these roads, their natural advantages, and their efforts to give and secure for us low rates, good accommodations and a pleasant excursion have made them well worthy of our patronage.

If lower rates should be secured, due notification of the fact will be made through these columns, and circulars sent direct to state officers.

MARY G. HAY,
Nat. Supt. Railway Rates.

ALMSHOUSE AND ASYLUM WORK.

DEAR CO-WORKERS:—It has been my purpose to write a personal letter to each state superintendent of almhouse work, whether the department has been set apart from the prison and jail work or not. Lest some have not received a special request for their report I take this way of reminding them that I am waiting anxiously for something from each one in regard to what is, or is not being done in this pressing work among the poor. The National Convention is very near at hand. If you have nothing prepared please send a copy of your latest state minutes containing state reports immediately, that I may give each one credit in the National report for the good work done.

PRESS WORK.

To State Superintendents:

It is possible that some state superintendents of the press department have not received the blanks sent by the National superintendent. Will all such please answer at once the following questions:

1. When was your union organized and by whom?
2. When was the press department adopted in your state union?
3. How many local superintendents now?
4. How many temperance papers are published in your state?
5. Are they well supported?
6. How many are owned or controlled by the W. C. T. U.?
7. How many other papers give space under control of the W. C. T. U.?
8. What is the attitude of the general press toward the W. C. T. U.?
9. Do editors give cordial welcome to W. C. T. U. notices, reports, etc.?
10. Name and complete address of present superintendent of press work.

Please forward the replies to

ONCE MORE

We would remind you that preparations are well under way for the production of a daily paper during the forthcoming National Convention, and the plans are more satisfactory than any ever before made. This western convention is to be of engrossing interest. We have received word that Miss Willard has taken passage on the steamship Etruria, which is to sail on October 8 next, and it is hoped that William T. Stead and Lady Henry Somerset will accompany her. In any event, the convention will be another anniversary of the great organization called the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and every member will need to know what takes place.

We are exceedingly anxious that there should be no disappointment anywhere, and appeal to you to do all you can to prevent any. How? Well, by sending in your subscriptions early.

Take Notice.—THE DAILY UNION SIGNAL will be mailed daily from Denver to all subscribers whose orders reach this office on or before October 15. Subscribers whose orders reach this office later than October 15 will receive the five numbers of THE DAILY UNION SIGNAL all in one wrapper, mailed from Chicago after the return from Denver.

We advise you to order NOW. As an added inducement we agree to send a copy of the World's Fair number of The Advance Guard to every subscriber to THE DAILY UNION SIGNAL whose orders for the same are received before the date named—October 15. Price of DAILY UNION SIGNAL for five days named, 25c.

FOR EVERY HOME.

The book recently issued by the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, entitled THE JUNIOR PARTNERS, should be in every home. It is very entertaining and exceedingly instructive. The purpose of the book is to illustrate the dangers that beset business men, and to show the relation between the drink habit and insanity. All who have read the book testify to its merits. It is written with remarkable power.

Dr. Thompson writes: "I am fascinated and uplifted."

A prominent physician writes: "I regard it as a beacon light on the stormy sea of ignorance, intemperance and vice. It bristles with jewels of invaluable truth respecting social relations. Its scientific thought couched in the most fascinating story comes as a glad evangel to suffering humanity."

OUR DAY FOR OCTOBER

Is now ready. It is a number of exceeding value. Besides the Monday lecture by its distinguished editor (who is now delivering the seventeenth annual course in Music Hall, Boston), the subject of which is "Facts and Fancies of the Higher Criticism," this number tells "How Sabbath Closing of the World's Fair Was Secured," by Wilbur F. Crafts. "The Andover Attack on the American Board" is outlined by Cyrus Hamlin. In Vital Points of Expert Opinion, Senator Hoar speaks of the "Great Issues at Stake in the Presidential Campaign of 1892," and Arnold White tells "The Truth About the Salvation Army." "The Failure of Catholic Public Schools" is described by Wayland Hoyt. These and other valuable articles for thinking men and women constitute a number especially desirable.

Cleaning House.

Hard work or easy work, just as you choose. If you find it hard work, it's because you won't use Pearline. You'd rather waste your time and your strength with that absurd rubbing and scrubbing. Of course it's hard—that's why Pearline was invented—that's why Pearline is a household word. You don't know how easy it can be, until you let Pearline do the work. Then house-cleaning slips right along. It is over before you know it.

Send it Back Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, be honest—send it back. 333 JAMES PYLE, N. Y.

DIGGING IN THE SAND.

BY JENNIE A. STEWART.

Playing on the beach,
Such a happy band,
Stirring up the glistening grains—
Digging in the sand.

Barefoot urchins strong,
Healthy every one,
Shouting loud and free,
Joyful as they run.

Now with spade and hoe,
Rapidly they dig,
Building up a pile
Marvelously big.

Circling round they go,
Joining hand to hand,
My, but it is fun
Digging in the sand!

Sun is shining bright
On them as they play,
Not a sign of cloud
Mars the perfect day.

Near the rippling waves,
By cool breezes fanned,
Would not you enjoy
Digging in the sand?

WHITE RIBBON OR GOLD?

BY ESTELLE THOMSON.

CHAPTER II.

(Concluded.)

I have not told you about Dan, yet, have I? Well, Dan was the most splendid fellow. He was tall and strong, a giant, in Ruban's estimation, with a heart like a woman's, and a little house not half so big as Uncle Philander's adobe. But what Dan did not know about grapes was hardly worth knowing. His wine vineyard was the biggest in the county, and some said he was very rich. Perhaps he was, nobody truly knew; at all events he was very queer; but he and Ruban were the best of friends.

Dan was on his way from town, and he had some letters in his hand. One was from the man who held the mortgage. He wanted his money, and if it was not paid now, he wrote that Aunt Natty must move, he could not wait longer. Ruban sighed. The other was from Uncle Philander, and he was harder up than ever, and wanted Dan's influence with Aunt Natty to sell Zephyr, the ranch horse, and send the proceeds to aid him in getting home. The gold was "played out," he confessed, and he was sick and discouraged and homesick, and somebody must help him soon or he would be past wanting help. Dan shook his head as he read, and Ruban burst into tears. Sell Zephyr! Why, he should almost as soon have thought of Uncle Philander's asking them to sell him, or Aunt Natty! But what else could they sell to bring money?

That last stroke was a hard one. Ruban and Aunt Natty both cried when they saw Zephyr led away, the faithful animal turning his head and looking back at them reproachfully, as if he knew he was leaving them for the last time. They cried, too, when they folded the money into the letter and gave it to Dan to post. And Aunt Natty cried, even harder, when after a long time an answering letter came back saying Uncle Philander had had "bad luck," and had to spend so much of the money for "medicine and other things" that he should be obliged to foot it home, after all.

Ruban did not cry then. His boyish heart grew hot and bitter, and some tumultuous spirit seemed tramping up and down beside him, making him think naughty things of a sudden of weak old Uncle Philander.

More and more, after this, Aunt Natty's words about the vineyard came back; and whenever that restless spirit tramped hard and harder, he kept growing more and more bitter—always mainly because of the way he and Aunt Natty were watching and nursing those vines and counting the days until Captain Jack should want their juices for his vats and to run into bottles, to poison some other happy home. Yet it looked to be the only way in which they could save their own possessions now.

Captain Jack rode over one morning to calculate upon the grapes. They would be ready for the presses in three more weeks, he said; and he would take them as they hung and pay three hundred dollars for the crop.

Three hundred dollars! Then they should be free.

"They're holding a monster meeting up at the town," the captain announced, shouting back as he galloped away. "They've come down from the city with their prayin' an' their singin', thinkin' to put a stop to our presses turnin' out wine this year. But they don't know Captain Jack, ha, ha! Captain Jack's presses 'll grind, if they have to grind empty. I'm not the one for 'em to get after, anyhow; I don't grow the grapes."

Now the tumultuous little spirit was fairly raging. Ruban caught his hat and almost flew across the hill to Dan's door. Dan was whittling in the sun.

"I want you to go with me up to the temperance meeting, Dan," Ruban burst upon him. "They're praying and singing up there; and maybe they can pray wine-making out of the town. I don't mean pray out the presses, nor Captain Jack, but us; we are the bad ones. If we didn't grow the grapes, then the presses couldn't turn, and Captain Jack couldn't bottle and sell. I want to be prayed out. It's too late to save Uncle Philander, but it might save somebody."

Dan stopped whittling, and looked up.

"Whew! Rubie, you are a queer one!" he ejaculated.

. . . . . .

That was a marvelous meeting. For nearly a week those temperance workers held the town as in a spell. Perhaps in the entire great wine growing state there never assembled a band of grander men and women, many of whom had felt in their own lives the sting of the drunkard's disgrace.

Ruban was but a lad, but he understood many things with the wisdom of years. He glowed and he trembled by turns. The raging spirit within would not be stilled. He saw Uncle Philander in every speech and song; dear old Uncle Philander, with wavering hand trying still to put back that tempting, wicked, loathsome bottle of destruction. But he was no more strong. Every time he waved it back it came again, nearer and nearer; he could not close his eyes, nor turn his head for an instant; there it was, at his lips—and he drank, and drank, and sank at last into drunken sleep, and forgot all his resolution, forgot everything but "Something to drink! to drink! to drink!" Poor, weak, enslaved old Uncle Philander!

"Oh, the cursed stuff!" some one in the throng cried.

Ruban stood up. His face was white and determined. His body was but a pigmy compared with the giant spirit that controlled it. A young woman was reading the pledge.

"I hereby solemnly promise, God helping me, to abstain from all intoxicating liquors, wines and cider included, and to employ all proper means to discourage the use of the same."

It sounded the most solemn promise that Ruban had ever heard. And whoever signed it was to wear henceforth the little white ribbon with which the promise was sealed—that tiny end that, frail as it was, was part of a band stronger than iron, lengthening day by day and encircling the world. Who would wear it here?

Ruban walked straight to the desk in the face of the multitude. He thought of the home vines purpling on the hills and of the money that was in them. He thought of Uncle Philander and the brown bottle and of Aunt Natty's tears. Something like the sound of the sea seemed to hum in his head. But he took the pen and he wrote his name with a firm hand.

"To employ all proper means to discourage the use of the same."

"I will never let any grapes that I have tended go into wine after this, if I can stop it," he said, facing the curious gaze of the hundreds before him, with eyes shining. "I will try and help keep trouble away from some one else, as I want some one else to help keep it away from Aunt Natty and me."

Such a shout as went up! Cheer upon cheer shook the building. Then one after another pressed forward; name after name was enrolled; the big sheet was filled; another had to be brought to take its place. Dan was among the signers. And now the query arose, if Dan withheld his yield of grapes from Captain Jack, with what would the presses flow? It was a serious question for the wine-makers.

But the climax was capped when Captain Jack himself made a speech. It was glorious! And when he wound up with signing the pledge, boldly, in full sight of everybody, the house shook again.

"And a little child shall lead them," the Captain quoted. "Three cheers for our small hero!"

They were just concluding with a rousing "tiger" and Dan had seized Ruban and swung him up on his shoulder that he might be better seen, when what should the boy's keen eyes discover looming out of the distance and toiling up toward the town-hall door but—Uncle Philander! He was tugging that droll donkey by the string, and the bedquilt strapped across its back was faded and the shovel was rusted and the miner's pan was full of holes. Uncle Philander himself was covered with dust, and his clothes were grimy and his hat was minus a brim. Yet Ruban knew him at the first glance, and that he had returned shiftless and moneyless and disreputable, but his greeting was rapturous.

"Oh, Uncle Philander!" he shouted, almost sobbing. "I'm glad you've come. And it doesn't matter if you haven't brought home any money; we'll save the ranch somehow! We'll save it! If you'll only sign the pledge and go home with me wearing the badge I know Aunt Natty'll think more of that little end of white ribbon than of a bag full of gold!"

Do you think Uncle Philander signed it?

Well, I can only tell you this—they did not have to leave the ranch on account of the mortgage, and the little brown bottle doesn't hide under a ragged coat any more, but wears a white ribbon itself and sits on the mantel like any respectable jug.

San Diego, Cal.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—The long winter evenings are near at hand and our Cozy Corner ought to become more of a resort than ever. Let us get our heads together (for we can get pretty close in this special nook of ours, no matter how far apart we may live), and plan what we shall do during the winter evenings.

A good hint comes in Cousin Mollie's letter below, suggesting a nice game. Do any of you know, or can any one invent an interesting temperance game? What is your favorite game? Answers to these questions will be of interest to all the Cozy Cornerites, and to yours affectionately,

Aunt Jane

COZY CORNER LETTERS.

I have a game to propose to the children in our Cozy Corner. Let us see how many of us can make a good sentence in which each of the words shall begin with a different letter, in the order of the alphabet. For example: "A bold cur dog eats furiously." I think it will be work for some of us, but we can do it if we try hard enough. But I want to propose that when we come to X we shall have leave to omit it, because no common English words begin with that letter. As an initial, that letter is a foreigner. If we can send in some very good sentences, I hope you will find room to print them.

Bangor, Me. COUSIN MOLLIE.

Try this game which Cousin Mollie recommends, children, and tell the Cozy Corner how you like it.

This is the first letter I ever tried to write to a paper. Mamma takes THE UNION SIGNAL and I like our Cozy Corner the very best of all. Sister and I joined the L. T. L. when we were in California, a year ago, and I wear my silver pin with pride. I am ten years old to-day. I have a sister eleven and a little brother seven. He is a very sweet brother and we intend to teach him to do right.

NETTIE O. WOLFLEY.

Wetmore, Kansas.

I hope the little brother will join the L. T. L. too, and help to fight King Alcohol.

We are strictly temperance, and you will think so, too, when we tell you we have never seen any liquor of any kind. Hurrah for temperance!

REBECCA AND MACKIE TUNSTALL.

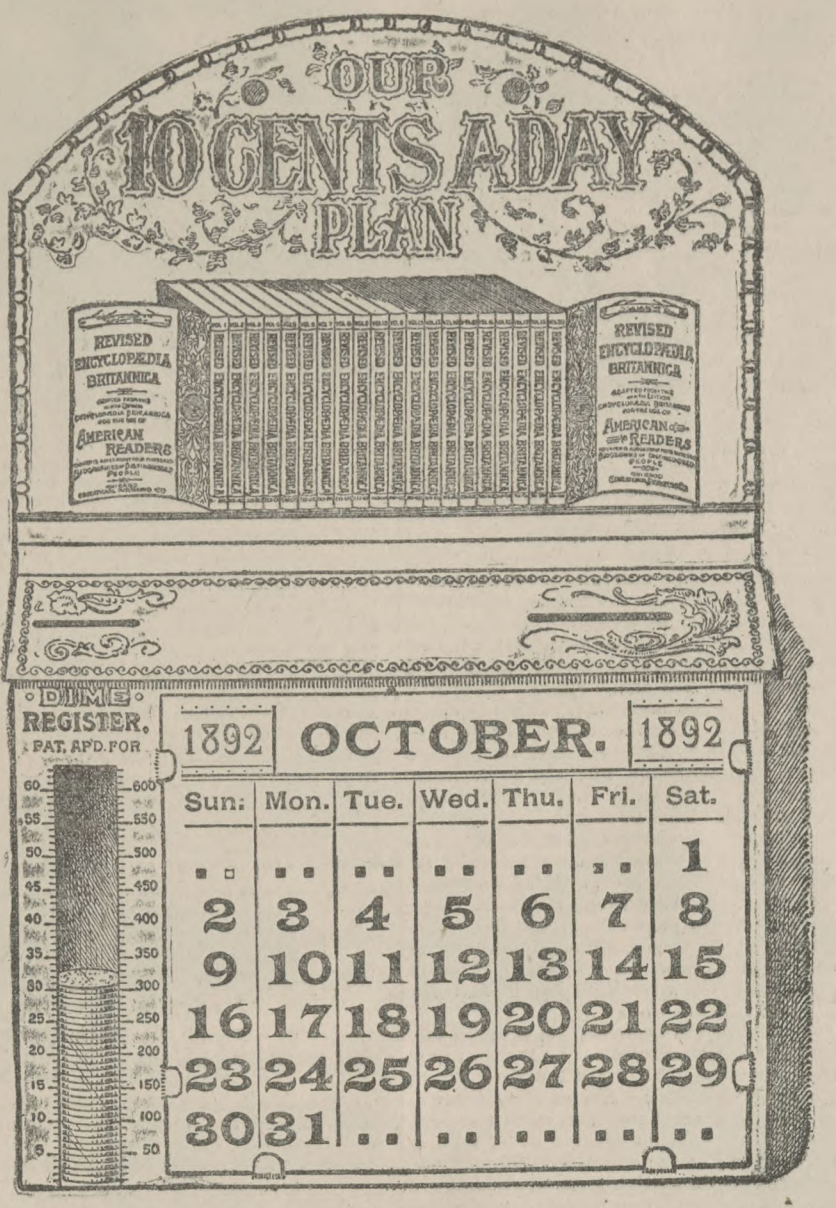
Teach Your Children Economy for the Noblest of Purposes

ECONOMY FOR THE SAKE OF AN EDUCATION.



Charles Dudley Warner once said: The time would come when some inventive genius would enable us to put a dime in the slot and take out a complete education. This is the invention.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN, the martyred President, when about to leave his old home after he had attained the highest honors that a great nation could bestow upon him, closed an address with these words:

"Neighbors, give your boys a chance." These are days of action and exacting competition, days when moral courage and brain power count, days wherein there can be only a survival of the men who are mentally and physically the fittest.

Fathers, qualify your boys for the battle they must wage in the world's great arena, whether their lot be cast in the professions or in the no less honorable field of artisanship and honest toil. Favored though they justly are in the family circle, the day must come when in the inexorable law of fate their chairs will be empty by your fireside, and they will be out struggling alone in the world, with only their merit to aid them.

You, mothers, know the pride you have in your sons. You know that deep down in your hearts there is a well of tenderness and of love for even the erring one. You know, as all the world does, that his success is heaven to you and his failure a heartache keener than even his own. What, then, should you do? In the words of Lincoln, "Give your boy a chance."

Give him an education that will fit him to cope with the best. Teach him to love his home, and teach him that in it he will find civilizing and educational influences. If he has been to college don't let his education stop there. If he has not enjoyed the advantages of a good education, encourage him now. He may be smart naturally, but if he has nothing but his natural talents to help him there will surely come a time, just as he is mounting highest, when this lack of education will handicap him.

The time to remedy this is the present. In the REVISED ENCYCLOPEDIA BRITANNICA now offered by us, you will have a library fully the equal of any in the land. It is a digest of art, science, literature, history and invention, an epitome of all that is good and lasting, a moral drawn from the works of men and nations.

It is now for the first time placed within your reach.

The Trifling Sum of Ten Cents a Day for a Short Period Secures It.

Publisher's Notes.

CONCERNING ADVERTISING.

Occasionally we receive a letter from our readers regarding advertising. The following, clipped from The Golden Rule, so nearly corresponds with our views that we venture to reproduce it. It contains only suggestions of what might be said on this question:

No question, we are confident, perplexes at times the conscientious newspaper publisher more than that of the advertisements which he should admit to his journal. The unthinking subscriber who sees a business notice that offends his taste, or of which for some reason he does not approve, is apt to conclude that a conscienceless money-getting rules the paper. Then he writes a caustic letter, often as rude in tone as it is uncalled for, taking to task the editor and proprietors, who perhaps have not seen the "ad.," for what he is pleased to call a swindle and a fraud and various other hard names. But there are a few facts to which the aforesaid subscriber does not give sufficient weight, which would doubtless modify his wrath, did he appreciate them.

One of these facts is that the publisher and advertising agent exercise far more care than they get credit for; that in many cases they throw out every year thousands of dollars' worth of advertising which they know or fear is unworthy. At least, this is the case with the advertising manager of The Golden Rule, and we doubt not other papers are equally careful. Doubtful cases are investigated, and everything that looks fraudulent is vigilantly excluded. Of course, advertising agents are fallible, and with the closest care they make mistakes at times among the hundreds of advertisements that come under their inspection.

Again, the subscriber does not give sufficient weight to the fact that neither the editor, the publisher, nor the advertising agent can write the advertisements which they publish. Most of these advertisements come in stereotyped plates, and if they are accepted at all they must be accepted as they are printed. So if Mr. Cleanemall avers that his soap is the very best upon the market, the buyer must use his judgment as to the comparative value of Cleanemall's and Scouremup's soap, even if Cleanemall's is advertised in his favorite religious paper.

Once more, the benevolent side of the advertising columns must not be lost sight of. They make possible every religious paper worthy of the name. They enable the editor to pay large prices for contributions; to spread before his readers every week a literary feast of the choicest viands. They pay type-maker and paper-maker, compositor and pressman, and make of every subscriber a beneficiary. However it may be with other papers, the vast majority of subscribers to The Golden Rule pay for their weekly paper scarcely one-half of what it costs. When some of our readers consider these facts, our advertising columns will doubtless be invested with a new interest and importance.

BETTER STILL.

Further correspondence with the Phillips Business College has developed a plan by which we are enabled to make an unparalleled offer to our subscribers. Remember this college is one of the best in the country and makes a specialty of instruction by mail. With this fully in mind, we restate the proposition made before, modified to meet the new arrangements.

First, every young person needs a business education. To properly conduct business correspondence and to keep books correctly will be a help to every homekeeper and be a great help to every officer and member of local unions. So we advise every reader of THE UNION SIGNAL to take this instruction.

What will it cost? The price is now within the reach of all our readers.

If you will comply with the plans here set forth it will cost but little.

The price of home instruction is $5 per month.

The price of THE UNION SIGNAL is $1 per year.

Send one new subscription to THE UNION SIGNAL and we will send an order entitling you to one month's instruction from the Phillips Business College without extra charge.

A letter just received says:

"I am arranging to offer a new one hundred dollar type writer as a prize to the student who shall make the greatest progress during a given time."

Do not delay. Send one new name and $1 without delay and enroll yourself in the home instruction class now being organized. Address,

IN A NEWSPAPER'S LIBRARY.

Journals Want Books Filled Only with Hard, Solid Facts.

Perhaps no library is more carefully selected than the working library of a newspaper. There is no telling what the next hour will bring forth in the world of news, and yet a newspaper must be prepared to accept everything that comes along. Naturally its library contains books for work, not for show or mental diversion.

For that reason the volumes on the shelves are largely books of reference, biography, history, geography, science, arts and statistics. The selection must cover so much ground that any question submitted can either be answered in a few minutes, or after the further searchings suggested by some printed authority in the newspaper library. There is one work, however, that is invaluable to the newspaper man—the Revised Encyclopedia Britannica. No work of reference is handled as often, no other volumes are opened as frequently, and no other product of the publisher's art is valued as highly as that epitome of the world's knowledge—the Revised Encyclopedia Britannica.

Does an "Anxious Subscriber" ask the heights of the twenty mountain peaks which bear the longest names, the editorial hand reaches out for the Britannica and the next morning "Subscriber" is no longer anxious. Does the interrogative "Constant Reader" inquire regarding the population of the cities which claimed to be the birthplaces of Homer, the precious Britannica saves the editorial reputation and seven days' worry through the public library. In the twenty revised volumes of the Encyclopedia Britannica the newspaper man has a library which cannot be equaled, so far as practical work is concerned, by any 3,000 well-selected books.

In short, the Revised Encyclopedia Britannica is so peculiarly adapted for the newspaper office that it is doubtful if any journal in any English-speaking country is without that set of books. This is the work which we are offering our readers for ten cents a day, and the payment lasts for only 90 days. This paper goes on the principle that what is best for itself is good for its friends. It knows and thoroughly appreciates the value of the Britannica, and when it ascertained that it could place the twenty volumes in the hands of its readers for 10 cents a day it gladly put out its famous Encyclopedia proposition. This greatest of all reference libraries, which you may now obtain for $1 down and 10 cents a day, will before long be out of your reach.

To-day you may become the possessor of the twenty volumes in the easiest possible manner; when the offer is withdrawn you will have to buy the books as others do, for none but our subscribers are entitled to the privileges found in the Encyclopedia proposition.

THE WHITE RIBBON HYMNAL.

This book so long promised, is nearly ready, and will be used at the National Convention at Denver. Lady Henry Somerset has sent an order from England for five hundred copies to be forwarded to her as soon as issued. It will be a very popular book as it contains the favorite hymns of so many members of the W. C. T. U., besides new ones of great merit. The fact that it has been compiled by Miss Anna Gordon will in itself be evidence of its merit and destined popularity. It will doubtless be found in every union and the homes of most of the members of the W. C. T. U. To add to its value, a few pages have been devoted to appropriate selections of Scripture for W. C. T. U. meetings. Price per copy, 35c.

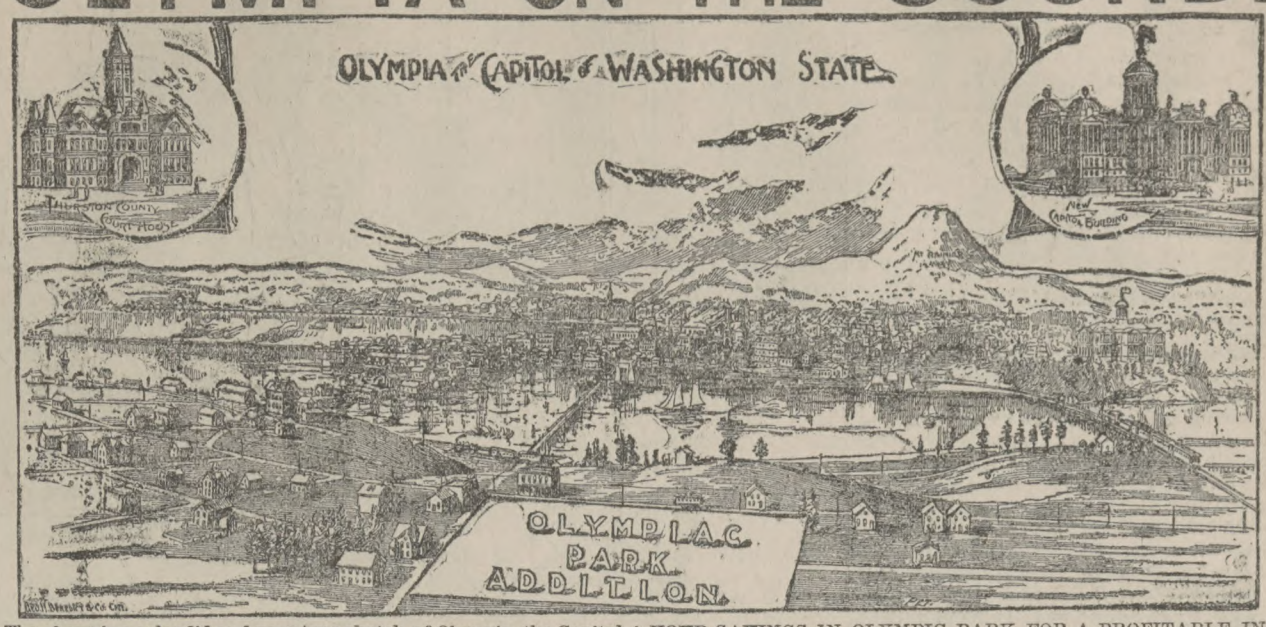
OLYMPIA ON THE SOUND.



The above is a splendid and very true sketch of Olympia, the Capital of the wonderful State of Washington, showing the relative position of Olymyic Park Addition. OLYMPIA is a growing, thriving young city of over 8,000 people, situated at the head of navigation on Puget Sound; possesses unrivaled transportation facilities, both rail and water, resources great and inexhaustable, such as Lumber, Coal, Iron, Tin, Gold, Silver, etc., etc., and abundance of natural advantages; one of the greatest water powers west of the Mississippi River; a harbor second to none in the world, which floats the largest vessels and is headquarters for a great many steamboats. Olympia's population has more than doubled during the past 18 months, and is growing faster and making more substantial improvements according to her population than any other city in America. OLYMPIA has four railroads, besides these the Great Northern and Union Pacific are now actively engaged in building, and will be running trains into Olympia in a few months. MANUFACTURING INDUSTRIES OF ALL KINDS ARE LOCATING AT OLYMPIA. The combination of unlimited resources and great natural advantages, capital and enterprise is pushing Olympia to the front and will keep her there. PUT YOUR SAVINGS IN OLYMPIC PARK FOR A PROFITABLE INVESTMENT. Interest yourself in this great young city, the coming metropolis of the Pacific Coast. It will be safer and more profitable than depositing in a savings bank. Olympic Park is within one mile of the State Capitol building and Post Office. All lots are 25x100 feet. All lay well, not a bad lot in the whole addition. Inside lots are $125 each; corner lots, $150. Terms, $10 cash, balance, $5 per month; or one-third cash, balance in two equal payments running one and two years. Ten per cent. discount for all cash. Deferred payments draw six per cent. interest. Warranty deeds given, title guaranteed. By having lots reserved you will secure better location. Lots ordered by telegraph will be reserved a reasonable time for remittance to reach us by mail. Send us $10 and we will select for you the best lot unsold, we will send you a plat showing the lot selected. If you do not like the lot selected you can exchange for any lot unsold. We will reserve lots 10 days upon payment of a small amount per lot, which amount will apply as part of first payment. Send money by express or P. EDUCATIONAL.

Education Ends Only with Life

It is never too late to do mental work, to grow wiser and better. We are the slaves of phrases. "Finishing an Education" is one of them. Chautauqua urges its members to continued and persevering self improvement. A definite plan of daily home reading is a part of the system. The year 1892–3 will be the American-Greek year. American Diplomatic History, Greek History, Literature and Art, are the subjects. The Columbian Exposition will be fully treated. Address THE CHAUTAUQUA OFFICE, Drawer 194, Buffalo, N. Y.

Signal Notes.

A BEAUTIFUL, useful and romantic life has just ended in England. Shipwrecked while a mere baby, John Macgregor seemed born with a spirit of adventure. He was a great traveler and had fine literary ability. An earnest Christian, he soon discovered a way to help humanity. He spent a great deal of time cruising in his yacht, and always carried boxes of books which he distributed among sailors, dockmen, ferrymen, who, having much leisure time, greedily devoured good books. He was also active in ragged school work.

THE practical working of Christian socialism can be seen in the Brotherhood and Mission of the Carpenter in Boston. The ultimate aim is to develop a Christian and scientific communism. Together with the Wendell Phillips Association a building has been let containing a hall, a workshop, living and bed rooms. Representatives of all creeds and beliefs are found at the meetings. All the labor organizations meet in the hall for public discussions, and have suppers afterwards. The Brotherhood has socials, suppers, Bible classes, etc. It is out of debt and seems to be a success.

JOHN P. QUINN, the converted gambler, has attacked the abomination that blighted his earlier life in a direct and practical way. He talks to young men and warns them of the ruin sure to come to them if they waste themselves upon the withering, blighting curse that well-nigh ruined him. His lectures before young men are spoken of in the highest terms by the leading pastors and editors of religious and philanthropic papers. For this reason we call attention to his work and hope the local unions will send for him to speak before the boys and young men in as many towns and villages as practicable. Address him care of O. S. Palmer, 114 Nassau street, New York.

MASKS AND FACES.

The use of grease-paint by actors and actresses is disastrous to the complexion, and unless thoroughly removed from the pores of the skin, pimples and blotches appear. Eminent members of the profession say, IVORY SOAP removes paint thoroughly and quickly, and restores the complexion to its natural freshness.

THE WOMAN'S LAND SYNDICATE.

The Third and last series of Bonds is now offered for sale at par, $10 per Bond. As soon as they are all sold, which will be very soon, we will begin selling our 2,000 lots, on which the Bonds are issued, and redeeming the Bonds, and the ENORMOUS PROFITS will also be divided among the Bond owners. We purchased our lots last April at an average cost of $250.00 per lot; since that time enormous manufacturing enterprises have almost surrounded our property, which has increased its value to such an extent that we believe we could sell out now for $1,000,000, which would be 100 per cent profit.

FACTORIES NOW LOCATED AT SOUTH WAUKEGAN

Warrant a population of 50,000. When this number is reached our lots will be worth about $4,000,000 (based on values in other towns of this size), and each $10 Bond will then be worth about $80

The Following are Opinions of People Whose Opinions are Worth Knowing:

Mr. JAMES B. HOBBS, President of the Commercial Loan and Trust Company, Chicago, says:
"The property is particularly well located, and is among the most desirable around Chicago."

FRANK P. CRANDON, Gen'l Tax Commissioner of Chicago & Northwestern R'y, says:
"It has come to be recognized as the place which shall establish a large manufacturing interest."

Dr. E. S. LENOX, Director of the Washburn & Moen Mfg. Co., says:
"Here are cheap fuel, quick transportation of goods, the lowest freight rates to all parts of the country, with all the surroundings that add to the charms of a home."

Miss ESTHER PUGH, Chicago, says:
"This is just the beginning that we see, of the great enterprise, of the great city that is to come here."

Gen. SINGLETON, President Total Abstinence Life Association, says:
"I have advised my wife to invest in the Bonds of the Woman's Land Syndicate, believing that investments in South Waukegan will be very profitable."

Mrs. CAROLINE B. BUELL, says: Chicago.
"To my mind the close proximity of the lake adds one-half to its value. With its many fine advantages it should soon grow to be a large city."

Mrs. F. B. RASTALL, Chicago, says:
"South Waukegan is beautifully located, and destined to grow rapidly."

CHICAGO EVENING POST:
"It is quite safe to say that in this new town there will be 50,000 people in the next five years."

CHICAGO ECONOMIST:
"When the factories now located in South Waukegan are in full operation, the total number of hands employed in the new mills will not be far from 10,000."

WESTERN BANKER, Chicago.
"South Waukegan has long since passed the point of experiment, and its future stands assured."

Volume XVIII. CHICAGO, October 13, 1892. Number 41

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Mr. Robert Lincoln, American Minister to England, has sailed for home.

Many ministers preached last Sunday on "Tennyson as a Christian poet."

The shaft for the Columbus monument in New York City was raised on Saturday.

Moody, the evangelist, began a series of meetings at Spurgeon's tabernacle in London, last Sunday.

Festivities connected with the Columbian celebration, participated in by resident Americans, are taking place in Spain this week.

October 9 was "Columbus Sunday" in New York, the theme of all the preachers being that of patriotism, in view of the coming Exposition.

Lady Frederick Cavendish startled the public by her speech before the National Congress of the Church of England in London last week denouncing the use of tobacco and alcoholic beverages by society women.

Mrs. President Harrison's condition has not continued to improve during the past week and the President has been obliged to cancel several public engagements, including the World's Fair dedication ceremonies at Chicago, October 21.

Lord Tennyson, the Poet Laureate of England, died October 6, at his home, Aldworth, near Haslemere, England. His body will be placed in Westminster Abbey, by the side of Browning and directly under the bust of Longfellow, a place that has long been reserved for him.

The sixty-second semi-annual conference of the Mormon church closed its sessions at Salt Lake City on Saturday. There was an attendance of 15,000 men, representing a membership of 200,000. It was decided to dedicate the new temple, begun forty years ago, on April 6, 1893. It has cost $2,500,000.

EVERYTHING points to a magnificent Convention at Denver. Our National President will return to us renewed in health and spirits as we all hope and pray. Anna Gordon will have some new things to tell us concerning the World's work among the children. There will be no end of first-class speaking. The music will maintain the high reputation gained at the Boston Convention; Mrs. Harris, our prima donna, will be with us and we shall have Miss Gordon's new White Ribbon Hymnal from which to sing.

ALL who expect to leave Chicago, Bloomington, St. Louis or Kansas City for the National Convention at Denver via Chicago & Alton R. R., either Monday, October 24, or Tuesday, October 25, and who want sleeping car accommodations, should make early application. Address, Mr. R. Somerville, City P. & T. A., Chicago & Alton R. R., 195 Clark St., Chicago, stating date and hour and also exact accommodation required, whether double berth for one or for two, upper or lower, and giving name. Space will be reserved in order of application.

THE DAILY UNION SIGNAL to be issued during the National Convention at Denver, October 28 to November 3, will be an evening instead of a morning paper. This will enable the delegates to secure their paper at the adjournment of the afternoon session and read a full report of the sessions of the previous afternoon and evening and also of the morning's session up to the noontide hour of prayer. Many new features will be added to the paper, and all the good ones of the past retained. An experienced woman stenographer has been engaged, and, with a full corps of assistants, will produce an exact account of the day's proceedings, with all the impromptu wit and wisdom that invariably grace these annual gatherings. No white-ribboner, whether she be stay-at-home or a fortunate delegate, should neglect subscribing for the DAILY.

THE speech of Mr. John Sherman, outlining his views on the money question, is one of the remarkable things of the day. His high position as an authority on finance gives uncommon weight to his announcements. A general extension of this address would do much to deepen the slumber of the voters, for they would feel that the money question was settled; and as the tariff question should be determined as to details, by experts, there is very little left to contend for as between the two old parties, indeed, as between all parties outside of the Prohibitionists.

A LETTER from Miss West bearing date of September 13 announces her safe arrival in Yokohama the night previous. The voyage was made in twelve days from Vancouver, and was unusually pleasant and free from seasickness. A few sentences from her letter will interest her many friends. "The doubts which so troubled me about coming here have all vanished. The Japanese are overwhelming me with attentions. To-night they give me a reception and dinner, after which I go to Union church for speeches, etc. I am to make my first attempt at speaking through an interpreter; wish it might be at a less formidable occasion. To-morrow I start for Sapporo, on the island of Yeddo."

As has been publicly announced through the associated press, Lady Henry Somerset will be at the Denver Convention and is now on the ocean in company with Misses Willard and Gordon. Although burdened with a legion of cares—social, official and personal—she has consented to return for a brief time to the country she has learned to love—which gave her such a warm welcome one year ago and parted with her so reluctantly only six months since. Lady Henry takes this long journey of six thousand miles at Miss Willard's earnest request, solely to be present at the National Convention, and we are certain that this mere announcement will kindle the enthusiasm of our women and insure an immense gathering at Denver.

BY Lady Henry Somerset's request, Miss Florence Balgarnie met Mr. and Mrs. John G. Woolley on their arrival in Liverpool, September 20th. Although they had never met they recognized each other immediately for as Miss Balgarnie writes: "I at once saw Mrs. Woolley's bit of ribbon white gleaming through the fog of a Liverpool morning. I felt ashamed that Americans should land on our shores in the midst of such depressing weather, but as the day wore on it became a little brighter and the faces of the Woolleys were at any rate full of sunshine." They went at once to Reigate, Lady Henry's home near London, and will soon be at Ledbury and Eastnor Castle. Their thoughtful hostess desired them to have first of all a week of perfect rest and quiet in the midst of the fragrant gardens and great oak groves of the famous Priory.

THE W. C. T. U. of the District of Columbia won historic record in securing the prohibition of the sale of liquors on government grounds during the recent G. A. R. Encampment. Discovering that large racks for lager beer kegs were being erected near the White House, they appealed by telegram to President Harrison at Loon Lake, that he should save the nation from this disgrace. The President ordered through Col. Ernst, superintendent of public buildings and grounds, that the police should prevent the sale of liquors. White-ribboners thank God and the President that this prohibition of beer barracks on government grounds helped to make the last great encampment more sober and decorous than any preceding one. The District W. C. T. U. tendered a reception at Hotel Fredonia, to the National Woman's Relief Corps, and other patriotic women's organizations. Choice decorations, speeches, and hearty good-will made this cold water hospitality one of the most delightful occasions of the great reunion, and enrolled women and high principle among the nation's defenders.

AS NEAR as we can find the Prohibitionists are the most energetic if not the most enthusiastic campaigners of all the parties. Hundreds of meetings are held, literature distributed, pledges taken and appeals to the judgment and conscience of good men made. So far as votes have been cast they are encouraging. Maine and Vermont show large gains, so also Arkansas. In Florida and Georgia we have no organization and shall hear of no vote till November 8. In the struggle of conflicting parties it is not difficult to trace the fine working hand of the saloon interest. Poor Mr. Cleveland coming down from Buzzard's Bay to make his peace with "Tammany," that is, the "saloon," reminds us of Henry IV. standing in the snow barefoot at Canossa.

PRIZE essays among physicians are uncommon, hence we are delighted to notice that the American Medical Temperance Association has offered two prizes of one hundred dollars each, one on "The physical action of alcohol, based on original research and experiment," and the other on "The non-alcoholic treatment of disease." These essays must be sent to the secretary of the committee, Dr. Crothers, Hartford, Conn., on or before May 1, 1893. They should be in type-writing, with the author's name in a sealed envelope, with motto to distinguish it. The report of the committee will be announced at the annual meeting of the Association at Milwaukee, Wis., in June, 1893, and the successful essays read. These essays will be the property of the association, and will be published at the discretion of the committee.

FIVE thousand people crowded the auditorium in Chicago on the evening of October 7, and a choir of eight hundred voices, with speeches from various prominent friends of Sabbath observance, was enabled to utter the enthusiasm of the vast assembly in its ratification of what Congress has done for the American Sabbath by closing the gates of the Columbian Exposition on Sunday. Col. Elliot F. Shepard, president of the American Sabbath Union, presided and gave an address. Joseph Cook, the world-wide advocate of righteousness, captured every one with his unmatched eloquence. Resolutions of the most timely and conclusive kind were presented by Dr. Herrick Johnson, of this city, and passed by the audience with prolonged cheers for Congress and the President. The conclusion of the resolutions was as follows: "And finally, we do hereby denounce as false the statement so widely spread through the land that the saloon has joined hands with churches in demanding that the Exposition gates be kept closed on Sunday. We would have all law abiding and order-loving citizens of our country understand that a painstaking canvass of Chicago saloons has proved that they are overwhelmingly in favor of a wide open Fair on Sunday, and in further proof we cite the fact that petitions asking Congress to reverse its action have been openly placarded in these saloons—these petitions declaring that the signers want an open Fair on Sunday, because to close the gates would throw upon the city of Chicago several hundred thousands of visitors each Sunday, who would crowd every brothel, saloon, and place of evil resort in this city. The saloons are thus praying for Congress to repeal a law which they claim, if enforced, would crowd the saloons with patrons. That is to say, the grog-shops don't want business on Sunday; Satan has at last gone into the business of casting out Satan, and the devil is ready for suicide. We do also hold that the closing of the World's Fair gates on Sunday is necessary for the protection of Chicago from the flood of drunken and lawless characters which with open gates would be poured into the city by excursion trains and otherwise from all points of the compass for five hundred miles, every Sunday during the season." The quality of the audience was remarkable in the highest degree. Hundreds of preachers, teachers, and other educated men and women were present. The immense hall was packed to the roof, and the assembly was unanimous in purpose and courage.

W. C. T. U. CONVENTION—1892.

"Beyond the Mississippi,"
And Missouri's muddy flow,
Across the Kansas prairies
Where western breezes blow—
High up among the mountains
With shadows deep and still,
Where scenes of God are shifted
By magic of His will—

Where song birds catch the music
Of worlds beyond the sun,
Where canyon grand doth whisper
Of work supremely done—
Not at the foot-hills pausing
But on to heights above,
See eager hosts are moving
With messages of love.

There under royal cover
Of blue and golden sheen,
Of clouds spun out of heaven
And shining stars between—
There pause our weary pilgrims
Coming from every land—
The sunset bids them welcome—
Our great white-ribbon band.
There rest in Autumn splendor,
And drink the sweetness in,
So every glad to-morrow
A new life will begin.

"Westward the star of Empire"
Moves with her banner bright;
In its warp we proudly weave
A band of ribbon white.
"God and Home and All the World"—
Columbia's glad new song—
And echoes from the mountains
The joyous notes prolong.

SOME PASSAGES IN THE PRACTICE OF DR. MARTHA SCARBOROUGH.*

BY HELEN CAMPBELL.

CHAPTER IX.

A momentary astonishment had flitted over Miss Prissy's impassive features as she followed Dr. Scarborough into the room where the new patient lay, but she spoke no word, and the doctor smiled as he turned and left her there.

"I wonder if there is another woman in Linborough who would have taken such a knockdown as that without winking. She knows what his being here means, but she will never tell. I wish I could find her mate anywhere," and with low mutterings of his experience with those who were not mates, he had made his way out.

Miss Prissy sat down and folded her hands, a look of pity on her face as she watched the worn face on the pillow.

"I've been certain there was something for a long spell, and I've said opium to myself more than once," she thought, "but this is a worse job even than that. Thank goodness he's in safe hands and can come out of it with nobody the wiser but himself," and with a final nod Miss Prissy took out her knitting and proceeded to turn a heel in a winter sock for the doctor. Soon the heavy sleep into which the patient had fallen almost at once gave place to tossing and restless mutterings, breaking shortly into audible words.

"Kitty; I want my little Kitty," he repeated, his hand seeming to seek another. Miss Prissy put out her own, a bony, toil hardened member, most efficient in service, but not of the order whose touch carried any soothing beyond the sense of strength and good-will, and his restless fingers still reached for something not near.

"It's the little girl that died, I do believe," Miss Prissy thought. "I'd better call in Dr. Martha. She's got a way with her even if she ain't but ten," and rising she stole from the room returning presently with the child, who yielded instantly as the hot hand clutched her cool little fingers and closed about them, climbing presently to the bed and sitting there quietly, pushing back the heavy hair that as he moved fell over the high forehead, and studying the pain-lined face considerately.

"What goes through that creature's head, the land only knows," Miss Prissy mused, her eyes roving from one to the other; "whatever it is, she senses things older folks don't even begin to think about, and she'll do him as much good as forty nurses and double that of doctors. Doctors are small account, anyhow, unless they're like this one, and go to the roots of things, which most of them don't do more'n once in a hundred years. Book knowledge won't do it. It's seeing to the bottom of a man's mind, and I'd give considerable once in a way, to know how this man, close as an oyster, happens to be just here. What's good for you to know you'll know, Priscilla, and you look out not to spend any more time wondering about what ain't your business unless it's made to be. Bless the child! She might as well have kept on with her father as run back for this."

Dr. Martha's head had nodded once or twice, then sunk gently toward the pillow, and with her hand still firmly held, she fell asleep, her fair little face in strange contrast with the troubled one beside her.

"I won't stir her," Miss Prissy thought. "She's enough to keep off a whole grist of devils, and he looks as if he hadn't seen much else for a considerable time. There's the other one now. This feels something like, but how it will all turn out I wouldn't be the one to have to say. Young and good looking, and not any sort we get up here," she added, after a prolonged look from the window to the main door, where for a moment the two men who stood there had turned and looked about them. "They're both about of an age, and which is doctor and which is 'case' I can't tell, and 'tain't any great matter if I can't;" with which final summary of the situation, she once more took her place by the bed.

"What goes on inside I don't pretend to say," old Potter remarked in the store a fortnight after the arrival of the new doctor with the five other additions, as to which the village was still in entire doubt whether they were patients, nurses, students or guests. "Fur as I kin see, there ain't any doctorin' goin' on, an' it might as well be just a tavern an' done with it. Maybe 'tis, an' Scarborough's goin' to make some money that way. Things goes on just like any other house, an' you ain't goin' to make me believe one o' them fellers is as bad off as folks ought to be that have to come to live with a doctor."

Dr. Scarborough himself would have rejoiced had he heard this verdict, his chief thought being to prevent every gossip in town from getting hold of even the smallest scrap of detail concerning his cases either inside or out of the house. Concerning Mr. Prescott, there was much speculation, ending in the conclusion that he had gone there to please his wife, who was, as Potter reported, "a scary little woman, an' certain all the Prescotts were bound to have cancer."

John Sterling, the young physician who had come to him on Dr. Byington's recommendation, and who had left behind him the memory of two years of not only faithful but brilliant work in the hospital to which he had been attached, had chosen this phase of labor as the one in which he was most needed, and to which he was most strongly drawn. Devotion was his birthright, since he was the son of a father who had died from the effects of blood-poisoning, received in a post-mortem, of exceptional difficulty and danger. He had long taken Dr. Scarborough's ground, believing inebriety to be often a disease, always capable of cure if the patient's coöperation could be secured, and he brought with him two cases in which he had long been interested and which thus far defied any treatment he had been able to bring to bear. Familiar with every form of hysteria and with as curious and abnormal phases of cravings in insanity and idiocy, he knew that disease underlay them all. The morbid appetite which in one case demanded liquor, he had seen in others, as in that strange disease known to medicine as polyphagia, an equally strong craving for inordinate quantities of food, and often for disgusting forms, as spoiled meat, candles, etc. "A morbid uneasiness at the stomach," the symptom most often specified by inebriates, governed alike in all these cases, and in all under his own observation, had been modified or in greater or less degree eradicated by treatment in which food had been made to do the work of medicine. Not till now, however, had it been possible to be certain that orders were fully obeyed, or what the real habits were, and in each case it was soon plain that violation was not only constant, but often involuntary.

"You'll have a case of starvation on your hands if you take away my mainstay," young Marston said, after a talk in which Dr. Scarborough had repeated to him the injunctions already laid upon him by the younger man. "You don't realize, doctor, that it's a natural craving. I've had it from my boyhood, and to make sure of never being without, I have this little silver affair for my vest pocket, and keep it filled with the purest cayenne I can find. I've always been told it was the only wholesome pepper. My father used it precisely as I do."

"And transmitted the same morbid tendency to you. Where did he acquire the habit?"

"In the East Indies. He lived in Calcutta for many years. I was born there." Dr. Scarborough nodded.

"One more then, added to my list of illustrative cases. The difficulty with either English or Americans in India, and we are practically the same stock, is that neither pay the slightest attention to the native theories of diet, which nature determines for them. Both demand heavy food, meat three times a day, and at the usual course dinner, often three or four kinds at one meal, in entrées, croquettes, and all the other inventions for tickling appetite. The climate in itself weakens the action of the liver, which is stimulated by cayenne, and some of the other things that make up curry, chutney, and the usual East India sauces. The native uses them as he uses everything else, in moderation. The European piles them in till he has literally burned out and dried up liver and all mucous membrane all the way down. These dried up livers make a disease by themselves. I'll show you some cuts of them after dinner. You are pledged to obey orders, you know. Remember that first among these in the matter of food, is no condiments, save a little salt, till permission is given. Rest and soothing are vital matters. Except for this troublesome point, are you content?"

"Absolutely," the young man said. "For the first time in three years I have hope and a breath of fresh courage. We are not supposed to know anything about each other as cases, Doctor, but I have a fancy that that unhappy Prescott is in the same box as myself. I have been tempted to let him know, somehow, that he isn't alone. I used to think, you know, that nobody ever had a case like mine, and to know I am only one of a crowd has seemed to make it easier. Do you think he would stand it if I spoke some day when I saw a good chance? I should not have thought of it," he added as Dr. Scarborough's heavy eyebrows came together, and he looked down thoughtfully, "but 'Dr Martha' is responsible for that and one or two other things. I heard her with Prescott, who seems to hold on to her whenever he can get hold of her—a case of eaves dropping, since I was behind a tree and did not move when they sat down on a bench close by. What problem they had been discussing I do not know, for she has a mind as venerable as the High Priest Melchisedec's, but he said: 'There are some sins that cannot be forgiven, little one;' and she answered, 'But that can't be, you know, because my father says that sin is very useful. I mean if you do a sin, it is bad, of course, though it may have been just a mistake, but the use is, you know how somebody else feels that has done the same thing, and so you can be more sorry for them because you know just how they feel, and that helps them and helps you too, if you tell them, or are good to them somehow, and that's the real use of a sin.' Perhaps the use of mine will be to tell Prescott."

A knock at the door ended the talk. Dr. Scarborough had smiled as his own words came back to him modified by the childish rendering, and he said as he passed out,

"The best thing to be done, perhaps, Marston. Bide your time and you will know when it has come for both of you."

DEDICATION DOINGS.

BY B. V. CUSHMAN, M. D.

BEFORE.

The initial event will be a grand reception tendered to the shade of Christopher Columbus, the representatives of foreign governments, the President and Vice President of the United States, and governors of the respective commonwealths of this great nation, with their attaches. In all, about fifteen hundred guests, non-residents of the city, will be invited by complimentary ticket. The composite host is made up of prominent Chicagoans, who gain a share of the honor of entertaining by paying twenty-five dollars per couple. Their number is necessarily limited on account of the large attendance of guests.

The scene of this glittering function is laid in the Auditorium. Its management is in the skilled hands of Gen. Nelson A. Miles, Mayor Washburn and Messrs. Fairbank, George Pullman and Marshall Field. These names are sufficient guarantee that the honors of the Fair City will be well performed. Mrs. Palmer and other prominent ladies are to assist the reception committee. The third floor of the Studebaker building, to be connected with the Auditorium by temporary corridors, will be used as a supper room. Undoubtedly this reception will be the most brilliant event in Chicago's social history.

Interest centers, however, in the public ceremonies to be held upon the grounds, where one hundred and twenty-five thousand persons will gather, under one roof to listen to America's greatest orators and hear the singing of four thousand voices. Half this mighty chorus will roll up from the throats of children. It will be the red letter day of Prof. Tomlins' life as a musical director. Several members of this ponderous choir have told me that during the earlier months of drill, little attention was paid to technique of execution, but the sentiment of the song was deeply studied and they were commanded to feel all that is expressed in word and tone.

Besides the Dedicatory Ode and Columbian March, composed for the occasion, the program has: "To the Sons of Art," by Mendelssohn, Handel's "Hallelujah Chorus," "The Heavens are Telling," by Haydn, Beethoven's "Praise of God," and these songs of our very own, attuned to every patriotic ear and voice, "The Star Spangled Banner" and "My Country, 'tis of Thee."

It was thought at first that one thousand five hundred voices would be enough, but it was found that four thousand will scarcely fill the great dome of the Manufacturers' Building, whose foundations cover forty acres. Beside the singers, an orchestra of two hundred pieces and two military bands—Sousa's massing the best musical talent of its order in America—will occupy the great stand in the mammoth concert hall.

Nothing concerns us more than the Dedicatory Ode, written by Miss Harriet Monroe, of this city, and "introduced as a tribute to woman's work." An effort was made to eliminate this number from the program upon the ground that the exercises would be too long; but the gallant council of administration declined to sacrifice the Ode or to so "cut" it as to spoil its effect. Some sections are to be given by recitation and others by the chorus. There is a strife for the honor of rendering the recital portions, and the reader has not been chosen, but will probably be a lady, if one is found whose vocal power is sufficient. A further recognition of women is the ten minutes of program time given to the lady managers. Mr. George V. Massey was requested to represent the ladies, as no woman's voice could reach so great an audience. Mr. Massey wisely thinks that the people would rather see Mrs. Palmer than to hear him. She will probably occupy the time allotted.

The elect divines to invoke Heaven's blessing are, Bishop Fowler at the opening and Bishop Ireland or Cardinal Gibbons at the close, while Dr. McCook, of Philadelphia, will dismiss with benediction the greatest audience over which priestly hands were ever extended between American shores.

There will be addresses by the Director-General and Mayor Washburne, then yards upon yards of red tape finally get the buildings before the President of the United States in attitude for dedication, which ceremony the Chief Magistrate will then perform. God comfort him! How hollow all this world's pomp will be to him when his lips pronounce words without meaning, while his heart cries out its breaking grief in the hushed chamber of his home! There is no partisanship in the prayers that rise for him and her from the family altars of a sympathizing people.

The dedicatory oration, as all the world knows, is assigned Hon. William C. Breckenridge, from the land of Henry Clay, while to "our"—everybody's—Chauncey M. Depew, Henry Clay the second, is committed the delivery of the "Columbian oration."

Another feature, of which I have great joy in writing, is the presentation of commemorative medals to the master builders of these marvelous palaces of plaster. I wish that a medal might be given to every man who has done an honest day's work with shovel or pick in Jackson Park. One of my friends—as little likely as myself to do it, because of impecuniosity—has entered into an agreement with me that if either of us should ever build a house, we will upon its completion make a feast and invite every one who has in any way contributed to the finished structure. Finally, after all the speech and song and prayer comes the outbursting boom of guns, the national salute.

How secure unto thyself 1–125,000th of that precious forty acres upon which this stirring scene shall be enacted, my captivated reader? Ah! verily there's the rub—not figurative will it be for those who gain entrance. Hast a friend at court? Elsewhile thy chance is small.

Admission is only by ticket, and the tickets are not for sale, but free—oh, mockery! In the form of invitations they are apportioned among the directorate, the lady managers and the stockholders, to be given away, and these find they have hosts of friends of whom they never before dreamed.

But enough to charm and repay the luckless visitor without a ticket, will be "free as all out of doors." The fireworks will equal a hundred Fourth of Julys on the public square. All the set pieces, requiring special framework, have been stricken from the program and the entire display will take place in the air. A flock of twelve balloons rise simultaneously, the leader, sixty feet in diameter, carrying "the largest amount of chemical fireworks ever discharged at one time." There is to be an aquatic display upon the lake and lagoon, where sea-serpents, mermaids and other mystic monsters of the deep will appear in weird procession. Submarine bombs light the waters afar, and a ton of Greek fire in various colors, set off at once, will make an illumination visible for many miles. The gem of the pyrotechnic display will be the American flag emblazoned on the sky in fire. It must clip the wing of Yankee pride of invention to know that this magnificent piece was perfected in a London factory for this occasion.

A grand procession forming on Michigan avenue will follow a line of march to be devised by General Miles, and enter the park at the Fifty-seventh street entrance. Decorations worthy of Chicago's boasted best will bedeck public buildings and private residences.

If this is Christopher Columbus' first return to the land he discovered, he will be lost in surprise at the changes wrought in four hundred short years since he set his foot upon the trailing robe of this great continent, and left there the mark of the cross. At last the patient voyager realizes the fulfillment of his youthful hope and dying faith. This is the fabulous kingdom of Khubla Khan, and here, by the inland sea, is the golden city of Cathay! May he and his heroic crew have part in the great procession!

WHAT NEXT?

OPINIONS OF STATE W. C. T. U. PRESIDENTS.

"What next" is to go right on and work more earnestly in the methods we now have. SARAH H. BLACK, President Idaho W. C. T. U.

Let us concentrate our forces on the lines of work that have proven most effective in the cause. In thus focusing our efforts more good will be done than in taking up new departments of work. JANE STAPLER, President Indian Territory W. C. T. U.

The great work lies in converting the thousands of unorganized women to our way of thinking. When this is done, the men will all be convinced, for as are the women so are the men of any country. Let us trust God and do our duty. R. H. JONES,
President Virginia W. C. T. U.

Agitate our subjects from all points of view, as in the past twenty years; work for woman suffrage and we can then have national, state and local prohibition which even the millions of money in the hands of the liquor power cannot nullify. N. P. J. BUTTON,
President South California W. C. T. U.

What next? We must work along the lines of the greatest resistance; this means stronger faith, deeper consecration and greater persistence. We who stand on Wisconsin's fierce battle-ground feel that if any one line ought to be specialized it is the juvenile work. If we would have votes for prohibition we must educate the voters. VIE H. CAMPBELL,
President Wisconsin W. C. T. U.

Let us go steadily forward on every line of work so wisely and providentially planned, in by-gone years, by our beloved W. C. T. U. Our women have builded better than they knew! Let us work for woman's emancipation, though it be by a great price that we obtain this freedom! God and eternal justice are for us, who shall prevail against us? SARAH D. LAFETRA, President District of Columbia W. C. T. U.

Prohibition by politics is the only sure way to forever annihilate the saloon. While waiting for Christian men to make up their minds to leave either of the old parties and to cast their lot with the only one that promises any protection for the home, one of the best things the W. C. T. U. can do is to make a specialty of our franchise department. JENNIE P. SISSON,
President W. Va. W. C. T. U.

What next? The Christian's VOTE. If frail and timid women could go into the saloons in 1873–4 to plead with wicked men to abandon drunkard-making, may not their daughters go into the stores and shops and homes and pulpits to carry forward a holy crusade for the Christian vote of the nation? Oh, that the spirit of Caleb and Joshua may fall upon our sisters at Denver—enabling them by faith to say, "We will go up and possess the promised land."

AMANDA STRONG,
President East Washington W. C. T. U.

It seems to me that we are becoming so methodical in our ways that the spontaneous efforts we used to make are seldom seen. Before us lies the danger of having the letter kill the spirit. May we not call a halt and institute a general consecration service, and if possible regain the heroic standpoint once occupied in regard to political prohibition? I find that we are lacking in enthusiasm often because we are so in earnest about details. I do not mean to criticise in any way, but I have conferred with others who dread the same thing. I believe there is a general feeling that we need a turning of all our faces and our energies toward the banishment of the saloon, unmindful of any minor issues. Internal dissensions will be obliterated in the unity of purpose in a gigantic struggle. JOSEPHINE R. NICHOLS
President Indiana W. C. T. U.

What next? I hoped this year would record the rout of both old parties. I am much confused that there was not "a fusion" and cannot tell what next. It is time things were gone to pieces. So large a per cent of the farmers are Prohibitionists there seems much to hope. There should be a change in the law such as will compel liquor men to vote their business in if the saloon exists, and every one should faithfully work to make prohibition sentiment. MARY C. WOODY,
President N. Carolina W. C. T. U.

The next National Convention should inaugurate a movement to secure the attention of the average woman She should be taught her responsibility to the nation as well as to the home. In many quiet ways she can work a great revolution but she should be armed with an extermi nator, as well as a lotion. She should see that the pastor of her church is in sympathy with the "woman's move ment;" the universal ministry should look upon the sisters as fellow-helpers to the truth. E. A. HILL,
President Florida W. C. T. U.

The great need of the present time is wise and careful women to go among the people and explain our work more fully, for when it is set before them in all its amplification, and the good shown which follows where our de partments are well conducted, the people are won. Organizing work could be carried on everywhere if we had more means and the speakers did not cost so much. More workers at less cost and work more thoroughly done is the need. Many unions die before they have even breathed.
MARY A. HITCHCOCK,
President Nebraska W. C. T. U.

The average man wishes more than anything else to be on the winning side. He would rather vote against his convictions than not to toss his hat for the candidate of his choice when the returns come in. He abhors "throwing away his vote." To arouse this man from the "apathy of guilt" is the next thing. Much is being done by the mag nificent cannonading of the platform speaker, but I be lieve the real work lies with the picket-line and sharpshooters, the work of individuals upon individuals, each singling out a man. HELEN M. STODDARD,
President Texas W. C. T. U.

Nothing now is of so much importance as that God's church shall reorganize according to His plans. He gave the redemption of the world into the hands of men and women as the agents of the Holy Spirit. The church is organized by and for only one of its factors; its noblest purposes are crippled while this is the case. Eight millions of women, voiceless in the church, represent an enormous latent force which the world needs to carry out God's plans. The "Next Thing" is to influence each her own church to be just and generous to woman.
S. F. GRUBB,
President Kansas W. C. T. U.

At the National Convention in Denver let one of our most capable women present, from the platform, a course of study demonstrating the points most needful for effective legislative work. Let leaflets be compiled for use in local unions, containing the best laws relating to women and children, to temperance and education. Home women have little opportunity to search huge volumes. Each state union should provide a leaflet embodying existing statutes of its own commonwealth. Unceasing legislation is the sure hope for "the cause that lacks assistance, 'gainst the wrong that needs resistance." EVA HIGGINS, President Colorado W. C. T. U.

The "What next" that would mean a great deal, would be for each white-ribboner to "tell the story" of the W. C. T. U. so far as she knows it. In this way thousands of women might be won for our precious cause, who now are ignorant almost of the existence of our society. The important thing is to get women to thinking upon the great question—it is "want of thought more than want of heart" that works so much evil. After all, the outlook is very hopeful. In Maine (and I believe this is true of all other states) our work is better understood, and our plans are meeting with more favor than ever before.
L. M. N. STEVENS,
President Maine W. C. T. U.

We have departments enough; they touch every known evil. Let us reach the root also by changing the title of the department, "Relation of Intemperance to Capital and Labor," to "Social Science"; enlarge its scope to cover a thorough study of the wrong conditions which make so much of our work necessary.

Another "next" should be the arousement of women to the existence and magnitude of the evils against which we contend and the revelation to them of the wisdom and need of our methods. "More workers and more work" is the slogan for W. C. T. U. MARIAN H. DUNHAM,

I believe it is a fact that while the state is, by its license laws, chiefly responsible for the making of drunkards it takes no account of the manufactured product except as it becomes amenable to the law in a criminal capacity. I think it might be well for the W. C. T. U., in every licensing state, to demand the establishment and maintenance, at public expense, of institutions for the physical and mental care of this large and unfortunate class of our people. The concerted effort would at least help to educate public sentiment and bring voters and legislators to a realizing sense of their duty, and the obligation resting upon them to dispose of the product of their drunkard factories.

LAVINIA S. MOUNT,
President Mississippi W. C. T. U.

Let every W. C. T. U. woman keep herself well posted on the national statistics of the enormity and ruinous agency of the liquor traffic, so that she may be able to meet all arguments with deadly facts instead of the "sentiment and gush" of which we are sometimes accused. I wish we might bring into active operation the beautiful suggestion that every son should be persuaded to vote at least once in his life "as mother wishes." If this were done, four years from date the ship of state will be manned by prohibition. The only place the W. C. T. U. can successfully meet the saloon is in politics. The conscientious effort of every woman in favor of political prohibition would rush in the day upon us.

M. J. BORDON,
President New Mexico W. C. T. U.

It seems to me that the social purity and the franchise departments should receive special attention. I can see no quicker and surer way to wipe out the liquor curse than by the ballot in the hands of women; and there is no reason or justice in withholding the ballot from women and placing it in the hands of these uncivilized Indians about me who are living in tribes and dancing their ghost dances. Yet by a late decision of the Supreme Court the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians have been made American citizens. I have talked to several of their educated young men on the subject, while visiting their homes as missionary and field matron, and have only found one who had any idea of what citizenship meant, and his knowledge was as limited as that of a child.

E. J. ROBERTS,
President Oklahoma W. C. T. U.

You ask "What next?" To me, it seems best that our work should be pressed on lines *in*tensive rather than *ex*tensive. Let every department of our work be more zealously carried on. If there is need to take some new, brave, bold step, let us do it. Let us do all, dare all, give all for Christ and humanity. We need some plan which shall keep unions at work after they are organized, some plan which shall be self-operative and in itself life-sustaining to the union. We need a better financial scheme, for the lack of funds creates lack of energy. Let each one take to heart the injunction, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." Let each member of every local union stand like a soldier, true to her colors, ready for work assigned her, be it great or small. "Surely I know it shall be well with them that fear God."

MARY READ GOODALE,
President Louisiana W. C. T. U.

You ask, "What next?" I do not know. I wish the church with all its religious, charitable work, and all its philanthropic schemes could be brought to see its injustice to women; could be convinced that for making conditions favorable for soul-saving and world-betterment, woman must have a hand in determining these conditions. Then every pulpit would thunder forth woman's duty. Then true, good women in the church would want the ballot, that they might help change conditions; and when women in the church generally, led or backed by preachers generally, make this demand, legislators will begin to hear and heed.

How can the lethargy and egotism and arrogance of the church be invaded, attacked, broken down, overturned, dissipated? If it is not done, then must I go out of life without seeing the strongest desire of my heart fulfilled. That is nothing and matters little, but it matters much that the church should pose as woman's friend, yet bar her progress; it matters more that the church, claiming to desire, and believing it does desire the salvation of the world, should obstinately refuse the only sure means to that end. My very soul grows tired, tired, tired!

I believe the W. C. T. U. should make aggressive utterance and take aggressive step on this line. How? It must be in convention if anywhere. Our resolutions should clearly set forth the attitude of the church toward the liquor traffic. They should just as clearly declare against the injustice of the church against woman, and the utter unwisdom of the church in refusing to seek the weapon that alone can win in the fight with powers of darkness.

We all feel this. Mrs. Stanton says: "Unless we are true to our own highest convictions, we can be true to nothing." I begin to fear that many of us are not true to our highest convictions and best ideals.

CLARA C. HOFFMAN,
President Missouri W. C. T. U.

Somebody asked an old soldier, who, at the battle of Waterloo was in charge of a gun holding an important summit, what he could see when the battle was going on. "See," said he, "nothing but smoke and dust." "What did you do?" "Do, I stood by my gun." You ask, "What next?" for the W. C. T. U. We are in the smoke and dust of this great fight against the liquor traffic. We are holding the heights.

Perhaps the only thing to be done just now is to "stand by our guns." It often requires as much courage to stand ready for command, as to fight. About all we can do in old Connecticut just now is to stick. Let the watchword ring out all along the line, "Stand by your guns." The Waterloo of the legalized liquor traffic must be fought. Wellington stimulated his soldiers by the stirring battle cry, "England expects every man to do his duty." Let ours be, "The W. C. T. U. expects every member to do her duty."

CORNELIA B. FORBES,
President Connecticut W. C. T. U.

Standing as I do upon prohibition soil I would say: Teach the temperance forces that prohibition will not enforce itself. "Prohibition by law" is a grand step forward and should be urged everywhere, but we must add to this "Prohibition by politics and prohibition by woman's ballot."

Instill into the minds of temperance people the necessity of more backbone when it comes to the enforcement of prohibitory laws. Urge coöperation with officers who are trying to fulfill their official vows. Fight re-submission in prohibition states, it being the device of the enemy.

Oppose the license system, the nationalization of the liquor traffic and the municipal saloon. A spoiled egg can never be made palatable. Urge the repeal of the internal revenue laws.

Educate, agitate and organize. Pray earnestly, remembering "Neither is he that planteth anything, neither he that watereth, but God giveth the increase."

EMMA A. CRANMER,
President S. Dakota W. C. T. U.

What next? More direct, individual, personal work; talking, praying, persuading, enlightening all with whom we come in contact, at home or abroad, on the iniquity of the rum traffic and the sin of voting for candidates for office who will license it and who are themselves drinking men, or in sympathy with the continuance of drunkard-making by law. So shocked and surprised have we been at the cry of our adversaries and the allies of the saloon that we were "politicians" that we have kept still of late as a means of defense. Let us rejoice in being counted worthy of reproach for His name's sake, and redeem the terms political and politician from their present association with deceit and vileness and greed of spoils of office, by speaking the truth "boldly as we ought to speak"; by earnest and lucid presentation of the course pursued by the two old political parties, showing their total disregard for the interests of the people, and so win for the Prohibition party the votes of those who have the right to vote; and so, too, secure would-be voters and members of the W. C. T. U. from those who may not now cast a ballot. Stand for the protection of the home, the best interests of the people and the ballot with an educational clause for every naturalized citizen without distinction of sex.

H. A. HOBART,
President Minnesota W. C. T. U.

THE CALL TO PRAYER.

Saturday and Sunday, October 22d and 23d, have been set apart as days of special prayer for the Nineteenth Annual Convention of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, to convene at Denver, Colorado, October 28th to November 3d inclusive.

That there may be unity of action and petition, the following plan is suggested by the National Evangelistic Superintendent.

On Saturday, October 22d, let each local union gather in its accustomed place of meeting, from 2 to 5 o'clock p. m. for a season of prayer and conference.

PROGRAM FOR SATURDAY'S SERVICE.

First Division from 2 to 3:30 p. m.
Subject—Our Sources of Power.

1.—THE SPIRIT—Read Acts 2:1–5.
HYMN—"Holy Spirit, Faithful Guide."
2.—PRAYER—Read Acts 4:31–36.
HYMN—"'Tis the Blessed Hour of Prayer."
3.—THE HAND OF GOD—Repeat passages and precious promises from the Bible.
HYMN—"How Firm a Foundation."

Let earnest petitions follow for the baptism of the Spirit of Power upon us as individual workers, that we may be fully consecrated to Christ.

Second Division from 3:30 to 5 p. m.
Subject—Our National Work and the Coming Convention at Denver.

SCRIPTURE LESSON—Psalm 46.

HYMNS—"Guide Me, oh, Thou Great Jehovah," "America," "There are Lonely Hearts to Cherish."

Follow by earnest prayers for the coming Convention: that God's will may be done in and through us; the spirit of Christ be manifested; a rich blessing fall upon the great organization, the city where we gather, and upon the nation and the world; that the spirit of love and self-sacrifice be renewed in us, that we may go forth with new power to our work for the saving of souls, and the overthrow of the iniquitous traffic which opposes the spread of Christ's Kingdom.

"Now the God of peace that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be glory forever and ever, Amen."—Hebrews 13:20, 21.

ELIZABETH W. GREENWOOD,
National Superintendent Evangelistic Work.

[The same program may be used in part for a general service on Sunday afternoon, in which it would be well to invite the coöperation of pastors of the churches.—EDS.]

THE ENGLISH SITUATION AS VIEWED BY AN AMERICAN.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—By request I send you some observations made on my late visit to London and Glasgow.

First of all: In England one can easily see that moral principle is fast becoming a dominant factor in politics.

The unanimity and sagacity with which the liquor traffic pushes its interests, and the greatly increased consumption of alcoholic liquors, with the consequent injury and misery directly traceable to it, have awakened a more widespread personal responsibility for its existence and toleration, and the moral atmosphere is therefore actively alive to the fact that heretofore legislation on this question has excluded all moral sentiment, and quite ignored the criminal results inevitable from the trade, and not merely incidental to it.

The whole vote in the last election was so largely in favor of a restriction of the liquor traffic, that very material results are anticipated when this subject shall be brought before Parliament for its consideration at the next session.

No one is at all certain of what Mr. Gladstone and his party may do to promote actual temperance legislation, yet there are strong indications that the licensing question and direct local veto will be brought forward at an early day.

Numerous meetings are being held all over the kingdom, favoring the direct veto, instructing members of Parliament to push this measure; and much earnestness and determination are manifested by all friends of temperance to secure this much desired aggressive action.

In many sections the direct veto has been a test of party strength; both parties doing their worst and best, till it became a struggle, apparently, with the liquor interests on the one side, and sobriety and good morals on the other. The liquor question is decidedly in politics—and the absorbing question at that—both in this country and in England.

The immediate future, therefore, is full of encouragement. Besides all this, the active interest that has been awakened in all classes of society will be sustained and strengthened in the future, because of the fact that thousands of young people are brought together in numerous Bands of Hope, which are fully organized all over Great Britain.

These Bands of Hope are among the most interesting and certain means of developing and spreading prohibition sentiment. Young people are grounded in incontrovertible truths in favor of total abstinence and the prohibition of drink houses, so that however the older good(?) people may vote, the young abstainer who comes to the voting age will see that his ballot is not stained by upholding the traffic in any degree.

A great number of these Bands of Hope have been very successful in their use of the medal contest as a means of awakening and interesting the people on this question, and the promise for the usefulness of this method in England and Scotland is very encouraging.

The recent successes of the Liberal Party in the late Parliamentary elections, so far as they relate to prohibition, Sunday closing and other restrictions of this traffic, have been almost phenomenal. All engaged in the trade and interests allied to it are astounded, but to the friends of prohibition it is most cheering. They see some results of their work—what they had a right to expect. While this is true of England, where the late returns have givgreat satisfaction, it is especially true of the returns from Scotland, which have given a more than two-thirds vote in favor of the effort to prohibit the liquor traffic by a direct local veto. The plan for securing an expression of the will of the people on this question is to get the candidates committed, before election, to such action in Parliament as will guarantee a favorable vote on such bills as may be presented for this purpose.

Liquor dealers are especially excited and anxious in view of the uncertainty of their trade, which is so largely dependent on the action of Parliament, and the measures that may be introduced or favored by Mr. Gladstone and the Liberal party. Some of the large brewers are already scenting their doom. Allsop's shares, for instance, have been reduced recently from one hundred pounds down to fifteen; one of the share-holders describing the company as "an avalanche fast going to destruction." The opposition of the drink sellers, therefore, has taken on a more definite form. They openly announce "Our trade, our politics," so that the line of battle is becoming more clearly defined between drink-sellers and the friends of temperance.

Some of the medical journals are taking up the question of "Public Safety in the Sale of Alcoholic Medicines." Until recently, proprietary medicines, said to contain alcohol, were supposed to be exempt from the statutory restrictions; but medical men and coroners' juries have protested against the sale of some of these so called remedies, and circulars are being issued by the authorities to stop the sale of these medicines. Chemists are warned to discontinue their sale under heavy penalties, unless they are labeled "poison." This is one of the straws showing the intelligent conviction that is taking possession of the people as to the nature of alcohol and its unfailing results.

Questionable plans have been offered by bishops and others to lessen the evils of the liquor traffic; but they all include a sanction of the drink habit by the government, and are only other forms of license, which justify and perpetuate the horrors that are occasioned by the use of alcoholic beverages.

The influence of Lady Henry Somerset in favor of the radical side of prohibition cannot be overestimated. Her profound conviction that only the vote consecrated to this cause can remove the curse, is awakening people of rank to their personal responsibility for the evils produced by the drink traffic. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union has undoubtedly received a marked impetus through her influence, and Miss Willard's visit in London will doubtless add much to the appreciation of the World's White Ribbon band, all lands harmoniously pushing the great crusade.

Our visit to the temperance hospital was one of the interesting features of our short stay in London. A large tablet meets the eye on approaching the buildings, on which is inscribed "NO ALCOHOL USED." We were shown through the various rooms, which everywhere gave evidence of utmost care, and we were assured of the superior results of their treatment. No alcohol is allowed to be used in any of their remedies, as none is necessary. Other agents have been found which are quite as efficient and without the deleterious effects of alcohol.

The successful organization of a life insurance company soundly based on the entire exclusion of the use of alcoholic beverages, already showing extraordinary results, is another interesting feature of the temperance movement in England. The large dividends and advantages that are offered to total abstainers are among the formidable arguments which can be offered to justify the claim that total abstinence is the only safe method to prolong life.

Yours for an active war on the liquor traffic, and a confident faith in positive prohibition in the near future.

W. Jennings Demorest.

New York City.

COLORADO EXPECTANT.

Dear Union Signal:—Colorado is yearly attracting an increased tide of health and pleasure seekers. The unequaled beauty and grandeur of its scenery, the wondrous variety and richness of its resources, its unexampled healthfulness and perfect climate have rendered it famous the world over. Nowhere is the sunlight so brilliantly beautiful and hope-inspiring as that which day after day gilds the snow-capped, rugged old Rockies with an unrivaled splendor that leads one to exclaim in the exquisite lines of Longfellow:

> "O gift of God! O perfect day!
> Whereon shall no man work but play;
> Whereon it is enough for me
> Not to be doing but to be!"

Colorado's attractions have been published abroad in no small measure by the throngs who have visited this beautiful "Queen City of the Plains" during some of the numerous conventions which have gathered at Denver within the past few years. Many inquiries have been made regarding the autumnal weather of Colorado, and it may be well to state that as a rule we have no "dark and dreary" days, but warm sunshine in daytimes, with cool, bracing nights, far into the winter. It would, however, be unwise to boast, for an unparalleled "spell of weather," as down-easters say, might break our record during the convention dates, and injure our name for veracity.

Both here and throughout the state the members of the W. C. T. U. are in a joyful state of expectancy as to the coming convention, and are putting aside every other interest preparatory to attending. This feeling is manifested as well by women in every walk in life, and it is most touching to listen to the comments made by those who have not hitherto felt the importance of affiliating with the W. C. T. U. Old Crusaders refer with pride to the fact that in the pioneer days they were in the thick of the battle waged in behalf of the homes.

A large, well organized executive committee of arrangements, ably presided over by Mrs. M. A. Cassell, president of Arapahoe county W. C. T. U., meets each Monday afternoon. Enthusiasm prevails, and every member demonstrates that valuable, though ancient motto, "Do it, and it will be done," and every one has shown genius in her particular line. "Genius is a capacity for a great deal of hard work," 'tis said, and from the first, a cheerful, willing spirit of consecration to the cause of "God and humanity" has lifted the workers out of the tread-mill of drudgery. With the "heart within and God o'erhead," how can we fail to have one of the grandest of conventions!

MEMORABLE VISIT TO RAMABAI'S SCHOOL

By Our Third and Fourth Round-the-World Missionaries.

Dear Union Signal:—We were on the eve of leaving India after a winter of incessant toil.* Our hearts turned to the little woman who was at once so pathetic and so brave a figure in our National W. C. T. U. Convention at Nashville in 1887, and we longed not only to see her face, but to know for ourselves of her work, and to see with our own eyes that widowed band which makes up her unique household. So we made the pilgrimage from Bombay to Poona amid sweltering heat, over the dizzy heights and through the scores of tunnels by which our locomotive pursued its zigzag journey, witnessing a gorgeous sunset, such as can only be seen in tropical countries, and reaching Poona in the cool of the evening.

The "Sharada Sadan" is only a few steps from the railway station, and we soon passed under its vine-wreathed veranda, and into the spacious, uncarpeted reception room. Immediately in front of us on the wall hung a beautiful framed insignia of the United States. There was a piano in the room and a few chairs; this was all; and any one who has been in a hot country will realize the comfort of such spaciousness and simplicity. In an apartment just beyond we heard the hum of voices, and caught a glimpse of dark, delicate faces; this was the evening study hour, and the pupils were conning their lessons in a busy undertone.

Our minds were full of expectation, and it seemed almost a dream that we were actually in the school toward which so strong a current of wishes and prayers from all our white-ribboners at home and from throngs of other women is constantly setting. We had not been able to name the train by which we should come, and Ramabai had therefore been unable to meet us, but she came in, on our arrival, with swift welcome in her expressive face and earnest voice, clad all in white, in Oriental fashion, with little native sandals on her feet and such health in her countenance as we never saw during her visit to America. Dr. Bushnell said to me, as she left us for a moment, "What burdens she must have borne when she was with us, a stranger in a strange land, to have given her such a fragile look! She has built up wonderfully in her native air." But she talked out of a full heart of her love for the United States, and of the generous support for her great undertaking from her friends in our country, of Miss Willard, concerning whom she asked with eager interest, of the prejudices against her work and the victories gained in the little more than three years since the school was opened, of the dark shadows that hang over Indian womanhood, of her thought regarding many subjects of world-wide interest. And once more, as in the first days when we knew her, as Miss Willard's guest in Evanston, we marveled at the keenness and breadth of her intellectual vision and gloried in the great-heartedness that gathered the sorrowful of all lands into her sympathies.

Then, two of her teachers, one a European and the other a native lady, were introduced, and her fairy-like little daughter came dancing in, and we were called to supper. Ramabai said, in her quiet way, that she hoped we would pardon her that she offered us no meat, adding, "We are vegetarians"; and we only wished she could have realized how ideal we thought that simple meal, which seemed to belong to the Golden Age rather than to these carnivorous evil days upon which we have fallen. White bread and brown, oranges, bananas, fresh figs, pomegranates, native sweets, butter, and milk to drink. Ramabai looked as happy as a child while we ate and talked together, and then we showed the photographs we had brought of Miss Willard, Lady Henry Somerset and others of our W. C. T. U. leaders, in a folding morocco case, and last of all came her own and her child's, at the sight of which the latter shouted out in merry surprise and a flush stole over our friend's gentle face, with that rare, illuminating smile.

And now she called her group of pupils to her side, and told us many sad histories, as she presented them to us. There were at this time thirty-six in all; twenty-nine widows, three deserted wives and four unmarried girls. One dear little innocent had been left a widow at three years of age; two of the girls had been so starved and abused before they came to her that they were scarcely more than living skeletons when she received them here, but now they were regaining somewhat of the rounded proportions of childhood.

One could easily see that Ramabai was the center of joy and affection in her household. Then the girls, with the help of Miss Kent, carried out a delightful program which had been arranged for our pleasure, of songs and recitations in English and Marathi. What a picture it was! Those youthful figures—not one above sixteen—going through their pretty exercises in their many hued Oriental costumes, graceful and soft voiced, with their beloved Ramabai looking on, whose heroism had opened a door of deliverance for Indian womanhood, which is but the harbinger of the brighter day when public opinion shall fling wide many other doors of opportunity for these oppressed ones. We listened to a deeper song than the melody that fell from those young lips, and this was its refrain: "The world was made for women too!"†

We gave the little band a few loving, earnest words and then they went to rest. Ramabai showed us their beds simply mattresses and covers spread on the spotlessly clean floor. She said, "It is our custom, you know," explaining also how crowded they were in these rooms and the hope of a flitting very soon.

In a little while a carriage was brought to the door, and we went to visit the new "Sharada Sadan," which has been bought and completed under Ramabai's own supervision. Such a wise, steady, business head is hers! All the arrangements showed this. There are large, lovely grounds, a huge well, and several buildings well adapted for the various needs of the school; the fernery, already luxuriant in its sweet graces, and the partially completed library building, named in loving remembrance of Dean Rachel Bodley, Ramabai's first friend in America. All these we viewed by the light of a lantern, carried by a trusty native servant, clambering over debris, and aided by Ramabai's explanations. The night was very dark, but it was our only opportunity, for we were obliged to return to Bombay on the midnight express, our ship being advertised to sail for Australia the next day. It remains a weird yet delightful memory, and the white figure of our gentle hostess flits through it all.

At the last she took us to her own cozy den in one of the new buildings—all are of course built according to true Indian architecture, one storied, with very thick walls, and deep verandas, on account of the intense heat—and wrote our names in two copies of her book concerning her visit to America. It is printed in the Marathi language. We asked, "But who will translate this book for us, Ramabai?" She laughed, and replied, "That I do not know." We laid roses from the garden between the leaves, and brought her gifts away, as precious though "sealed books" from her hand.

She stayed with us to the last, kissed us for ourselves and for Miss Willard, and clasped our hands tenderly as the train began to move, with a look that was eloquent of sisterly love and steadfast purpose. Dear Ramabai! We bear her in our love wherever we go. The unions she has organized are still working, and she is loyal to the heart's core to our white ribbon bonds.

†Motto of the Bombay Sorosis—a literary society composed of native Indian women

THE LOUISIANA LOTTERY IN HONOLULU.

Dear Union Signal:—As is well known, this little paradise of the Pacific has for a year or two been struggling with great financial depression as the result of the workings of the new American tariff. Enterprises of all kinds, for the development of the country and the betterment of the people, which were being promoted with energy and success, have been suddenly arrested, while thousands of laborers have been obliged to leave the country for want of work, and many who cannot leave are in great destitution.

In the midst of this disaster and anxiety comes to us the tempter and says: "Half a million dollars a year will I give you, if——. You may build your needed railroads, and lay your Pacific cable, and open your new harbors, and revive your dying industries now. All I ask is a place to locate my business for twenty five years and the unobstructed use of the Hawaiian mails."

It was the Louisiana lottery that spoke in the guise of a benevolent enterprise, which for this slight concession on our part was willing to pay into this community of its sheer goodness and bounty, five hundred thousand dollars a year. The plan had been laid and the lines had been working secretly for some time, but it was not until one of the last days of August, when a certain William White gave notice of such a bill before the legislature, that this community awoke to the danger before it.

As may be imagined, the tempter had laid his plans very warily and with great cunning. Beside this great bribe to the government it is said that lesser bribes have been freely offered to members of the legislature and others, and at the same time some, otherwise respectable, business men of our community have been bought, or persuaded to act as promoters of the scheme among our citizens. Immediately, before the papers had had time to give the warning, or any public or private action against the scheme could be taken, a petition was circulated upon the streets in favor of the lottery scheme.

It all came as a flash upon us, and fairly took our breath away. Shall these fair islands, so signally blessed of God in years past, henceforth be known to the world as the home of this gigantic iniquity? Shall we take up and swallow this loathsome thing which America has just spewed out of her mouth? Shall we allow this great temptation to come before this native people and the other nationalities, for whose uplifting we are laboring and praying! Shall we let it come among us, where it may even reach into our own homes! Never! The moral sentiment of this community spoke as one voice—"The thing shall not come into our beautiful city and make us a byword and a hissing among all the nations of the earth." It is safe to say that our people of all nations and classes have never been so stirred as upon this question.

A mass meeting of the ladies of Honolulu of all nationalities and creeds was immediately called by leading members of the W. C. T. U., and two most enthusiastic and unanimous gatherings were the result. Petitions were given out, which have been almost unanimously signed by the ladies of Honolulu and other places, and four thousand anti lottery leaflets in the Hawaiian language prepared by Rev. S. E. Bishop and Dr. C. M. Hyde, have been published and circulated by the women.

Anti lottery petitions have flooded the legislature from all quarters, from all the other islands, protests from the churches, the Honolulu Chamber of Commerce, and various organizations. The moral sense of our community is thoroughly aroused.

And still, as this mail leaves, it is impossible to say what will be the result. The tempter comes with unlimited money which is so needed here just now, and the danger is that by bribery and the offer of great sums to the government the native members of the legislature may be bought, and this horror with all its imaginable attendant evils may be forced upon us, in spite of our prayers and protests.

BY JUDSON JONES.

Clear as the song of bird
In early spring time heard;
Sweet as the new-blown rose
That summer beauty shows;
Full of the heart's rich lore
As Autumn's golden store;
Pure as the driven snow
Thy northern winters know.
The slave whose fetters fell
At truths thee uttered well,
Souls whom thy words have freed
From tyranny of creed,
The pure in heart who see
God—do speak to Him of thee.
And Christ who went before
Openeth for thee the door,
Taketh in His thy hand
Where thou dost meekly stand,
And for thy brave humanity
Heaven rings glad bells for thee;
On earth, thy name shall be
The poet of the free.

IN THE AFTER-GLOW.

BY LOUISE A. BAKER.

(Suggested by "The heavenly stars shine out as soon as it is dark enough.")

The sun had set, but red and vivid burned the glowing west.
Its rosy flame the heavens illumed with radiance. Color pressed
The firmament; it seemed a leaf of ancient missal scroll,
And then it faded, while the stars came out the word of God to enroll.

. . . . . .

My sun had set, though glory throbbed and trembled on my sight.
My saint's departure left my sky aflame with sacred light,
At first, but then, the loneliness, the gloom, the dreaded next,
Till through the darkling spaces pricked the shining stars this text:

"So will I comfort you," saith He, our Father, and this more—
"As one whom mother comforteth." Thus saith the Lord!—Before,
I dwelt in sunlight clear, but, patient now I wait and know
My mother's love is ever mine in wondrous after-glow.

BY MRS. O. W. SCOTT.

CHAPTER VII.

No woman who reads these annals will be surprised to learn that on Monday Mrs. Douglas awoke with a severe headache. How many times she heard men stepping, stepping and whispering around the house during the night, we cannot tell; nor how often she stole softly to the front windows to see if there were any signs of dynamite fiends at work. To be sure she saw nothing but shadows and starlight, and heard nothing but the night breezes whispering among the shade trees.

People with less imagination, however, can never understand how real are the personages formed of shadows, how portentious their wind voices, how blood-curdling their footsteps. But in spite of Mrs. Douglas' watchful care her husband did not express the least gratitude when she appeared at the breakfast table with pale face and heavy eyes.

"Now, what was the use!" said he. "There isn't a bit of danger. A man must do considerable in these days and in this part of the country to merit martyrdom."

"I meant to have watched, too," said Marion, sympathetically, "but I went to sleep before I knew it."

"Hugh got papa's sword and put it close to our bed," cried Ted.

"Oh! you little tell-tale!" said the big brother with a blush, and then, in self extenuation, "Well, of course, I didn't know what might happen, and if those rascals did come I wanted a whack at 'em."

"That was all right," replied his father, "only you must be careful not to let Ted get hold of it. And by the way, don't say anything about that note. It is simply a threat from some one who wants me to keep still. What puzzles me is how the report of my sermon should have reached such a man as evidently wrote the note. It looks a little as if there was a telephone between the church and the saloon. If I could think those men heard all the sermon I should be satisfied."

"Hear this, papa," said Hugh, who had unfolded the morning paper: "Last evening about nine o'clock a policeman discovered a body in the river near Little Rapids. It was soon identified as that of John Terry, who resided on Summer street. He has been addicted to the use of intoxicants for several years, but made a strong effort to reform several months since, professed conversion and united with the Memorial church. His record was most encouraging until recently. It is not known whether his death was accidental or premeditated. He was a capable and more than usually intelligent workman, and would have filled the highest position open to mechanics had it not been for his failing. He leaves a wife and two children."

"Poor Terry!" sighed the minister, his mind filled with thoughts which he did not express; and Mrs. Douglas wondered, as she recalled her interview with him, if the veil which fell between him and the Lord Jesus Christ when he took that fatal glass, had been lifted.

Some time later another item in the paper caught Mr. Douglas' attention: "We are pleased to say that Mr. Sloan, true to his generous instincts, has added another to a long list of benefactions. He has given five hundred dollars to the society for the prevention of cruelty to dumb animals, and provided for the free distribution of 'Black Beauty' among the schools of this city. Such instances have done much to win for Mr. Sloan the highest regard of his fellow citizens."

"That is all very good," said the minister to his wife, "but I cannot forget that I was told last week that Sloan owned the saloon where poor Terry was tempted to drink."

But that evening Mr. Pettigrew was to call, and Mrs. Douglas, in her darkened room, looked forward to it with apprehension.

"Don't worry, dear," said her husband laughingly, "I'm not a ranter, and my sermon yesterday was only a calm, plain exposition of Christian duty. I haven't a word to take back, so just go to sleep and leave an old soldier to capture the enemy."

Pain always seeks the little demon Worry as a partner; and firm indeed is the will-power which can check the waltz of the wicked pair through brain and nerve tissue; but with firm confidence in her broad-shouldered husband, Mrs. Douglas turned away from her vague fears and slept quietly in spite of the murmur of voices soon heard in the parlor below.

"Now, Brother Douglas, what about yesterday?" said Mr. Pettigrew, leaning back comfortably in an arm chair. He was a man who always made himself comfortable if it were possible.

"You must explain what you mean before I can answer," said the minister, with a smile.

"Well, about casting our ballots, you know. I wish you hadn't said it. I wish you hadn't touched politics just now, for it's like meddling with machinery down at the mill—you lose your hand but the wheels go on. You see men don't know what to make of it."

"But did I preach politics? Did I mention any party? Brother Pettigrew, don't you believe in casting our ballots against the saloon?"

"Why, yes, of course, in a sense. But everybody knew you meant it was our duty to join the Prohibition party. Between you and me I know the Republican party isn't, strictly speaking, for temperance; but it has done pretty well for us in the past, and when it comes into power again I think it will do even better. It won't do to be too critical. We have to wink at some things, of course."

"Yes, Brother Pettigrew; but the trouble is our leaders have been winking so long without cessation, that the sensitive optic nerve is worn out, and they have become stone blind."

As Mr. Pettigrew did not echo his laugh very heartily the minister continued more gravely: "They are blind leaders of the blind, and too many in the ranks have fallen into the ditch already. Poor Terry was picked up dead last evening, you know."

"Yes, yes, I told you how it would be. It's a sad case, but it proves nothing. He had the appetite, I suppose, and was bound to go down sooner or later."

"His wife says not. He learned to drink through treating among the workmen. Being generous and social he couldn't seem to resist that foolish American habit. I wish you could have heard his wife talk about it."

"But that has no bearing on the subject, after all," said Mr. Pettigrew, rather impatiently. "These fanatics are always quoting some painful case as a sort of blind. But we're talking about a system of politics for the entire country, and touching all its interests. I tell you it's a big subject; in fact, too big, some of us think, to be taken into the pulpit at all. I'll say plainly, as we are friends, I wish ministers would stick to the gospel and let politics alone."

A peal at the doorbell at that moment was not an agreeable interruption. The caller proved to be young lawyer Sinclair who had recently begun practice in Chesport, and was rapidly winning friends and even clients.

"It is one of your Connecticut divorce cases, which your laws make so easy," said he in explanation of his call. "My client claims that she was married June 18, 1885, by the Methodist minister then in charge of your church, which claim can be established only by your church records."

Mr. Douglas produced the book, from which the lawyer carefully copied the required item.

"These easy divorce laws make a clergyman feel that the marriage covenant has not the weight it ought to have," said he.

"Yes, I suppose so," replied Mr. Sinclair, folding his memorandum, "but I reckon you would justify the woman in this instance. She has been cheated out of her property, terribly abused, and at last kicked down stairs by the drunken brute she married."

"Do you find drunkenness at the bottom of most of these cases?" asked Mr. Pettigrew.

"Yes, two-thirds at least. By the way," turning toward Mr. Douglas, "I heard your sermon yesterday, and it pleased me wonderfully."

"Ah! then you do not object to hearing public questions discussed in the pulpit," said the minister.

"By no means. I believe in a gospel for Now and Here," replied the young man. "I am a Presbyterian, and yet I can't help thinking so."

"Mr. Sinclair is also a Democrat," said Mr. Pettigrew with a faint smile, "and doubtless enjoyed seeing us Republicans pulled over the coals. I was telling Mr. Douglas just as you came that I wished ministers would let politics alone."

"And I was about to tell Brother Pettigrew in return, that in our country all great moral questions sooner or later become political questions. It always has been, and always will be so," replied Mr. Douglas.

"I agree with you, sir, if I am a Democrat," said Mr. Sinclair pleasantly. "You see I have a mother who wears the white ribbon, and she reared me under the new dispensation. So, while I am with my party on leading issues, I'm hoping all the time they will break with the saloon."

Mr. Pettigrew's laugh was rather skeptical. "You must have a remarkably sanguine nature," said he.

"But I came from a part of the country where the Democrats have occasionally done something for temperance. I find up here in New England that little is expected from them in this reform."

"There is plenty of room for you in a more respectable party," suggested Mr. Pettigrew, with a true campaign cordiality.

"Thanks!" the young lawyer's eyes were uncomfortably searching as he replied: "I would as soon be in a party which legislates less for temperance, as in one which legislates more and repudiates. But, to tell the truth, I am looking for a complete breaking up of both old parties, and the formation of a new one which means progress and reform."

"And meantime?" queried Mr. Douglas.

"Meantime—I am thinking and trying to lead up rather than down," was the candid reply.

After this little episode and the young man's departure, Mr. Douglas hoped his friend would accept the situation and drop the subject, but that was not Mr. Pettigrew's way. He had some very disparaging remarks to make about the Democratic party—which the minister did not care to refute since he could not conscientiously—but soon swung back to the point he had reached in his own mind; "If ministers must take a share in the discussions of these questions, why not work along with organized parties and elevate public sentiment through them?" said he.

"But, Brother Pettigrew, in our country all great moral questions sooner or later become political questions, but they still belong in the pulpit. You may call them Gospel politics if you choose. If ministers had studied these questions right straight along since the days of Christ, they wouldn't be complaining of empty churches to day; and the ministers who are trying to catch up with the masses wouldn't have half so hard a time."

"Well, but why not work along with the organized parties and elevate public sentiment?" said Mr. Pettigrew.

"Why didn't Christ 'work along' with the Scribes and Pharisees instead of standing outside with His little party and denouncing them? Simply because He saw that the leaders of Judaism were hopelessly corrupt, morally and politically," was the reply.

"Applying this to the present, that's your opinion of your old party, is it? You must have grown in grace rapidly of late."

"I have," replied the minister, not choosing to notice Mr. Pettigrew's sneer. "You see it is just this way. Like a great many other men I haven't done much political thinking until recently. I have been willing to accept the plans of the leaders;—waking up once in a while to protest against some trickery that happened to be a little too apparent, and wishing very often that politics might be more reputable, but still letting the machine run and being 'run' by it under the impression that the party must eventually come out right. But you must remember what we learned in our school-days, that two lines starting from the same point and moving outward in opposite directions can never meet. This represents both political parties and temperance. Instead of making this question a vital issue it is being left farther behind every year. You and I know this. Still, I never realized my personal responsibility until the night of the parade, when I saw how horribly inconsistent I was, trying to preach against the saloon, and all the while marching in the endless procession which halts and cheers before its open door."

*Copyrighted.

"That was a big blunder, I admit, but that was local. The party as a whole is not to blame for what we do here in Chesport."

"Such 'blunders' are reported from every part of the country, in one form or another," replied the minister, "and have been since the nominating convention was held last June. I tell you, my dear brother, God will hold us responsible for complicity in this matter."

"It's very well to say that. We all wish the millennium would hurry right along, so we would have nothing to do but sing Psalm tunes. But the fact is, we're in an awfully wicked world, and the best thing we can do, sometimes, is to choose the least of two evils. For one, I'd rather vote with a party that regulates the rum traffic, protects home industries, and brings prosperity to the nation, than to vote for free rum and ruin as this 'Democratic annex' does —for that's all it amounts to!"

"I am acquainted with all those arguments," responded the minister, "for I've used them myself, but they cannot be sustained. If this country is to exist as a republic there must be a reform, and as the drink traffic is our stupendous national sin, no reform—worth calling such—can ignore it. Hence, I count the Prohibitionists a nucleus of that new party which must embrace all patriots from both parties who recognize the best interests of their country. I do not say this new organization has yet found its name."

"Yes, yes, that's good theology, no doubt, for long-haired men and short-haired women, but nevertheless, you're throwing away your vote—throwing it right into the air:

"'I shot an arrow into the air,
It fell to earth I knew not where.'"

"'Long, long afterward in an oak,
I found the arrow still unbroke.'" repeated the minister, with undiminished good nature, adding, "When I think of my children and other young people I see the oaks growing, and feel sure my votes will all be counted by and by."

For some reason this last remark seemed to aggravate Mr. Pettigrew more than anything that had been said before. Did he think of his own children and catch through them visions of a questioning, eager multitude—the Coming Generation? Did he see for one moment that the network of policy and trickery and cowardice, which he excused as "party necessity," must finally entangle their unsuspecting feet? He was a very affectionate father, and, moreover, a man who prided himself upon his acumen relative to the future of his children. In church and public affairs his voice was always heard appealing for broad, generous plans—"not for ourselves alone," he would say, "but for those who are to come after us." Was a glimpse given him at that moment of rotten foundations under the schools and churches and homes in which his soul delighted?

Whatever may have been the cause of his mental disturbance and silence, he soon rallied to say, in a half angry tone: "However this thing affects you, it's bound to stir up our church, and I do detest a fuss among Christians."

"So do I," said Mr. Douglas, with grave emphasis; "but if I cannot preach as I did last Sunday without making trouble our church needs stirring up. As a Republican I never preached a partisan sermon, and I never expect to as a Prohibitionist, but I always try to preach the truth. If I had asked you to cast your ballot for temperance and you had supposed I meant for constitutional amendment, or local option, it would have been all right, wouldn't it?"

"But that wasn't what you meant," said Mr. Pettigrew.

"No, I confess I spoke from a new standpoint, but with greater care than ever before. I had been on my knees, Brother Pettigrew, and if other Christian men will think their way through this problem in the same position, I have faith to believe they would soon stand where I do to-day."

"Well, I'm glad you have faith, for you'll need lots of it before you get through this business," and Mr. Pettigrew rose abruptly.

"I'm sorry we can't agree," said the minister extending his hand.

"So am I—sorry for a good many reasons." Mr. Pettigrew hesitated for a moment, as if tempted to prolong the conversation, then said "Good night," and hastily left the house.

CAN YOU LIVE ON FIFTY CENTS A WEEK?

BY SARAH WILDER PRATT.

While passing the coldest months of a Chicago winter in New Orleans, last season, I rang the bell one morning at the gate of a friend's handsome residence. It is the fashion there, perhaps you know, to have bells at the gate, that the colored servant in the detached kitchen at the end of the yard may the better hear. And they usually come crawling out in a slipshod, lazy fashion, about as swift as a snail comes out of his shell, leaving one in the burning rays of the tropical sun until this creature of service has leisurely surveyed you from head to foot—in leisurely walk down the yard and to the front gate. This fact is in strange contradiction to Southern people's hospitality, but patience in this particular department of life seems to be their crowning virtue.

I waited the usual length of time and while doing so surveyed, with sense of satisfaction, the beautiful corner lot and spacious garden grounds, together with the large, fresh and charmingly airy looking residence of my friend. It was in true Southern style—galleries encircling both the lower and upper stories; but he had constructed according to the latest pattern windows picturesque and roomy, on the swell and curved plan, which gives one a chance of overlooking all of the neighbor's doings that are going on outside their own walls. People after this fashion become sometimes too intimate. But there was no danger of my friend for, while he was a very genial man, he had the sweetest, most retiring little wife one ever meets. Though they had one son married and a daughter old enough to be, yet these people, this father and mother, had not finished their honeymoon.

I was shown all over this beautiful home, for it was my first call, and as we went out into the broad hall that ran nearly the length of the house, and came to pass over the almost hid-away stairs, where wide, easy landings, presented a beautiful view through stained glass windows, my feet pressing elegant Wilton carpets, a vision of some fortunate lottery ticket or first-class speculation suggested itself to my mind; and yet this suggestion seemed out of harmony with what I knew to be the character of the people. "Well," I sighed as I left this lovely home, "some seem born fortunate."

Many months after I was traveling in California and northward to Oregon, Tacoma and Seattle. My southern friends were on the train; a large party of us were discussing the possibility of too much eating being done for the real benefit of life. A very interesting hour we had of it, some maintaining that there was possibly as much intemperance in eating as in the drinking.

My friend then remarked: "I have proven for myself that I was able to live, work and sleep well upon fifty cents a week."

Of course he was asked to explain.

"About twenty-two years ago," he replied, "I arrived in St. Louis from the far west. I had but fifty cents in my pocket, no prospect of work of any kind and my shoes and worldly possessions, in the way of clothing, nearly gone. But I must live; I could not get rid of that job, and I was pretty hungry too. I secured a room from a kind-hearted woman who loaned me the use of a small oil stove which she, herself, was using.

"I went out, and for fifteen cents made the purchase of half a peck of wheat, which I boiled and ate three times a day for one week, purchasing milk as I wanted it with the remaining thirty-five cents. Inside that eventful week I found work, from which date I base my fortunes—a good wife and children, an orange grove, a successful newspaper, and a comfortable home are all founded upon the mental exercise of finding out how to sustain life without any loss of self-respect or respectability, upon fifty cents a week. Never mind, mother," he continued, as he turned to the pretty woman beside him who looked as though she would quite as soon he had not revealed all this to so many strangers, "it's a story that will do to be told, for it may help some other needy fellow onto his feet."

TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

I say unto you, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel.

An admirable article on the Temple appears in the September number of The Motor (the Wisconsin W. C. T. U. state organ) written by Mrs. V. H. Campbell. It is so much to the point and so clears up some misunderstanding, that we feel a wider constituency than the white-ribboners of Wisconsin should be benefited, and give below some extracts from it: "There has, comparatively, been so little done and so much misunderstanding with regard to our 'House Beautiful' that I am prompted to make an appeal to my Wisconsin sisters, who are becoming so widely known for their intrepidity in every worthy cause, to turn attention and effort this year toward the magnificent building that rears its lofty proportions heavenward, far above the smoke and din of the busy, restless throng on the street below; an object of beauty admired by all who look upon it, it stands as a silent and solemn protest against the hydra headed traffic, that with carefully screened windows 'and wise and judicious' legislation, persistently seeks the destruction of the homes and the happiness of women and children. . . . . The income will enable our temperance agitators to educate the nation to a clear perception of its duty toward the abolition of the liquor traffic; it will give our unions that which is so keenly needed, the money to use for local work. . . . . There is not a union in Wisconsin that does not desire to have its name engraved on the marble tablets that line Willard Hall, and any union with a membership of thirty can raise the necessary amount ($100) this year if each member will take a mite box and drop into it one penny each day. Various rumors have been circulated with regard to the income each state will receive from the money it contributes; perhaps the one most widely spread is that we shall receive a certain amount of literature instead of money. A report has been made that we will not receive anything for the tablets we pay for. Mrs. Carse writes to me that these reports are entirely unfounded, and that all money, for whatever purpose it is given, will be duly credited to the states whose unions contribute to the Temple fund. . . . . We ought to own all of the Temple before the opening of the Columbian Exposition, so that we may be able to point with honest pride those who visit our shores from other climes to the Temple as one of the grandest monuments that has ever been raised to a noble cause."

The following from the pen of Vermont's talented W. C. T. U. president, Mrs. Housh, is like all her writings, touching and beautiful:

"When the silver Temple inkstand came, little six-years Alfred greatly admired it, and looked curiously at the window upon window. I told him when the mite boxes came he should have one. Some days after he asked: 'When will that house built one over the other come?' I said 'Here it is now,' and gave him the mite-box, telling him the pennies would help build the great Temple. In a short time he came in with a shout to say he had three pennies in, and added: 'Mrs. Housh, how high is that house built one over the other?' 'Well, as high as seven houses on our street,' naming them, 'if the bottom of one was put on the top of the other.' 'As high as that hill?' 'Yes, and the trees on top.' He looked up at the green hill and on to the blue sky? 'My, don't the top touch the sky?' 'Yes,' I said, drawing the precious child into my arms, 'the top does touch the sky, for in Mrs. Carse's room the angels have a ladder to Heaven, and though nobody sees them, they go up and down all the time.'"

Mrs. Sophia B. Standish and Mrs. Minnie G. Roedel, Albion, Cal., send $100 for a tablet in memory of their mother, Mrs. Jane Morgan Roedel, a loyal temperance woman, and first president of White Cloud, Mich., W. C. T. U. Joseph D. Spahar, Centreville, Ind., sends $100 in memory of his wife, Martha Burgess Spahar, an earnest white ribboner; she passed from labor to reward, May 24, 1892. Mrs. O. N. Garlick, Tacoma, Wash., sends $50, a last installment on a pledge of $100, "in order," she says, "to have the name of my beloved mother, Mrs. Charlotte Nelson, inscribed on a tablet in Willard Hall."

Our English sisters do not forget that the Temple is a World's as well as a National building. Mrs. D. M. Drysdales, Liverpool, England, sends $23. Mrs. J. Baldwin, Baltimore, Md., sends $25. Mrs. Roxanna Rice, Council Bluffs, Ia., a veteran eighty-two years old, who in her youth joined the Martha Washington Society and every other temperance reform since, sends $100. She writes: "I have raised five sons to manhood, four of whom went out to do battle for the flag of our country. Last year I gave up my home to my two surviving sons and secured one for myself prepared for the aged. Now I wish for the last remaining of what I call my own to go to the beautiful Temple to join in helping forward the great cause of temperance."

A two-cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, the Temple, Chicago, will secure a mite box, descriptive card and bulletin; remember, all who fill a mite-box ($3.65) before next April will receive a photographic group consisting of Lady Henry Somerset, Miss Willard and the founder of the Temple. All drafts should be made out in the name of Miss Esther Pugh. All matters pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Carse.

OUR BILL OF FARE

opens with a breezy poem on "Colorado," whither eager hosts will soon be moving. Chapter nine of "Dr. Martha Scarborough" adds to the luster of this remarkable story. "Dedication Doings" will interest every one just now, as will "What Next?" answered by twenty-five W. C. T. U. state presidents. Under Correspondence, we have "The English Situation as Viewed by an American" (Hon. W. Jennings Demorest, the "great contest man"); "Colorado Expectant" (a hearty welcome to the National Convention); "Memorable Visit to Ramabai's School," by the Third and Fourth Round-the-World-Missionaries—Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew and Dr. Kate Bushnell. In the Household department we find an ode to John Greenleaf Whittier, "In the After glow," chapter six of "David Douglas and His Wife," "Can you live on Fifty Cents a Week?" and the Temperance Temple Items. Amber gives us a quaint string of "Memories" in Queen's Gardens. Colorado, Maine, Missouri, New York and Eastern Washington state reports lead up to important officials on page twelve.

A GREAT THINKER'S THOUGHTS.

Seven years ago our publishing house brought out a life of William T. Stead by his friend Benjamin Waugh, of which 15,000 copies were sold among white-ribboners. We have ever since believed in the great editor and followed his rising fortunes with sincere pleasure. We sent out thousands of copies of the first number of his noble Review of Reviews, the most cosmopolitan magazine that "makes for righteousness" in the wide world, which has attained to a circulation already of two hundred thousand copies, and an American edition conducted by Dr. Albert Shaw in New York City that has sprung at once to the first rank.

Mr. Stead went to Eastnor Castle last month to explain to Miss Willard that he could not be present at our convention in Denver as he had hoped, and to talk of plans pertaining to the Kingdom that is first pure, then peaceable. His remarkable personality, electric mind, brotherly kindness, and devotion to God were a study of great interest, and his presence a providential interruption from the unmeasured pathos of the summer. Fortunately the interview held that day was written down by Miss Willard and we now have the pleasure of presenting it to our readers, confident of their keen interest in so famous a character and so firm a friend as William T. Stead.

THE INTERVIEW.

"Eastnor," said Mr. Stead, as we walked slowly along the castle terrace; "Eastnor is the palace temple of the cause in England which has its headquarters in your Woman's Temple in Chicago.

"Never was a more lordly pleasure home dedicated to nobler uses than this stately castle is now consecrated to by Lady Henry Somerset. It is like a dream of romance to come upon the lovely lake, and to see its lofty turrets rising far above the trees. Here Sir Launcelot might have lived, and down that wooded glade King Arthur and his knights have ridden forth to deeds of high enterprise. It is a fitting home for the gracious lady at the head of our English Table Round, who brings to the cause of the new chivalry all the glorious traditions and legendary days of old.

"It is like Spencer's Faerie Queen," Mr. Stead continued, "modernized and up to date. We are at the beginning of a new book with a new Queen Britomarte. By the by," he added, with one of his abrupt transitions, "have you ever seen the Faerie Queen done into prose? I think it is, on the whole, the best and most interesting Sunday book I ever read to my children. It is as religious as the Pilgrim's Progress and as exciting as Jack, the Giant Killer. It should be in every Sunday-school library throughout the English speaking world.

"There is another book," he went on, "which is not so well known as it ought to be. There may be prejudice against it on account of its author, Mrs. Lynn Linton, but I don't think she was anything more than the instrument in its production. I refer to the 'True History of Joshua Davidson.' That book is an inspiration. It is the Gospel re written for the nineteenth century. No book, not even the Gospels themselves, ever helped me more to understand the kind of work Jesus of Nazareth had to do, the life He led at home and the way in which He was regarded by the men of His time. Mrs. Lynn Linton has never written anything before or since that is worthy to be named in the same breath with Joshua Davidson. If you could add that and Spencer's Faerie Queen in modern prose, to every school library in the English speaking world, I think you would do as much to revivify Christianity and restore chivalry as by the circulation of any other books that have been written in the English tongue."

Mr. Stead's phrase about Mrs. Lynn Linton being "only the instrument in producing a book nobler and purer and loftier than any of her works" interested me. I asked him about it. He smiled and said, "The subject is difficult and obscure. The wind bloweth where it listeth, but although we see not whence it cometh or whither it goeth, we feel it and know that it blows. The high priest in the Gospel was not the first or the last who spoke words of higher import than he was consciously aware of, and there are few who would not admit that in their higher moods, they are dimly conscious of the influence of a Spirit which is other than their own."

"Now that we are on this subject, Mr. Stead, have you arrived at any definite conclusions as the result of your investigations in the world invisible? Are you coming to our Psychical Congress at Chicago next year? And what do you think generally of the practical utility of inquiring into the vast range of possibilities which are the subject of psychical research?"

"What a budget of questions all in a breath! It would take a volume to answer them. But sit down under this shady tree and talk at leisure. Is not that lake divinely beautiful—a vision of purity and peace? Not a ruffle disturbs the mirror of its waters, even the stately swans are motionless like feathered argosies at anchor."

[Around the lake the trees had not yet doffed their greenery, but here and there a chestnut's flaming crimson heralded the approach of winter.]

"Now," said Mr. Stead, "let me take your questions in turn.

"1. I have arrived at several very definite conclusions, which after a time when the array of evidence is scientifically complete, I will give to the world. At present it would be premature to say more.

"2. I have been asked to attend your Psychical Congress and have promised to contribute a paper if I cannot go to Chicago.

"3. As to the practical utility of such stories, I can only say that the invisible world is to the nineteenth century what the western hemisphere was to the fifteenth. Columbus, whom all men honor to day, was once scouted as a crank, and a dreamer, who was neglecting the solid realities and practical advantages of the Old World for an idle chimera born of a diseased imagination.

"'Whatever can be known of earth we know,' Sneered Europe's wise men, in their snail shells curled;
'No,' said one man in Genoa, and that No
Out of the dark created this New World."

"Then," I persisted, "you are really convinced that you are going to get some solid good out of this psychical research?"

"My friend, it will make us all realize as demonstrable facts of the present day, what as children we were taught on the authority of ancient revelation. Already we have got from it an endless series of hints of immense possibilities and suggestions which make many things in the Bible no longer incredible even to the most incredulous. But we shall yet get from it a scientific demonstration of the reality of life after death."

"Then you are a hopeful man," I said, with a bitter remembrance of how many lofty anticipations have been disappointed in this field, "but are you equally sanguine in more material things? How seems the outlook in the cause of moral reform?"

"I feel like Wellington on the afternoon of Waterloo. He was hard pressed, his thin, red squares were heaped with the dying and the dead. The enemy had his Imperial Guard still in reserve. 'Would that Blücher or night would come,' he cried, and lo, in the distance he heard the roar of the Prussian guns, and he knew that Waterloo was won. In the great Civic Waterloo which is raging round the Hougomont of the ballot box the woman voter is our Blücher, and thank God we can already see her signal

"'Waving in the sky,
Re-inforcements now appearing Victory is nigh.'

So we hold the fort with a glad heart."

"I rejoice that you who have perhaps the widest outlook of any man with whom I have spoken are so confident of the importance of woman's suffrage. Some good men and women are full of misgivings. What makes you so ardent a woman suffragist?"

"Because it seems to me the hope of our race and the saving of the world are bound up in the recognition of the right of woman to be regarded as completely human, and, therefore, entitled to have an equal voice in the direction of the affairs of humanity, and to share equally in all that ministers to its complete development. Political life is the practical working university of the average man. We have no right to exclude our sisters from the higher education that comes from the responsible exercise of a citizen's judgment upon the affairs of the State."

"Then where would you draw the line?"

"Who gave me the right to draw any line, and to say to any human being to whom God may have given capacity to serve her fellows, or genius to govern them, 'I forbid you to use your God given talents.' I think women ought to be as free as men to do whatever good thing they can, and woe be to all those who say them nay. If women had ordinary self-respect, they would make short work of these legislative shackles. Do you think for a single moment that I would tolerate the idea that any woman, or any number of women, had a right to decree that, because I was a man, therefore I should not do any mortal thing that I felt I could do? The mere conception of such insufferable impertinence is enough to make a man sick."

"Mr. Stead, what do you think of the W. C. T. U.?"

"I think so much of it, and I have so much faith in its development that I object to three-fourths of its title. It consists of four words. Three of them limit its scope. 'Woman' restricts it to one-half the race. 'Christian' affixes a label which repels many who are really Christian in spirit. 'Temperance' elevates one single plank in your platform to a disproportionate position and therefore to a misleading predominance. If you can get rid of these three sectional and limiting words, I don't see any limit to the future scope of your Union."

"Really, Mr. Stead, you take away my breath when you take away our title in this wholesale fashion. What would there be left of us if you had your way?"

"Everything that is worth keeping, and you would begin to see as some of us have seen that in your Union there is the germ and shadowy outline of the civic church of the future. You were like Saul, the son of Kish, who went seeking his father's asses, and found the prophet who anointed him King of Israel. You began by crusading against the saloon, and lo, you have laid the foundations of the New Church, which will be composed or federated from all the churches coöperating in the great work of the salvation of society. You have begun to bring into being the American conception of the humanized and democratic form of the Catholic church. This is more than prohibition, more even than woman's suffrage. It is the great want of the world." Then Mr. Stead drew breath, and said:

"You know how in Holloway jail it was given me to say to the individual, 'Be a Christ.' And now I have to add to that and say that the time has come for a serious and determined effort to interpret the Fatherhood of God and the motherhood of the church."

"What would you call it then?" I asked.

"There is only one name, your fathers found that out in Ogden as long ago as 1829. Its name is the 'Church of God.'"

Mr. Stead here rose abruptly and went away communing with his own thoughts. He is a genius and never yet worshipped at the altar of "the God of bounds." We give his thoughts as he gave them to Miss Willard, unmixed or marred by our own commentary.

CAMPAIGN LITERATURE.

To the artisan his tools, to the soldier his weapons and fortifications, to the student his lexicons and cyclopedias! Place the sculptor before the block of marble, but deny him hammer and mallet—would you look for the perfect form, lacking but the "breath of life"? Bid sappers and miners enter the tunnels, but give them no picks and shovels—how soon would they undermine the enemy's walls?

In the war of public opinion, the strategic point, upon the taking and holding of which depends ultimate success, is the ballot-box. But guns must be made and bullets must be molded before they can be used in its attack or defense. The printed page, together with the spoken word, must awaken the conscience of the people, must implant convictions that will develop into action. The Woman's Temperance Publishing Association has been quick to recognize this principle, and prompt in preparing leaflets to keep before the public what the W. C. T. U. believes to be the paramount issue in politics, the overthrow of the saloon power.

As a wise general selects troops for an attack only after a study of the conditions, using now infantry, now cavalry or artillery, or combining the varied forces, so the temperance warrior adapts literature and methods of distribution to the special needs of his field. Is the enemy intrenched behind bulwarks of license, high or low? Through the post office, or by public or private distribution, he bombards the fortress walls with the shot and shell of Timely Talks on themes like these: "License, High or Low—Wrong in Principle"; "Shall We License the Dram Shops?" "How the Dram Shops Pay the Taxes"; "Our Drink Bill and the People Who Pay It." Is an advance ordered along the whole line, with the design of driving out the enemy and holding the fort with the temperance forces? Then with fixed bayonets and on the double quick, the troops rally to their colors, the white banners bearing the mottoes, "On Which Side are You?" "Restriction or Prohibition?" "Down with the Traffic!"

In the direct hand to hand struggle, the Voters' Leaflets furnish most effective weapons. Is the fight along the line of conscience versus party? Place "Thy Bottle" in the hands of Christian voters. Note the keen edge of this weapon:

"I want you to remember that the saloon is as national as a national bank; as lawful as a public school. I can seem to see upon the face or the rags of every drunken man a legend like that you often see on packages of whisky or tobacco: 'Take notice, the manufacturer of this article has complied with all the requirements of the law, according to the statute in such cases made and provided.' . . . If, by your consent, express or tacit, your taxes are diminished by the shamegold of license laws, I say that in the sight of God there's blood on every dollar you own. . . . Perhaps the saloon is to go on. I am not bound to demolish it, but only my interest in it. There are 12,000,000 voters in the United States. I'll vote my fraction right, and every time I vote I'll carry my share of the election, as long as God is alive. That may not do the saloon any harm, but it will be good for me. I am not bound to be successful, but I am bound to be true. A square man is never wrong-side up. 'My vote won't count'? Listen! 'Abraham believed God, and it was counted.'"

Is the supremacy of Christ in government assailed by a flank movement of the enemy? Meet it by a countercharge with the weapon that has done such effective service in John G. Woolley's skillful hands, "Christian Patriotism." Would you know its temper? Listen again!

"It is not union of church and state that I advocate, but union of the church to save the state. . . . The simple fact is that the average Christian voter, as such, has no defined status in politics; the convention does not care for him for he does not regard himself; he is willing public conscience shall be shot provided the bullet be gold; he is agreed that public virture be hanged if the rope be silken. . . . . If you come to analyze the fighting strength of the republic you will be shocked to find, as you will be to hear me say, that the Christian man, as such, cannot be counted on.

"'In the world's broad field of battle,
In the bivouac of life,'
You will find the Christian soldier Represented by his wife."

"Large Gospel Temperance"—beaten out at the same forge,—is a Damascus blade:

'The need of the world is enlisted men, wholesome, well-nourished, well-trained, well-armed, well-accoutered, stalwart, confident soldiers of Jesus Christ. . . . . Did you mean what you said on that banner, 'The World for Christ'? Up, then, and take the world! Your flag, the star of Bethlehem and the stripes of Jesus Christ. . . Can such things be? Of course such things can be. When? Faith has no 'when' in her vocabulary. God is alive, the sun stands still upon Gibeon, and the moon in the valley of Ajalon, and so will stand until this fight is over. To His saints there is no death nor failure, night nor time—only God, eternity and victory.

"Is it not true, then, that humanity is going to pieces and that Satan rules this world? Of course, it is not true. Satan is the prince of the darkness of this world. The Light of the world is at the head of our column, and His very name is Victory."

There are raw recruits who must be trained before they can do effective service. Place in their hands, "Wanted! —Your First Vote on the Right Side," and see that they know how to handle the sword. Make the L. T. L. the West Point of the temperance army, with the Lesson Manuals as the text book for its juniors, and The Advance Guard the basis of its senior grade teaching. These young warriors must be inured to camp life and forced marches, must learn to discover the devices of the enemy and to outgeneral him. The rush and power of an actual campaign teach lessons in a week that would require months of barrack life for their mastery. We fight not only for this year, for 1892, but for 1896, and 1900, and all the years to come. The drummers of the temperance army have "never learned to beat a retreat," and when they have conquered this foe—as conquer they will—they will attack another in the strength of God.

Signal Lights should flash from mountain peak to valley, bearing messages like these: "Individuality of Conscience in the Voter." "Why the Old Parties Have not Met the Saloon Issue"; "Words for Wage-workers"; "Temperance and the Labor Question." Cipher messages they may be to certain lookers on, but they will stir and rouse the people, for their cry is that of the old Scottish herald,

"Instant the time, speed, clansmen, speed!"

The limitations of space forbid more than mention of the magazine gun—The Union Signal—the torpedoes in the shape of Song Leaflets, and the war balloons of National and Department Leaflets, from which effective observations of the enemy may be safely taken. There is no lack of supplies to place the army on a war footing. Where are the men (and women) and the means—the sinews of war?

"THE SABBATH WAS MADE FOR MAN."

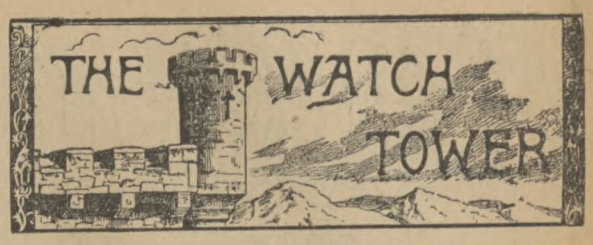
A singular phase of the debate on Sunday opening of the World's Fair is the use made of Christ's words, "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath." Advocates of a Sunday Fair claim that it would be a physical and a moral benefit, as well as a convenience to wage workers and others who cannot afford the time to attend on other days; that it would give them "a quiet, restful day" away from the saloons and other temptations of the city; that the Sunday closing clause in the act of Congress appropriating $2,500,000 to the Fair was adopted in the interest and at the instigation of the churches, and will, if not repealed, sacrifice the welfare of the people to an ecclesiastical view of the proper observance of the Sabbath which is contrary to the divine intent in its institution, and to Christ's teaching in the words quoted. "If," they say, "the Sabbath was made for man, he should be permitted to use it for his profit, pleasure, intellectual entertainment and improvement, otherwise, his interests are sacrificed to the empty observance of times and seasons."

It is not the first time that men opposed to the restraints of the moral law have interpreted it to suit their convenience and inclinations; but never have they made a more palpable mistake than in assuming that it is for the welfare of men to break down the religious and civil observance of the Sabbath. The divine command to rest from labor one day in seven is based upon the physical and intellectual, as well as the spiritual needs of mankind. It is an established conclusion of medical science that the habitual violation of this law impairs health and shortens life. A petition against opening the Crystal Palace Exposition for profit on Sundays was signed by six hundred and forty-one physicians of London, who said: "Your petitioners from their acquaintance with the laboring classes and with the laws which regulate the human economy, are convinced that a seventh day of rest, instituted by God, is essential to the bodily health and mental vigor of men in every station of life." Records of the results of the violation of the Fourth Commandment show that neither man nor beast can endure the strain of toiling seven days in the week, and that they can accomplish more by resting the seventh day.

Equally disastrous results follow intellectual labor seven days in the week. The unrelaxed bow will break. The mind on a continual strain becomes enfeebled, and insanity often follows persistent mental application in violation of God's command which is as plainly written in man's mental and physical constitution as it was on the tables of stone: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, but the seventh is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant, nor thy maid servant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates."

The moral welfare of men requires one day in seven for rest and meditation upon higher things than occupy the mind the other days of the week. The wreck of man's physical and mental powers by violation of this law is sure to work moral injury. The great jurist, Blackstone, said: "Corruption of morals usually follows profanation of the Sabbath." Common observation shows that the great mass of the immoral and criminal classes are desecrators of the Sabbath. The Sabbath observing nations are the most moral and prosperous of all the nations of the earth. Montalembert attributed the greatness of England and the United States to their observance of the Sabbath. "The keeping of one day in seven," says Blackstone, "as a time of relaxation and refreshment, as well as of public worship, is of admirable service to the state considered merely as a civil institution. It imprints on the minds of the people that sense of their duty to God, so necessary to make them good citizens; but which would be worn out and defaced by an unremitted continuance of labor without any stated times of recalling them to the worship of their Maker."

"The Sabbath was made for man," for his rest and recuperation and for the culture of his moral nature. In the time of Moses, men who violated the fourth commandment were stoned to death. That penalty was necessary to impress upon a barbarous people the importance of the command, and preserve them from the worse penalties—physical, mental and moral decay which are now invariably visited upon individuals and nations that persist in ignoring the law of the Sabbath.



A woman, Miss Julia Bracken, of Galena, is the sculptor of the figure to be placed over the entrance to the Illinois Building at the World's Fair. The figure is in marble, and represents Illinois welcoming the nations. Miss Bracken receives $2,500 for it.

A good point for temperance is the fact that Queen Victoria's attitude toward total abstainers seems more friendly on account of her Indian servants, Brahmins, who now constantly form part of her personal retinue, who are strict total abstainers, and of whom she thinks most highly.
